TRIBUTE OF RESPECT

TO

HON. J. S. G. RICHARDSON, STATE REPORTER

At the opening of the Supreme Court on Wednesday, January 14th, 1880, Hon. E. W. M. Moise, of Sumter, submitted the following tribute on behalf of the bar of Sumter to the memory of their late associate, the Hon. J. S. G. Richardson.

The members of the Sumter bar, feeling the loss they have sustained in the death of their loved associate, James S. G. Richardson, desire to offer a tribute of their respect and regard to his memory.

They, unitedly and individually, bear testimony to the nobility of his character, the unsullied integrity of his life, the attractive refinement of his nature. Their memories, running back over the years that have gone by, rest upon no act of his which mars the pleasant remembrance of their association with him. His wise counsel, his kindly sympathy, his efficient aid, were always at their command. Great as were his abilities and attainments, so modest and amiable, and gentle, so considerate and sympathetic was he that the exhibition of his stores of learning, the revelation of his powers of thought, which almost daily were elicited by some one or more of his younger brethren, forced upon them no painful consciousness of inferiority. His knowledge was so thorough and accurate, his reasoning faculties so just and logical in their action, his power of expression so perfect in its force and simplicity, that whatever was the subject of discussion its obscurities disappeared, its principles were made clear, and the mind of the inquirer was gratified with the ease with which he too could discern and comprehend.

Companionship with him was a true pleasure to his associates. So naturally and thoroughly was he a gentleman that all were at ease with him. He sought to make others appear to advantage. Too noble to give place in his heart to envy or jealousy, he was always ready to construe favorably the motives and conduct of others, to be pleased at their successes, and to feel for them in their failures or errors; and his genial, kindly nature attracted irresistibly the affection of all who were brought into contact with him. It may well be doubted if the bar of this or any other country can present another instance of one so able and learned, and pure and noble, who was yet so modest and simple, and unaffected and genial, and to whom his brethren were so greatly and sincerely attached. As we remember the long years of physical suffering he endured, the troubles through which he passed, the distortion of his frame from intense and protracted pain, the crippling of his bodily powers, the isolation of his life from recreation and amusement, he seems a marvel of patience and fortitude, of evenness of temper, of amiability and kindness. But his gentleness did not degenerate into weakness. No one could be firmer in adherence to principle, or more courteous in the vindication of the just and right, and from no one would have sooner come a rebuke to what was unjust or low or mean. His whole nature was so transparently honorable that unworthy motives could not venture into his presence.

What he would have become if the health and vigor of body common to man had been vouchsafed to him, we cannot say. His abilities were equal to any position or station. His nature was perhaps too reflective and philosophical in its bent to have found an active political life congenial, though no one could be more truly patriotic, more ardently alive to the best interests of his country. If he had gone into political life he would have been a true, unselfish, patriotic statesman. But cut off by bodily infirmities from other pursuits, he found in his profession a solace for his sufferings and an occupation worthy of his high aims. When, in his young manhood, he was stretched upon his bed, a weary prisoner of pain, for many months his firm will fought off suffering with severe study, and all his after life showed that his mind was superior to sufferings even as great as his, and when others would have rested he studied and labored on.

He was not content with anything short of thoroughness. His first aim was to master the great principles of the law and then to follow them in all their ramifications and developments. He, perhaps, had not his equal in the department of real estate law. But he was a genuine lover of his profession, and no department of it was neglected; and he went beyond our systems of jurisprudence to trace in other systems the same great principles as our own, and find in them, if not authority, yet the materials of copious illustration. Sometimes in his legal arguments, but oftener in his conversational discussions with his brethren, his frequent quotations from the civil law, and his clear expositions of its analogous principles would show his admiration of that great system and his estimate of its value in the elucidation of important legal questions.

His memory was remarkably ready and accurate, and little, if anything, seemed ever to be lost or to be unavailable to him which he had committed to its keeping. A result at which he had arrived, an opinion which he had formed, was laid away until its use was needed. The dicta of learned authors and the decisions of the various courts he could generally refer to by name and volume, and all his knowledge was at his command. If he failed of success or erred in any of his conclusions it would generally be found to be the result of his nice perceptions discovering distinctions which others could not see. But such instances were infrequent, and as an expounder of the law, either upon the bench or as an author, he would have made important contributions to legal learning.

To the bar of this whole state he has been indirectly a valuable instructor in his labors as state reporter for so many years. The world may be challenged for more just, accurate and complete abstracts of the principles of decisions than are to be found in his reports.

He was a native of this county and lived all his life amongst us. He was born on the 17th day of April, 1815, and died on the 11th day of August, 1879, in the 65th year of his age. That one suffering from such infirmities and complications of diseases should live so long was often the subject of wondering remark. That so many years were so well spent, and were filled with such valuable labors and worthy deeds, is deserving of still greater admiration.

Resolved, therefore, That we cherish the memory of our departed friend; that we hold up his life as an example of high aims and well-directed efforts, and present to ourselves and our successors his industry, his patience, his gentleness, his firmness, his generosity, his high sense of honor, his integrity of life as a model for the formation of individual and professional character.

The court unites with the bar in the sentiments expressed in the resolutions that have been presented at the bar commemorative of the virtues and public services of the late reporter of this court, the Hon. J. S. G. Richardson, and in the expressions of respect and admiration that have been called forth by the occasion of which these resolutions are a fitting expression. Since the close of the session of this court for the last April term that worthy man and excellent public officer has been removed from the sphere of his public labors, from the endearments of domestic life, and from association with the bench and bar, ripened by long years of intercourse into a tie having more strength and tenderness than is common to relations having their foundation in active business pursuits.

Mr. Richardson's name is a part of the judicial history of the state. It recalls the flow of a pure administration of justice through more than the life of an entire generation of man. During these many years it was his office to gather up the utterances of the good and able men that have guided the course of justice, and embody them in a literature destined to live through countless ages, carrying the impress of the legal learning of his time down to the latest generations. The labors of the reporter are so interwoven with those of the bench and bar that his industry and learning, his fidelity and skill, have a conspicuous part in these great results that flow from the published history of judicial procedure. It cannot be doubted that the strength of civil institutions lies in the wise and impartial determinations that proceed from the courts of justice. To gather these materials from the archives of the courts, to illuminate and expand the results reached by judicial investigation, by arranging around them the circumstances from which they derive their reason and force, and to transmit them in a striking form to the general current of legal thought, from which all enlightened systems of jurisprudence are invigorated and enlivened, is the province of the reporter. We may well unite in congratulating our state in having possessed a public officer capable of performing these important public duties, through so many years, in a manner commanding the admiration of all who are familiar with the elements that constitute the merit of the best administration in this department of judicial labor.

It is unnecessary to recall to the bar the excellencies of Mr. Richardson's labors, running down through thirty-nine volumes of reports. His power of statement is familiar to all. No lawyer of experience hesitates to place his opinion of the proper force of any judgment reported by Mr. Richardson upon the accuracy and completeness of the statement of all matters essential to a right understanding of the force of such judgment, nor to accept, as standing upon the highest ground of certainty, matters of historic interest appearing in his elucidations. In the loss of such a public officer every citizen is concerned; but it is chiefly the members of the bench and bar, who, by their studies and associations, are familiar with the value of the life that has ebbed from these shores of time to flow in other realms, who can appreciate the full measure of the loss we have sustained. As we take down the volumes of our current reports and miss the name of Richardson, we shall feel that a household word has gone from us. His clear text and competent statement, rendering conspicuous the principles of the decisions reported by him, belong to history.

We cannot, without the profoundest feeling of sympathy, recall his labors during the latter years of his life, performed under the disadvantages of physical prostration and bodily pain. It was but as yesterday that we saw the undimmed light of his fine intelligence beaming with warmth and animation through the half-closed portals of sense, charming us with the order and composure of his mind, calmly pursuing the course of professional duty, while waging the battle of life near to its utmost barrier. It was a noble spectacle, eloquent with the lessons of immortality. We have all been deeply impressed by it, and have found in its example and teachings strength to oppose with hearty courage all those obstacles that bodily and moral weakness create in the path of duty.

It is fitting that we should suspend the ordinary avocations that interest our minds, to contemplate so exalted a character and the nature of that event that has translated him to the bosom of that Justice that he has loved and studied from afar, through all his years of labor and of suffering. It is fitting that this court, whose labors he has adorned, should, with more than ordinary care, offer these remarks of respect that custom has established and sanctioned. It is, therefore, ordered that the resolutions that have been presented at the bar shall be inscribed upon the records of this court, and a copy transmitted, under the seal of this court, to his bereaved family. And, as a further token of respect, it is ordered that this court do now adjourn.

Mr. Richardson was elected State Reporter by the legislature of South Carolina in December, 1844, and held his office until December, 1846, during which period were published three volumes of law reports and two volumes of equity reports. After an interval of four years he was again elected in December, 1850, and continued to hold his office until the new government was inaugurated in the summer of 1868. During this period he published Richardson's Law Reports, Vols. IV. to XV., inclusive, and Richardson's Equity Reports, Vols. III. to XIV., inclusive. A successor was appointed in 1868, who, discharging none of the duties of the office, was himself succeeded by Mr. Richardson, who continued in office until his death in August, 1879. His labors during this term will be found in the series of reports known as South Carolina Reports, containing ten volumes. He also published in 1853 a volume of unreported cases—Richardson's Equity Cases.

In the American Law Review for January, 1870, in a notice of 14 Richardson's Equity Reports and 15 Richardson's Law Reports, the editors say, page 374: "These volumes conclude the labors of one who has filled the office of official reporter of decisions in South Carolina for nearly a quarter of a century with an ability never excelled and rarely equaled."

SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA

JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT DURING THE PERIOD COMPRISED IN THIS VOLUME.

HON. A. J. WILLARD, CHIEF JUSTICE.
HON. HENRY McIVER, ASSOCIATE JUSTICE.
HON. A. C. HASKELL, ASSOCIATE JUSTICE.

*(Case No. 590.)

GOURDIN et al., Executors of Mrs. Moultrie, v. EDWARD C. SHREWSBURY, J. B. ADGER and Wife, Mrs. A. H. SMITH and Mrs. ANNA M. BROWN, et al.

(November Term, 1877.)

A testator bequeathed and devised his residuary estate to his executors to sell and reinvest proceeds in stock, which stock was given to testator's two daughters, C. and L., during their natural life, and the share of the daughter first dying was to go to her surviving children, their heirs, &c.; but if such daughter first dying left no child surviving, but a husband surviving, then "said husband shall have such a proportion thereof as the law gives of the wife's estate in case of intestacy under the legislature of this state," and the remainder to the surviving sister, her heirs, &c., forever. And upon the death of the surviving sister "the stock and property hereby immediately bequeathed to such survivor, or which she may take at the death of her sister" was to go to her surviving children, their heirs, &c.: *but if she left "no child living at her death, and shall leave a husband surviving her, then the husband shall have such a proportion of the said stock and property as the law gives of the wife's estate in case of intestacy, under the act of the legislature," and remainder to child or children of predeceased sister, if any, then living, "and if there be no child of her deceased sister, then the said remainder shall go to my legal representatives in fee simple."

C. died first, leaving a husband surviving but no children, and half of the property given to C. by the words above recited, passed to L., the surviving sister. Afterwards L. died without issue and left no husband surviving. Held—

That the property received by L. immediately from her father's estate under the residuary clause of his will, passed at L.'s death to the "legal representatives" of testator.

[2. Wills ⇐593.]

That the one-half of C.'s share of the stock and property, which passed to L. after C.'s death under the directions of testator's will, passed at L.'s death to testator's "legal representatives" under the terms of this will.

[3. Wills ⇐524.]

That "legal representatives," as used in this will, meant such persons as answered the description of legal representatives of testator at the time of the happening of the contingency that vested the estate; and therefore C. and L. having died before such vesting, their legatees and representatives were excluded.

By a clause in a will, an estate was devised in fee, but by a subsequent clause the same estate was devised for life. Held, that a life tenancy only was intended.

Before Reed, J., Charleston, March, 1875.

Stephen Shrewsbury died in 1815, leaving of force a last will, which was admitted to probate in the same year. That clause of his will which the court construes in this case, is set out in full in the Circuit decree and again in the opinion of the Chief Justice.

At the time of his death the testator left surviving him two daughters, Caroline O., (afterwards Mrs. Dickinson,) and Sarah Louisa, (afterwards Mrs. Dr. Moultrie,) and two brothers, Edward and Jeremiah, and one sister, Mary Rogers. Caroline O. Dickinson died before her husband, in 1833, without issue, and one-half of her property was transferred to her husband, and one-half to the trustees of her sister, Sarah Louisa Moultrie, under the will of her father and her marriage settlement. Sarah Louisa Moultrie survived her husband and died without issue in 1874, and leaving of force a last will and testament, whereby, after some trifling legacies, she gave her property to Mrs. Sarah Lee. Mrs. Lee claimed the property under the will of Mrs. *Moultrie, as Mrs. Moultrie's absolute property. Mrs. Dickinson's administrator claimed that the testator died intestate as to the remainder of that portion which passed immediately to Mrs. Moultrie under testator's will, after the determination of her life estate therein; and that such intestate remainder vested at testator's death in his two daughters.

Edward Shrewsbury, the brother, died before Mrs. Moultrie, and his children, who were alive at the death of Mrs. Moultrie, are the defendants, Edward C. Shrewsbury, Anna H. Smith and Elizabeth K. Adger. Mrs. Rogers died before Mrs. Moultrie, and her child, who survived Mrs. Moultree, is the defendant, Anna H. Brown. And the defendants, Edward C. Shrewsbury, Anna H. Smith, Elizabeth K. Adger and Anna H. Brown, claim to be the only "legal representatives" of testator.

Jeremiah Shrewsbury, the brother, had one daughter and one son; but all died before Mrs. Moultrie. This son and this daughter left issue who survived Mrs. Moultrie, but being grand nieces and nephews, are not parties in this action and have filed no claim.

The decree of the Circuit judge is as follows:

Decree.

Stephen Shrewsbury died in 1815, leaving of force his will, which contains the following residuary clause: "All the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, of what nature or kind soever and wheresoever the same may be, I give, devise and bequeath unto my executors, hereinafter named, or to such of them as shall qualify and act under this will, and to the survivor of them, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns forever, in trust, nevertheless, to sell and dispose of the same, except as hereinafter excepted, for cash or credit, and on such terms as they may deem best, and to invest the proceeds of such sale in stock of the United States, stock of this state, or any bank stock of this state, which said stock of the United States, stock of this state, or bank stock of any bank in this state, I give, devise and bequeath to my dearly beloved daughters, Louisa Shrewsbury and Caroline Shrewsbury, share and share alike, to *them and each of them during the term of their natural life, and from and after the death of either the said Louisa or Caroline, then if my daughter aforesaid first dying shall leave a child or children living at her death, I give, devise and bequeath her share of the stock aforesaid to such child or children, his, her or their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns forever, but if she shall have no child living at her death, but a husband surviving her, then my will is that her said husband shall have such a proportion thereof as the law gives of the wife's estate in case of intestacy, under the act of the legislature of this state, and the remainder I give to her sister, her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns forever.

"And it is further my will, that at the death of the survivor of my said daughters, Louisa and Caroline, the stock and property hereby immediately bequeathed to such survivor, or which she may take at the death of her sister, shall go to such child or children as she may leave living at her death, his, her, or their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns forever. But if she shall leave no child living at her death, and shall leave a husband surviving her, then the husband shall have such a proportion of the said stock and property as the law gives of the wife's estate in case of intestacy, under the act of the legislature, and the remainder shall go to the child or children of her deceased sister, if any be living at the death of my said daughter so surviving as aforesaid, his, her, or their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns forever, and if there be no child of her deceased sister, then the said remainder shall go to my legal representatives in fee simple.

"And I do hereby empower my executors, or such of them as shall qualify, to make good and sufficient titles to all purchasers of the property or estate sold under this will."

her sister. Sarah Louisa *married Dr. James Moultrie, in 1818, and, having survived him, died without issue in 1874. The property she took under the above residuary clause was settled on her on the terms of the will, and that which she took under her mother's settlement, on such terms as to give her an absolute estate in case she died without issue living at her death and surviving her husband. The part she derived from her sister is not embraced in the settlement.

At his death the testator left, also, two brothers and one sister. These died before Mrs. Moultrie, and their children (the nephews and nieces of the testator) who were alive at her death, claim the property derived by Mrs. Moultrie from her father, as the testator's legal representatives and next of kin at the death of Mrs. Moultrie, to the exclusion of Mrs. Moultrie's estate, and of the testator's great nephews and great nieces.

The executors of Dr. James Moultrie and his legatees are parties to the suit.

The life estates given by the will of Stephen Shrewsbury to his daughters, Louisa and Caroline, were to vest in remainder in the "legal representatives" of the testator on the happening of two contingencies as to each of said daughters, to wit, dying without issue and leaving a husband surviving them. With Caroline both these contingencies happened, and her share of the estate, therefore, became vested. On her death without issue, but leaving a husband surviving her, such portion of her estate as the statute of distributions gave him went to her husband, and the other part to her surviving sister, "her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns forever," under the will of her father, and following the statute of distributions.

With Louisa (Mrs. Moultrie) the case was different. She died without issue, but also without leaving a husband surviving her. Only one of the two contingencies, on which the estate given her for life by her father, would have vested in the remaindermen having happened, she took that portion of her estate derived immediately from him, not under the will, but as the portion of the estate which came to her as his heir-at-law and legal representative, her sister having died without leaving *issue surviving her. The other portion of her estate she took in fee from her sister, as before stated.

This construction creates an intestacy as to the portion of his estate which it was contended the testator gave by will to his surviving daughter for life, with remainder over; and yet the result is, as I take it, in perfect harmony with his intentions. He directs that if one of his daughters die without issue, but leaving a husband surviving her, the husband shall take such share of her estate as the statute gives him, and the remainder shall go to her surviving sister in fee simple forever. Both of these contingencies having happened to Caroline, her estate passed under her father's will. But the same contingencies as applicable to Mrs. Moultrie did not happen. She died, it is true, without issue surviving her, but she also died without leaving a husband surviving her. If her husband had survived her, both contingencies—and I hold both to be necessary—would have happened that were necessary to carry the estate over. Her husband would have taken the share to which he was entitled under the statute, and the residue would have gone to the legal representatives of the testator as the remaindermen under his will. This, I think it clear, is in accordance with the intentions of the testator. His purpose was to direct, unmistakably, what should go with her estate, if she left no child, but a husband surviving her. He intended the husband to take what the statute would give him—no more—and the balance, if the predeceased sister left no child, should return to his "legal representatives." Not referring to the probability that she might never marry, or marrying, that the husband might die before her, and making no further disposition of the estate, the inference is irresistible that he intended, if his last surviving daughter had neither child nor husband, to leave the estate in her hands, to be enjoyed and disposed of as she might elect. Hence, I hold that the estate of Mrs. Moultrie, at her death, passed under her will.

The above result, viz., that the testator's daughter and distributee-at-law shall not be disinherited of her portion of her father's estate, except by express provision of his will, or neces*sary implication; and that the absolute gift to her of the half of her sister's portion "shall not be divested, except on the happening of the precise event, or events [in this case her death without children, and with a husband surviving,] upon the happening of which the substituted gift was made by the testator to depend," (White v. Baker, 2 DeG., F. & J. 61,) is supported by numerous authorities, but I do not think it necessary to do more than refer to Fulham v. Wicket, Willes 309; 1 Jarman on Wills, 465; Notes 2 and 3, 750; 2 Jarman on Wills 741; Gordon v. Blackman, 1 Rich. Eq. 61; Crossby v. Smith, 3 Rich. Eq. 244; Harrison v. Foreman, 5 Ves. 209; Thornhill v. Hall, 2 Cl. & Fin. 35; Roper on Leg. 479, 481, 603, 609, 624; Lowry v. O'Bryan, 4 Rich. Eq. 262 [57 Am. Dec. 727]; Shaw v. Monefeldt, 6 Rich. Eq. 240; Ketchin v. Beaty, 5 Rich. Eq. 83. Any other result would have been making a new will for the testator, and that, too, when he has not acted "capriciously, without any intelligible motive contrary to the ordinary mode in which men in general act in similar cases," and when his language is "unambiguous," and does not admit of "two constructions." This is impossible. Gordon v. Gordon, L. R., 5 H. of L. 284; Hall v. Warren, 9 H. of L. Cas. 427, 428; Glover v. Adams, 11 Rich. Eq. 264.

The estate derived by Mrs. Sarah Louisa Moultrie from her mother, it is conceded, passed by her will, and it is so decreed.

Leave to apply for any order deemed necessary for the settlement of the estates of Dr. and Mrs. Moultrie is reserved.

From this decree, the defendants appealed upon the following grounds:

1. That Mrs. Moultrie at the death of her sister, Mrs. Dickinson, took nothing by the intestacy, either of her father or her sister, but the share of Mrs. Dickinson, at her death, passed under the will of Stephen Shrewsbury, one-half to her husband and the other half to Mrs. Moultrie, for such interest and estate therein as her father's will gave her.

2. That that portion of the testator's property which, under his said will, passed to Mrs. Moultrie at the death of her sister, was, by the terms of his said will, given to her for the same *estate, and subject to the same limitations over as that portion which she took under her father's will directly—as he declares in these words: "And it is further my will that at the death of the survivor of my said daughters, Louisa and Caroline, the stock and property hereby immediately bequeathed to such survivor, or which she may take at the death of her sister, shall go to such child or children," &c. That in accordance with this view, the share she took at the death of her sister was assigned to the trustees of her marriage settlement made upon the terms of her father's will.

3. That as to the whole property given by the testator to Mrs. Moultrie, it must have passed under the residuary clause to the legal representatives of the testator as a valid disposition of the residue, or the testator must have died thereof intestate at the time of his death, at which time Mrs. Dickinson was equally entitled with Mrs. Moultrie to every part of his estate whereof he died intestate, and therefore that the decree is inconsistent with itself in declaring that Mrs. Moultrie took the whole, whereas Mrs. Dickinson took one-half, which half must go to her administrator for the benefit of her legal representatives, of whom her husband, who survived her, was entitled to one-half of her estate.

4. That the ultimate remainder over of the residue of the testator's estate, took effect upon the death of Mrs. Moultrie without issue, the provision for the husband being only a provision for him if he survived her, but not a condition or contingency, upon which the ultimate gift over depended to take effect.

5. That these defendants, and these only, are the legal representatives as designated in the will, at the time Mrs. Moultrie died, and are entitled to take under the ultimate limitation of the will.

The appeal was heard by the Supreme Court, November Term, 1875. On the 20th of June, 1876, it was ordered to be re-argued, "so far as may be necessary for the proper determination of the following question, which covers one of the points raised in it. In the event the estate is to vest in his "legal representatives," and assuming that the said words are to be taken *and accepted in the sense of distributees under the statute, in the devise of this testator, who are to be comprehended in the term?

It was re-argued on February 15th, 1877. The changes soon after occurring in the personnel of the court made a third argument necessary, which was had at November Term, 1877, when it was argued in full upon all the points made in the case.

Messrs. McCrady & Son, Brewster & Burke, Augustine T. Smythe and Henry A. M. Smith, for appellants.

I. Is the limitation over to the legal representatives of the testator good?

The great rule of equity that overrides all considerations in the construction of wills, is to ascertain, first, the intent of the testator, and then to carry it into effect, if it be legally possible. In arriving at what a testator's intent was, it is sometimes important to know what his intent was not. It is submitted that the Circuit judge erred in holding that the testator "intended, if his last surviving daughter had neither child nor husband, to leave the estate in her hands to be enjoyed and disposed of as she might elect," and "that the estate of Mrs. Moultrie, at her death, passed under her will." Because—

First. It was testator's manifest intention here to make provision first for his daughters, then his grandchildren, if he should have any; failing these, for his nearest blood relations.

Second. The daughters are expressly given only a life estate; the gift, absolute in terms, to the surviving sister, being in the next clause reduced to a life estate.

Third. That while provision is made for the husband surviving either or both of his daughters, such provision is only a proviso, and in no way a condition affecting the devise over.

Fourth. That to hold the immaterial incident of the survivorship of the husband a condition precedent to the limitation over taking effect, will be to make the testator stultify himself, and to render his intentions of none effect.

Fifth. That the contingency of the husband's survivorship is a mere immaterial incident, affecting only the portion of the estate devised to them, and in no way a condition precedent to *the taking effect of the devise over to the testator's grandchildren, or next of kin. 1 Doug. 63; 1 Cowp. 40; 1 Durn. & East 346; (March, 1876,) Eng. L. R., 2 Ch. Div. 348.

Sixth. That the devise to the husbands, in case of their survivorship, makes the limitation over a conditional one, * * * but the contingency of such survivorship is not such a condition precedent as without which the devise fails. Moore 486; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 245; 1 Atk. 422. "The solid, substantial distinction is whether the testator meant it as a condition." Lord Loughborough in 1 Bro. C. C. 301; 5 Burr. 2703; Hutton 118; 3 Atk. 782.

When a devise is made after a preceding executory or contingent limitation, or is limited to take effect on a condition annexed to any preceding estate, if that preceding limitation or contingent estate never should arise or take effect, the remainder over will, nevertheless, take place, the first estate being considered only as a preceding limitation, and not as a preceding condition, to give effect to a subsequent limitation. This doctrine, as particularly applied to contingent remainders, is fully discussed by Mr. Fearne, in a former part of his work. See ch. I., § 10, p. 233. 1 Fearne on Remainders 508; 2 Strange 1092. Words of condition may be taken as words of limitation where there is a remainder over. 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 245, fol. 10; 1 Ves. 420; 2 Vern. 151; 2 Wils. 356; 1 Wils. 105; 1 Atk. 386; 12 Mod. 128; 1 Sir W. Bl. Rep. 638.

Seventh. That the substantial intention of the testator is to provide for his own blood relations, and in such cases the courts will disregard words that may apparently import a condition, provided the substantial intent of the testator be carried out. 4 DeG. & J. 194; 1 Fearne on Remainders 509.

Eighth. If the survivorship of the husband was a condition precedent to the taking effect of the limitations over, then the death of either daughter after her husband would cause an intestacy of her father's estate as to the portion of the stock devised to her for life, and the court will not so construe a residuary clause as to cause an intestacy. 2 Mer. 385; M. R. in 4 Ves. 400, 407; 4 DeG.

& J. 194; 1 Russ. 220, 10 Sim. 45; *Hall, V. C., in E. L. R., 2 Ch. Div. 348; 1 Bailey 103; 4 Rich. Eq. 265.

Ninth. To construe the will so as to allow Mrs. Moultrie to dispose of this property after the termination of her life estate therein, would be to disinherit the testator's next of kin, or "distributees-at-law," living at his daughter's death, and that shall not be done "except by express provision of his will or necessary implication." Circuit decree and cases cited. 1 Jar. 465. The position of Circuit decree and of respondents is, that Mrs. Moultrie took some interest which could only be "divested upon the happening of the precise event or events, upon the happening of which the substituted gift was made by the testator to depend." These are the words in which the rule is laid down in White v. Baker; but the rule requires three things to be found in the will. 1st. A gift vested by the terms of the will which may be defeated. 2d. A contingency of event or events to defeat it. 3d. A substituted gift, made to depend upon the happening of the event or events. There is no vested gift in Mrs. Moultrie. 1 Jarman on Wills 411, 412; 1 Hill Ch. 360. The cases relied on by respondents differ widely from the case here, in this: that the estates vested in the donees in this case were not absolute estates, to be curtailed or defeated, but life estates, to be followed by other estates and interests. In this case the legal representatives do not seek to defeat a vested interest; they claim that provision is made for them after the vested interests have ceased and not before. See language used by the judges in 1 B. & A. 137.

Tenth. As the property was in hands of trustees, after Mrs. Moultrie's death they held for the legal representatives of testator, so that she, being dead, could not be included. 6 Ves. 45; McM. Eq. 231.

II. Who are to be comprehended in the term "legal representatives?"

They are here to be understood in the sense of "next of kin," or "rather the persons taking the personal estate under the statute of distributions." 2 Jar. 39; 1 Coll. 6; 2 Beav.

70. The *context shows that the testator never meant to apply the words "legal representatives" to his daughters; they are applied only after his children and grandchildren, and daughters' husbands have been provided for, and they can only mean his collateral relations, living and to be ascertained at the time of his surviving daughter's death. 1 Desaus. 237; Bailey Eq. 517. The rules applicable to this subject are different according to the class to which the cases are referable.

In such cases the rule has been laid down, that where real property is limited over to a class after a prior life estate, although the remainder be contingent, yet the class shall be referred to the death of the testator, and that the circumstance that the life tenant was of that class at that time, shall not prevent him taking under the latter description. 3 Bro. C. C. 234; 3 East 278; 2 Myl. & K. 800; 4 S. C. 16; 2 Jarman on Wills 59. The working of this tendency is strikingly exemplified in the old rule of law, whereby a fee might be limited over on a fee in personalty, although not in realty.

(2) When the bequest is of personalty, but the limitation over is a simple vested remainder upon a life estate. In these cases, the subsequent estate being certain, must vest immediately upon the testator's death. 4 Bro. C. C. 207.

(3.) Where the bequest is of personalty, and the limitation over is contingent. Here, since the event on which the estate is to vest is contingent and uncertain, the vesting cannot take place until the contingency occurs on which the estate is to vest; and where there is a limitation over upon contingency to a class, the persons to take cannot be ascertained until the contingency happens. Jones v. Colbeck, 8 Ves. 38; Coop. Ch. R. 272; 3 Myl. & K. 232; 1 Ves., Sr., 111; 1 Bro. C. C. 293, and note; 3 Ves., Jr., 486; 13 Sim. 52; 13 Sim. 290; 2 Jarman on Wills 56; 3 DeG., F. & J. 113. Where the remainder upon a contingency is to persons "thereto entitled according to the statute of distributions," a reference to the statute prima facie refers to the period of testator's death. The words "legal personal representatives" are more flexible than the words "next of kin." 23 Beav. 169.

*Our state courts have adopted same rule. And where an estate is to be distributed at some future day amongst a class, and not to persons by name, all who can bring themselves within the description at the period of distribution are entitled to participate. 2 McC. Ch. 214; 2 McC. Ch. 440; 1 Hill Ch. 311; 9 Rich. Eq. 470; 4 Strob. Eq. 37; 4 Rich. Eq. 413. Glover v. Adams, 11 Rich. Eq. 264, although upon a deed, is cited as in harmony with other cases. The case of Seabrook v. Seabrook, 10 Rich. Eq. 495, is strongly relied on by respondents, but it has no application to present case, because—

(1.) It is a devise of realty.

(2.) The testator directed that realty should "revert to his estate" if contemplated limitation over did not take effect. Not so in this case. Again, Seabrook v. Seabrook was one of the most contested, and is still one of the most doubted cases that has ever been decided by our courts. See note of reporter, 10 Rich. Eq. 495.

The rule laid down in Cole v. Creyon is recognized throughout the courts of this country. 1 McCarter 32; 3 Jones Eq. 167; 15 N. Y. 322.

Mr. H. E. Young, for executor of Mrs. Moultrie and for Mrs. Lee.

I. The part originally given to Mrs. Moultrie she takes as next of kin to her father, and cannot be divested of it without the happening of the very case which the will declares shall disinherit her. This constitutes two-thirds of the present estate.

The heir cannot be disinherited, except by express devise or necessary implication. Willes 309; 2 Jarman on Wills 741. It prevails in America, and embraces personal as well as real estate. 1 Jarman on Wills 465, notes 2, 3; Redf. on Wills 433, 435; 6 Paige 612, and is fully sustained in our own cases. 1 Rich. Eq. 61; 4 Strobh. Eq. 203; 3 Rich. Eq. 244; 2 Desaus. 454.

II. The portion taken after her sister's death is given to Mrs. Moultrie absolutely, and can be divested only as above, viz., by *the happening of the very case which the will declares shall divest such absolute gift.

III. The very and only case in both instances under this will, is that she shall "have no child living at her death, and shall leave a husband surviving her." She left no child, but she also left no husband surviving. The rule, embracing above propositions, is thus expressed by Sir R. P. Arden (Lord Alvanley): "It is perfectly clear that where there are clear words of gift, giving a vested interest to parties, the court will never permit that absolute gift to be defeated, unless it is perfectly clear that the very case has happened in which it is declared that their interest shall not arise." 5 Ves. 209. See, too, 1 Jarman on Wills 639; 2 DeG., F. & J. 61. Instances of the above are found in 5 Ves. 209, supra; 9 Ves. 233; 3 Mod. 410; 4 Mod. 411; 1 Phil. 303; 2 Coll. 124; 2 Russ. & M. 577. See, too, 7 Sim. 86; 8 Beav. 578; 21 Beav. 31; 25 Beav. 417. A benefit bestowed in one part of an instrument by terms clear, unambiguous and liable to no doubt, can only be taken away by express and unambiguous words in another part. 2 Cl. & Fin. 35. See 1 Jarman on Wills 950, ss; Roper on Leg. 479, 481, 603, 619, 624; 2 Redf. on Wills 603, 649; 2 Williams on Ex'rs 1267–1274. Our cases sustain the rule. 4 Rich. Eq. 262; 5 Rich. Eq. 202; 6 Rich. Eq. 240. Particular attention is directed to our cases of Ketchin v. Beaty, 5 Rich. Eq. 83, and to Haynsworth v. Haynsworth, 12 Rich. Eq. 121, which are very like to the case before us, and also to the English case of Boyce v. Boyce, in 16 Sim. 476.

Appellants rely upon the following positions on these propositions:

(1.) That the clear intention of the testator was to benefit them as his next of kin. The best reply to this is in words of Lord Caines in L. R., 5 H. of L., p. 284. See, too, remarks of Lord Chancellor Campbell in 9 H. of L., at pp. 427, 428, and 1 Redf. on Wills, pp. 435, 436.

(2.) That it clearly was not intention of the testator to make a double provision for his daughter, Mrs. Moultrie, viz., for life, and then also in fee. This is conclusively answered by Glover *v. Adams, 11 Rich. Eq. 264. See 1 Strob. Eq. 114; Buist v. Dawes, and Hicks v. Pegues, 4 Rich. Eq. 413; 7 Rich. 311; 10 Rich. Eq. 561—all of which cases involved the construction of a will, and 14 Rich. 146, when a deed was under consideration.

(3.) That the word "remainder" in the clause, "the said remainder shall go to my legal representatives," is a technical word, and means the whole estate, except the few trifling legacies mentioned in the first part of the will. This is not the meaning, as its use throughout the clause shows: in the sentence quoted, it can only mean the remainder which sisters' children (if any) would have taken.

(4.) That the double contingency upon which the estate is to arise, applies to the estate limited to her husband and sister's children only, and not to that claimed by the nephews and nieces. Counsel then comments upon cases cited by appellants' counsel, and says: There is an essential difference between the cases cited by the appellants on this point and the present one.

(a.) In none of them was either the heir disinherited or a vested estate divested by the decrees.

(b.) They all refer to conditions precedent and not conditions subsequent. See 2 Williams on Ex'rs 1267, 1269, 1272.

(c.) Their inapplicability to present case is best shown by full quotation of rule as stated by Mr. Jarman. 1 Jarman on Wills 753.

(5.) That inasmuch as the testator was dealing with the "rest, residue and remainder" of his estate, it is clear that he did not intend to die intestate as to any part of his estate, and that therefore, such a construction as prevents an intestacy is absolutely required of the court. They rely on Booth v. Booth, Leake v. Robinson, Lett v. Randall, and Oddie v. Brown. But see 3 Bro. C. C. 474; 14 Beav. 461; 2 De G., M. & G. 110; 2 Redf. on Wills 616; 1 Roper on Leg. 363; 1 Hill Ch. 97; 1 Strob. Eq. 96.

IV. That the final bequest of the testator being to his "legal representatives in fee simple," in other words, to "his distrib*utees under the statute," even if the above propositions are not sustained, still the distributees which take, are those who were such at the testator's death, viz., his daughters, Mrs. Moultrie and Mrs. Dickinson.

This seems clear under the cases adjudged in this state. 1 Strob. Eq. 114; 4 Rich. Eq. 413; 7 Rich. Eq. 311; 10 Rich. Eq. 561; 1 Rich. Eq. 264; 14 Rich. Eq. 146. See, too, 2 Jarman on Wills 2; 2 Redf. on Wills 414; 1 Vern. 35; 2 Keen 230. The case in 13 Sim. 613, is strikingly apposite. In the United States, the rule seems to be generally adopted; 2 Wall., Jr., C. C. 368; 25 Ind. 63; 1 Jones (N. C.) 221; 7 Watts & Serg. 288.

The cases in this state thus establish beyond controversy that a devise or bequest to one's heirs, distributees-at-law or next of kin, is a gift to those who at the instant of the testator's death are his hœredes facti under the statute of distributions; in other words, to his next of kin, including husband or wife, as the case may be. In this particular case the next of kin and "distributees under the statute" of the testator, at his death, were his two daughters; and these only can take under the designation of legal representatives (distributees under the statute) in the clause under discussion; and, as said, Mrs. Dickinson has already had her half.

Appellants say that where there is a bequest to A, remainder to B, with limitation over upon contingency to a class, the class to take is to be ascertained at the time the estate vests. This is discussed by Mr. Jarman in his 2d volume, *52 and *53, and cases cited by appellants are reviewed and doubted at pp. 54–68. See, too, 2 Williams on Ex'rs 1123, and 16 Beav. 507. Three of appellants' cases deserve particular notice. Minter v. Wraith, 13 Sim., is an exception to the general rule, because of certain peculiar features therein. Cooper v. Denison, 13 Sim., is also a case very different from ours. These last two cases were regarded by Sir Lancelot Shadwell as exceptions from the general rule, as will be seen by reading his decree made only a year or so later in Urquhart v. Urquhart, 13 Sim. 613. Appellants' third case, Lees v. Massey, 3 DeG., F. & J., was decided because testator could not mean his only daughter by using the plural *word "relations," and by using the words "share and share alike." Lord Chancellor Campbell held that the general rule was well settled in Bullock v. Downs, 25 Beav. 55. This general rule is that "where there is a bequest to one for life, and after his decease to the testator's next of kin (by virtue of the statute of distributions,) the next of kin to take, are the persons who answer that description at the death of the testator." 9 H. of L. Cas. 12. In England there has been a long contest in this matter, which does not exist in this state. Next of kin, without further, does not there mean under statute of distributions, but the nearest in blood relationship—e. g., a child and a father—are equally near, and would take equally under such a gift. 10 Cl. & Fin. 215. Stephen Shrewsbury's will refers, at almost every step, to the statute of distributions and in this state "next of kin" means "next of kin under the statute," and never anything else. Bullock v. Downes, 9 H. of L. Cas. 1–31, is worthy of special notice. Appellant's position, that daughter, would not be called "legal representatives," seems inspired by remarks of Sir William Grant in Jones v. Colbeck, 8 Ves. 38; but see this case commented on in 2 Jarman on Wills *55.

Counsel for appellants shun Ketchin v. Beaty, Haynsworth v. Haynsworth, and Seabrook v. Seabrook. In not one of the cases cited by them, from Myers v. Myers down to Wessinger v. Hunt, is there a single word about gifts—by will or by deed—of personalty or of realty, to next of kin; and so they have no application. But Ketchin v. Beaty, 5 Rich. Eq., does apply, and is earnestly commended to the attention of the court.

V. Mrs. Dickinson having already, as distributee, received one-half of the entire estate, her next of kin cannot take a share of what is now the subject of contention. This is the corollary from the above. The bequest is to the testator's legal representatives or next of kin—his daughters—and, consequently, they take not under the will, but as in case of intestacy. 1 Wm. Bl. 187; 4 Kent 506–7; 10 Rich. Eq. 504; 4 S. C. 18.

Mrs. Dickinson can only take what she would have taken had there been no will—that is, one-half; and this she has already had. This half has, at her death, been again distributed, and as *her hœredes facti, her husband took half of her share and Mrs. Moultrie the other half. Can Mr. D.'s children by a second wife now claim more than he, in right of his wife, could claim at her death? The point seems too plain even for illustration.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, for the administrator of Mrs. Dickinson, made no claim to so much of testator's estate as was received by Mrs. Moultrie as survivor of her sister; but contended that in the one-half of the estate given immediately to Mrs. M. for life, there is a remainder undisposed of, as to which testator died intestate, and one-half of which descended under the statute to Mrs. D. The following authorities were relied on in support of this position; 1 Jarman on Wills 702; Amherst v. Lytton, heard in the House of Lords March 11th, 1729, quoted by Lord Hardwicke in 3 Atk. 286; 1 Rich. Eq. 61; 3 Rich. Eq. 244.

April 13th, 1878. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The question before us involves the construction of the will of Stephen Shrewsbury. The respondents have obtained a decree establishing their right on the ground of intestacy, as it regards that portion of the estate claimed by them, under the will of Mrs. Moultrie, a daughter of the testator. The appellants deny the existence of intestacy, contending that the provisions operate as a devise to them. The clauses of the will pertinent to the question are as follows: "I give, devise and bequeath to my dearly beloved daughters, Louisa Shrewsbury and Caroline Shrewsbury, share and share alike, to them and to each of them, during the term of their natural life, and from and after the decease of either the said Louisa or Caroline, then if my daughter aforesaid first dying shall leave a child or children living at her death, I give, devise and bequeath her share of the stock aforesaid to such child or children, his, her or their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns forever; but if she shall have no child or children living at her death, but a husband surviving her, then my will is that her said husband shall have such a proportion thereof as the law gives of the wife's estate in case of intestacy, under the legislature of this state; and the remainder *I give to her sister, her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns forever.

"And it is further my will, that at the death of the survivor of my said daughters, Louisa and Caroline, the stock and property hereby immediately bequeathed to such survivor, or which she may take at the death of her sister, shall go to such child or children as she may leave living at her death, his, her or their executors, administrators or assigns forever. But if she shall leave no child living at her death, and shall leave a husband surviving her, then the husband shall have such a proportion of the said stock and property as the law gives of the wife's estate in case of intestacy, under the act of the legislature, and the remainder shall go to the child or children of her deceased sister, if any be living at the death of my said daughter, so surviving as aforesaid, his, her or their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns forever; and if there be no child of her deceased sister, the said remainder shall go to my legal representatives in fee simple."

Louisa and Caroline survived the testator and took equal life estates. Caroline (Mrs. Dickinson) died before her sister without issue, and leaving surviving her a husband, who received, at her death, a proportional part of Caroline's share of the estate, according to the provisions of the will. The residue of Caroline's share went by way of remainder to Louisa (Mrs. Moultrie) as surviving sister. So far the undisputed objects of the will were accomplished.

The present controversy arises out of the fact that Mrs. Moultrie, the surviving life tenant, left, at her death, neither husband nor child. She left, however, a will, under which the respondents claim. The appellants are the children of the brother of the testator, and claim that they were, at the time of the death of Mrs. Moultrie, the persons entitled to take under the description of "my legal representatives," contained in that clause of the will that disposes of the remainder in fee after the life estate of the surviving daughter, on the contingencies of there being no child or husband.

The first question to be considered is, whether there is a devise of the remainder after the life estate of the surviving daughter, *on the contingency of there being living at that time neither child nor husband? If there is such a disposition of that remainder, then it will become necessary to fix the sense of the terms "my legal representatives," as those terms describe the persons who are to take such remainder, and it will be necessary to ascertain the nature and extent of the estate thus devised by way of remainder. These questions will be separately considered in the order stated.

Is there, then, a devise of the remainder after the life estate of the surviving daughter, that can take effect in the case of the death of such surviving daughter, without leaving living either a child or the descendants of a child or a husband?

This proposition is disputed by the respondents. They contend that the only devise by way of remainder, to take effect in the event of the death of the surviving daughter without issue, is made contingent on the further event of the survivorship of her husband. That no such contingency has happened, inasmuch as Mrs. Moultrie, such surviving daughter, left no husband living at her decease, consequently the remainder is undisposed of, so far as it regards the will, and must be disposed of under the statute of distributions.

The words of the will, as affecting such remainder, are as follows: "But if she shall leave no child living at her death, and shall leave a husband surviving her, then the husband shall have such proportion of the said stock and property as the law gives of the wife's estate in case of intestacy, under the act of the legislature, and the remainder shall go," &c.

The opposing constructions of the appellants and respondents have just this difference between them, that the respondents read this clause as intending nothing more than a devise contingent on the event of there being a husband living at the decease of the surviving daughter, while the appellants read it as intending a provision for continuing the estate in the lineage and family of the testator, saving merely that which, under the statute of distributions, would have been the rights of a surviving husband.

It may be conceded at once that it is not sufficient for the purposes of the appellants to merely interpret the language in question. A resort must be had to construction. The case expressed embraces a devise of something left—of the remainder *after something is taken out of it, viz., a provision for a surviving husband. If this expressed intent is not to be enlarged by anything whatever implied, then it must be assumed that the intention of the testator in framing these expressions was influenced by one or the other of two considerations; either that the case of his surviving daughter's death without leaving living a husband, could not or would not arise, or in case of happening, that there is no such surviving husband, there would be neither necessity or propriety for making the provision for the family intended on the event of there being a husband surviving.

If such an intention is reasonable in itself and consistent with the general provisions of the will, then the language of the devise ought to stand as we find it, and its expressed intent ought to prevail without yielding to enlargement on the principles of construction.

On the other hand, if such intention is not reasonable or consistent with the general scope of the testator's intentions, as elsewhere expressed or necessarily to be implied, then it is proper to resort to construction to find the intention of the testator in an enlarged reading of his language.

It is clear that such an intent as that just noticed cannot reasonably, or consistently with his known intentions as disclosed by the will, be ascribed to the testator. He could not have supposed the case of his surviving daughter's death without leaving a husband living, as unlikely to occur.

The survivorship of a wife, as it regards her husband, is an ordinary contingency that must be assumed to have been, as such, before the mind of the testator. Then the testator is brought into the position of contemplating the death of both of his daughters, the first dying leaving children, the survivor dying without issue.

Now, on the death of the survivor of his daughters without child, he wishes that part of the estate devised to her to pass to the children of his sister first dying, but contemplating the possibility of such surviving daughter dying without leaving surviving a husband, he determines that the provision made for his grandchildren, the children of his daughter first dying, shall depend wholly on the contingency of there being such a surviving *husband of his daughter last dying, so that if there shall be no such husband the grandchildren shall not take under such devise. Such a state of mind on the part of a testator contradicts experience and reason and cannot be assumed. It follows, therefore, that we must resort to construction in order to find the intent of the testator in an enlarged sense of the terms employed by him.

To what extent, then, can the words employed yield, without denying to them their proper force and effect, and what is the force of the considerations that compel the enlargement of their import?

The construction contended for by the appellants is not contradictory of anything expressed in the language under consideration. It leaves in full force the expressions of the devise as it regards the contingencies uppermost in the mind of the testator, as evinced by his express language. Nor does that construction seek to undo the force of language expressly, or by necessary implication, creating a contingency, and making subsequent limitations dependent on it. The devise to the children of the daughter first dying, in the event of the death of the surviving daughter without issue, is necessarily contingent, that contingency being a death without issue, an event possible, but uncertain. This contingency is expressly created, and is signified by the expressive words "but" and "if."

But that the provision made for the children of the daughter first dying should be subject to the further contingency that there should be living, at the death of the surviving daughter, a husband of that daughter, so that if no such husband shall be in being at that time, the limitation to them should be defeated, is not declared as any part of the actual intention of the testator, and if found to exist must be inferred from the mere fact that the devise is silent as to what shall take place if that contingency does not arise.

It is said, however, that the events of the death of the surviving daughter without issue living and that of a husband surviving her, are coupled together by the conjunction "and," and both subjected together to the intention to create a contingency expressed under the words "but" and "if." Assuming such to be the proper import of the terms, still, would that which is in *terms made to devisal upon such contingency, be altered or in any way impaired under the construction contended for by the appellants? Certainly it would not.

What was intended by the interposition of this contingency, and all that was intended, was to diminish the quantum of the remainder by taking from it a husband's portion, what follows, to wit, the devise to the children of the sister first dying, is of that which remains after the intention leading to the creation of the contingency is fully satisfied. In other words, the full force and effect of what is intended by the contingency, viewed in the light contended for by the respondents, is accomplished without necessarily affecting the limitations to the issue of the daughter first dying to any greater extent than diminishing the amount and value of the thing so limited.

But it is said that all the provision made for children of the daughter first dying, is that which remains after the events intended by the contingency have happened, and the direct purpose of creating the contingency is satisfied, namely a portion set apart for a husband, and that as this event has not happened they take nothing.

The question, whether words can be found sufficient to carry an intention, that the estate shall go to the children of the daughter first dying, even though the events that are contemplated by the contingency never occur, will be considered in another connection; at present the definite object is to show, as already stated, that the construction contended for by the appellants, will not undo the force of language expressly or by necessary implication creating a contingency, and making subsequent limitations dependent upon it.

The true question is, are those words in the will sufficient to disclose, with reasonable certainty, an intention that in the event that the surviving daughter should die without issue or husband, and there be living children of the sister first dying, that such children should take the estate? Although there were, in fact, no children of the daughter first dying living at the death of the surviving daughter, yet the provisions made for such children, if any there should be, is the proper test of intentions of the testator, as it regards the objects of his bounty standing next in *precedence to his daughters. It was intended as a provision for grandchildren. It was not for selected individuals, but for all his grandchildren. The devise to "legal representatives," contingent on the failure of lineal descendants, could not have so attracted the attention of the testator, as the provision made for his grandchildren. The last embraced the greater object of keeping his estate in the line of descent and of his strongest affections, the other the subordinate object of keeping it within the family. To test the mind of the testator, we must consider it in its connection with events which, at the time of settling the provision for his immediate family, were considered by him as most important, and not with the actual events that subsequently occurred. It is in this light that we refer to the effect of the various constructions contended for, upon the provisions intended for the children of the daughter first dying.

We must here ascertain the leading objects of the will. It is clear that the testator had it in mind that his estate should go in the direct line of descent as far as possible and without diminution, except to meet what he deemed to be the reasonable demands of any surviving husband of his daughters. Also, that, should there be a failure of descendants at the death of his surviving daughter, his estate should go to his collateral representatives, still keeping it within his family. He further intended that his children should stand on terms of equality as it regarded each other, and that his grandchildren should participate as representatives of their parents in the rule of equality applied to their parents. These conclusions, as to the intention of the testator, are apparent, and require no particular reference for their elucidation.

The particular object of the immediate devise under consideration, is next to be sought. It is clear that he intended, as a means of securing the general objects just stated, that if either daughter died without issue, the estate should go to the other daughter, or, if deceased, to her children, if any she had; and that, should there be a failure of descendants in the direct line at the death of the surviving daughter, the estate should go to the collateral line in the order prescribed by the statute of distributions. He also intended that a provision for the surviving husbands of *his daughters should be separated from his estate from time to time, as might be necessary.

To arrive at the results just stated, it is only necessary to read the devise with the idea in mind that equality was intended between his daughters. Equality is favored by law and will be assumed on principles of natural equity, unless there are expressions tending to show an opposite intent on the part of the testator. In the present case, all that is expressed favors the idea that strict equality was the rule intended.

The devise must be read with these objects in view, and so reading it there can be little doubt as to the actual intention of the testator. The opposite constructions contended for correspond to two theories of the intention expressed in the devise in question. According to the one, the language of the devise covers a single disposition, subject to defined contingencies, so that nothing can flow from such disposition except through events satisfying the intention of such contingencies.

According to the other theory, the language of the devise covers two distinct intentions and dispositions, namely, a provision for grandchildren, dependent only on the condition of the death of a daughter without issue, and a provision for a surviving husband dependent on the further event of the survivorship of such husband as it regards his wife. The last named is the proposition of the appellants.

The order and sequence of the language of the devise favor the first reading, while the nature of the subject and the declared intentions of the testator support the last.

The primary sense of the words, "and the remainder shall," &c., would limit the thing intended so to go, to that which remained of the estate after taking therefrom a husband's portion. But this conclusion depends wholly on the force of the conjunction "and" preceding "the remainder." This is apparent, if the devise is read by simply omitting the word "and," and enclosing in parentheses that portion of the sentence which is assumed to relate specially to the case of a surviving husband. It would then read as follows: "But if she shall leave no child living at her death (and shall leave a husband surviving her, then the husband shall have such a proportion of the said stock *and property as the law gives of the wife's estate in case of intestacy, under the act of legislature,) the remainder shall go to the child or children of her deceased sister," &c. Omitting next the matter enclosed in parentheses, and it would read as follows: "But if she shall leave no child living at her death, the remainder shall go," &c. What remainder was intended is disclosed by the sentence of the will immediately preceding that above recited.

The whole question, as a grammatical question, is brought within these narrow limits: Is the force of the word "and" such as to defeat the manifest intention and produce a case of intestacy?

If the word in question had been used in an indisputable sense, it could find no sanction in the adjudicated cases, and the recognized principles of construction for an influence destructive of the scheme in the mind of the testator, and tending to take the estate out of his family, contrary to his clear intent. But "and" in the present case simply serves to connect successive dispositions in forming parts of a whole. In this respect it performs an office of no real importance; for by indicating, as has been done, that portion that was intended as parenthetical, the connection of the sentence is complete without the use of that word. Thus it appears that no insuperable grammatical difficulty precludes the application of the construction that comports best with the mind and objects of the testator, as indicated by the general outline of his purposes. That which really points the primary and uncorrected sense already referred to, is the connection of the words "and the remainder," for, taken together, they seem to point to a sequence between the provisions relating to a surviving husband and the provisions that follow in behalf of grandchildren. But it is a fair inquiry whether that apparent intention is real or accidental, and the fact that it is a reading that assumes the interest of a surviving husband of a daughter to stand in the mind of a grandparent before that of a grandchild, precludes the supposition that it was other than accidental.

It is less bold to assume that the ordinary flow of thought in the mind of the testator was disturbed, than that the course of *nature, as impressed upon the affections, was inverted in so unusual a manner.

It must be concluded, then, that the testator intended a provision for the children of his daughter first dying, in the event of the death of his surviving daughter, without regard to whether she did or did not leave a husband surviving her.

The very learned argument addressed to us in support of the proposition that a double contingency was intended, fails, because too exclusively resting on the nature of the expressions used, and unsupported by the nature of the subject and the general and particular end in the view and mind of the testator.

It will not be necessary to notice the various cases cited bearing on the points discussed, for the difficulties that were overcome in those cases, in order to reach the mind of the testator, do not occur in the present case.

Statham v. Bell, 1 Cowp. 40, will alone be noticed. In that case the devise in terms depended on a contingency that never happened, and yet, in that case, although no general words of the will are referred to as affording ground for enlarging the construction of the words of the devise, yet it did so enlarge them as to take the estate away from the heir-at-law and confer it upon the testator's wife, in conformity to the assumed intention of the testator.

In view of that case, it is not difficult to determine the present question, in which there are no words disclosing a more general intent than that declared by the particular limitations in question, and in which the effect of enlarging the sense of the devise is to continue the estate in the hands of the family of the testator, and to prevent its passing to one that must be assumed to be a stranger to his blood.

At the death of Mrs. Moultrie, the survivor of the daughters, without issue, there were no persons who could take under the devise to the children of Mrs. Dickinson, the daughter first dying. In that case the devise to the testator's "legal representatives in fee simple" became operative. Who are the persons entitled to take under this description?

At this point a question arises, whether the testator intended, by the expression "my legal representatives," such persons of the *class entitled under the statute of distributions to take, who should be living at the death of the daughter last dying.

It is contended that no such intention existed or could be operative, but that the effect of this devise is to cast the estate on those who, at the death of the testator, were entitled to take under the statute, and upon their representatives, assigns or devisees. It is under this aspect of the case that the devisee of Mrs. Moultrie now claims the estate.

The question just stated is one of intention alone, and to be gathered from the whole will. The language employed to describe the persons intended to take is indecisive, and resort must be had to the scheme of the will to render its force determinate. The key of its interpretation lies in an intention already referred to, and which, more particularly stated, is this: After the direct line of descent was exhausted, during the lifetime of the two daughters, the estate should go to the collateral line. If the estate can pass under the will of Mrs. Moultrie, then the succession of the collateral line is defeated. This clearly is contradictory of the testator's intent. The only mode of reading the language of this devise so as to preserve the intention of the testator, is to limit the devise, &c., to "legal representatives," to such as were in being at the death of the daughter last dying. It is clear that the testator referred to the statute of distributions solely for the purpose of describing the class of persons to whom he intended his estate to go, and the relative order of succession as among that class; that in conferring a contingent remainder upon individuals of that class, he intended to select as his devisees such as should appertain to that class at the time the contingency happened that should vest the estate.

This would exclude persons coming in as devisees of a person entitled to the appellation "legal representatives," but who died before the happening of the contingency that vested the estate. It would exclude the devisee and representatives of Mrs. Moultrie, because survivorship and the happening of the contingency must occur, whereas the death of Mrs. Moultrie was the very event on which the future estate to "legal representatives" depended.

It follows that at the death of Mrs. Moultrie the appellants *were the persons entitled to take under the devise to "legal representatives."

The next question is, what was the nature and extent of the estate that passed under the devise to legal representatives?

There can be no doubt on this point, as the language of the will is specific and clear. The thing devised is described under the words "stock and property." The devise in question is preceded by a statement of what is intended to be disposed of in the event of the death of the daughter last dying, namely, "the stock and property hereby immediately bequeathed to such survivor, or which she may take at the death of her sister."

It is true that by a previous clause of the will, that which the surviving daughter should take on the death of her sister without issue, was given by words importing a fee, but the subsequent clauses of the will, in terms, reduce that estate to a life tenancy. It follows, then, that what remained of the estate of her father, derived through his will in the hands of Mrs. Moultrie at her decease, passed under the will to the appellants, as devisees under the testator's will, designated by the description "my legal representatives."

The judgment must be set aside and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court for a judgment in conformity with the foregoing conclusions of this court.

Decree reversed.

3. Distinction drawn between this case and Mathews v. Heyward, 2 S. C. 239.

Before Ellis G. Graydon, Esq., Presiding Judge by special appointment, Abbeville, September Term, 1877.

John M. Mackay, Sr., of New York, contracted with James N. Cochran for the purchase of some lands and mills in Abbeville county, for the price of $14,250, part of which was paid in cash and balance secured by bond and mortgage. By direction of said Mackay, the deed was made to William C. Barrett, trustee of Mrs. Jane M. Mackay, who was wife of John M. Mackay, Sr., and the bond and mortgage were executed by William C. Barrett, trustee of Mrs. Mackay. Cochran had no notice that Barrett was trustee of Mrs. Mackay, beyond the execution of these papers. Subsequently, Barrett brought his action in Abbeville against Cochran, to have the bond and mortgage reformed, and the amount thereby secured reduced, upon the ground of fraud and misrepresentation. Cochran answered, denied all fraud, &c., and prayed a foreclosure. After judgment of foreclosure was had, John M. Mackay, Jr., filed his petition, alleging that the payment on the land had been made with moneys of his mother, and that he was her sole heir-at-law, she having died since the execution of the deed to Barrett, trustee; and that petitioner was, therefore, the owner of the land, the real party in interest, and a necessary party to the proper determination of the case. This petition was refused by the Circuit judge, but on appeal to the Supreme Court was granted. See 8 S. C. 48. John M. Mackay, Jr., was then made a party defendant by amended pleadings served in behalf of Cochran.

Mackay, Jr., answered this amended pleading, of which answer only the first and second sections relate to matters involved in the appeal. They are as follows:

1. That on or about the —— day of March,

1869, Mrs. John *M. Mackay, the mother of this defendant, was seized and possessed, in her own right, of certain real and personal property, and particularly was the possessor of $7000 in money, which said money, on or about the said date, she delivered to the plaintiff herein, in trust, to invest the same in her name, and for her sole use, benefit and behoof, at such time or times and in such manner as she should direct.

2. That subsequently thereto, and on or about the 5th day of April, 1869, said Barrett, as defendant is informed and believes, made an agreement with the defendant, James N. Cochran, to purchase of said Cochran the lands and premises in the complaint mentioned, in which agreement said Barrett assumed and pretended to act as the trustee of said Jane M. Mackay; and that thereupon a deed of conveyance of said premises was executed and delivered by said defendant, James N. Cochran, to said William C. Barrett, as trustee of said Jane M. Mackay, and simultaneously therewith, or as the consideration therefor, said plaintiff assuming to act as such trustee, but without the knowledge or authority of said Jane M. Mackay, paid to the said defendant, Cochran, a portion of the said trust fund, amounting to $6660, as this defendant is informed and believes, and also in the same character, subsequently thereto, executed and delivered the bond and mortgage mentioned in the complaint herein.

To these allegations Cochran replied as follows:

1. That this defendant is informed and believes there was no prior trust in regard to the money paid in part for the purchase of Douglass mills.

John M. Mackay, Sr., purchased the land for himself and with his own money, and directed the deed to be made to Barrett, trustee for Mrs. Jane M. Mackay, as a donation from her husband, as this defendant was led to believe.

2. That if there was a parol trust, such as alleged, in New York, where the parties resided, such trust was not in writing, not recorded, was kept secret and entirely unknown to James N. Cochran, who was informed by John M. Mackay, Sr., who made the contract of purchase, that the purchase was for himself, and not a doubt was suggested that the money with which he purchased was his own.

*3. This defendant and John M. Mackay closed the contract in South Carolina, in February, 1869, and at the instance of John M. Mackay, Sr., titles were made to and mortgage simultaneously executed as part of the same transaction by William C. Barrett, "trustee for Mrs. Jane M. Mackay," April 7th, 1869. These papers were executed in the city of New York, where the parties resided, and both Mrs. Mackay and John M. Mackay, Jr., wife and son of John M. Mackey, Sr., as this defendant knows, were fully informed of the whole agreement and execution of the papers, and approved the whole matter.

4. That if a parol trust, such as alleged, existed in New York, John M. Mackay, Sr., was the agent of all the parties, the trustee of W. C. Barrett, and also of his wife, Jane M. Mackay, and his son, John M. Mackay, Jr.; and this defendant knows that they approved the purchase when made by him, and kept possession of the land, through said agent, until the land was about being sold to pay the purchase money, March 30th, 1875, when John M. Mackay, Sr., procured the petition in re to be filed in the name of his son, John M. Mackay, Jr.

Neither the petition nor his answer in this case, was sworn to by John M. Mackay, Jr., and this defendant charges that he did not swear to his answer, for the reason that the facts stated are untrue.

The questions at issue were referred to A. Burt, Esq., referee. Cochran introduced testimony, but Mackay, Jr., did not offer any. The referee, in his report, made the following findings of fact, inter alia:

1. That the treaty for the purchase of the lands in controversy was conducted by John M. Mackay, Sr., and James N. Cochran, the vendor, without any disclosure or intimation that the said Mackay was an agent, or that the purchase was made for another.

2. That the $500 paid by Mackay to Cochran to bind the bargain, and the cash payment made when the deed of conveyance was executed to Barrett, were not the money of Jane M. Mackay in the hands of John M. Mackay, Sr., or of William C. Barrett.

3. That neither Cochran or his wife, at any time before or after the purchase, until proceedings were instituted by John M. *Mackay, Jr., the defendant had notice or information that the cash payment of the purchase money was of the separate estate of Jane M. Mackay or funds of hers, to be invested by her husband, John M. Mackay, or William C. Barrett.

4. That the deed of conveyance is made to William C. Barrett, trustee of Jane M. Mackay, and that no trust for her, or for another, is declared in the deed.

Northrop, Justice, held court at Abbeville, September Term, 1877. Having been of counsel in this cause, Ellis J. Graydon, Esq., was commissioned specially to hear and determine the case. The referee's report was confirmed by Mr. Graydon, and a sale of the mortgaged premises was ordered.

Mackay, Jr., then gave notice of appeal to this court.

Mr. Ed. J. Maxwell, for appellant.

Mr. S. McGowan, for respondent, Cochran.

May 21st, 1878. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. The facts of this case are so fully and clearly stated in the report of the referee, that it is only necessary to advert to the precise question raised by this appeal. The fundamental allegation upon which this appeal is based is, that funds used to make the cash payment on the land mortgaged, were trust funds. It was incumbent upon the appellant to establish this allegation by proof, and this he has wholly failed to do, while on the other hand the testimony adduced by the respondent goes far to show the contrary. The referee having found the fact to be that the funds so used were not trust funds, and such finding having been confirmed by the decision of the Circuit judge, under the well-established rule of this court, it will be regarded as conclusive, unless it is without any evidence to sustain it, or is against the manifest weight of the evidence. So far from this being the case, it is very obvious, from the most casual reading of the testimony, that the finding of the referee is fully supported by the evidence.

It is argued, however, that while there was no evidence introduced in the usual way to establish this essential allegation on *the part of the appellant, yet that, inasmuch as such allegation was distinctly made in the answer of appellant, setting up a counter claim, and not denied in the reply filed by the respondent, Cochran, it must be taken as admitted. This argument rests upon two assumptions. 1st. That the portion of the answer in which this allegation was made, sets up a counter claim. 2d. That such allegation is not properly denied in the reply. It may admit of very serious doubt whether such portion of the appellant's answer can be regarded as setting up a counter claim.

It is manifest that the appellant could not have so intended it at the time the answer was prepared, for, after stating in the first five paragraphs the facts upon which he relied as constituting his defence, growing out of the assumption of the trust character of the funds used in making the cash payment on the land, he proceeds in the sixth paragraph to say: "This defendant further alleges, by way of counter claim," certain facts upon which he bases a charge of fraud, of which not a tittle of evidence was offered, and which was, therefore, very properly abandoned; and in the seventh paragraph he says: "That as a further counter claim," &c., setting up a misrepresentation in the quantity of the land sold, which was likewise abandoned. This mode of setting up defences was well calculated to induce the respondent, Cochran, to suppose that the appellant did not regard the allegations contained in the first five paragraphs of his answer as setting up a counter claim, for, when he sets up further defences of this character in the sixth and seventh paragraphs of his answer, he distinctly says that he sets up such defences by way of counter claim, plainly implying that his first defence was not of that character. Hence, we think that the appellant must be regarded as not intending the first five paragraphs of his answer as a counter claim, as, otherwise, the conclusion would be that he intended to mislead the respondent. But as we are satisfied that, even though the defence set up in the first five paragraphs of the answer be regarded as a counter claim, the allegations upon which such defence rests are sufficiently denied by the reply, we deem it unnecessary to enter upon the inquiry whether such defence can properly be regarded as a counter claim.

The appellant, for the purpose of showing that the funds used *in making the cash payment on the land were trust funds, relies also upon the fact that the land was conveyed to W. C. Barrett as trustee, and the mortgage given by him in that character. No copy of the deed or mortgage is set out in the "case" presented here, but on the argument we were referred to the "case" presented on a former hearing of this cause, when it came up in one of its earlier stages as Ex parte John M. Mackay, Jr.; In re W. C. Barrett, Trustee, v. James N. Cochran, where the deed and mortgage are set out. The deed was to W. C. Barrett, trustee of Mrs. Jane M. Mackay, and not to him as such trustee, and the mortgage was given in the same way. No trusts whatever are declared or recited, and under the usual rule the words "trustee, &c.," appended to Barrett's name, might be regarded as mere descriptio personæ. It is true that in that part of the mortgage where the condition of the bond is recited, these words are used: "Conditioned for the payment of seven thousand six hundred and three dollars, out of the estate which may be held by me as such trustee," &c. These words, so far from going to show that any such trust estate previously existed, tend to show exactly the contrary. And, as was held by this court on the former hearing of this cause under the title above stated, it differs in this respect from the case of Mathews v. Heyward, 2 S. C. 239. For even if the addition of the word "trustee" to the name of Barrett should be regarded as sufficient to create a trust, this would be no evidence of the previous existence of such trust, as it might then, for the first time, have been raised; and such would be the natural inference if, as in the case now before the court, there was no evidence that such trust had previously existed. This inference is strengthened by the words used in reciting the condition of the bond, which are quoted above; the words "may be held," implying that no such estate was then held by the trustee.

The appellant having failed to establish the allegation upon which this whole appeal rests—in fact, having offered no evidence whatever to sustain it—can take nothing by his appeal.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

[This case is also cited and affirmed in Wilson v. Kelly, 21 S. C. 535.]

Before Northrop, J., Newberry, October, 1876.

By order of the Court of Common Pleas for Newberry county, all issues in this cause were referred to Thomas Thomson, Esq., whose report fully states all the facts of the case. It is as follows:

Daniel Hughey, late of the county of Newberry, died intestate on September 22d, 1868. His heirs-at-law and distributees are his widow, (the plaintiff,) who was his second wife, his daugh*ter, Effie W. Eichelberger, wife of William A. Eichelberger, of Winston county, State of Mississippi, and Job L. Hughey, a son of the plaintiff and a minor. Effie W. Eichelberger is a child by intestate's marriage with Mrs. Ruff, who was a widow.

On the 15th day of October, A. D. 1868, administration of the personal estate of the intestate was granted by the judge of the Court of Probate to the plaintiff. It is affirmed, or conceded by all parties, that the personal estate is ample for payment of debts.

William H. Eichelberger and Effie, his wife, who have for many years resided in the State of Mississippi, came, soon after intestate's death, to this state. On the 3d day of November, A. D. 1868, they filed a petition in the Court of Probate of Newberry county, praying partition of the lands of Daniel Hughey, deceased, and also of such personalty as could be divided—making as parties to the proceeding Mary A. Hughey and Job L. Hughey, alleged to be a minor about fourteen years of age.

Mary A. Hughey, on the 14th day of the same month, (November,) filed her answer in the Court of Probate and assented generally to the statements of the petition, but stated that the intestate in his lifetime had made considerable advancements in money, to wit, the sum of $3000, in A. D. 1854, to Effie W. Eichelberger, and also, to the best recollection of the defendant, (Mary A. Hughey,) five slaves. It was suggested in her answer, as a mode to equalize the shares between Job L. Hughey and Effie W. Eichelberger, that the alleged advancements should be a charge upon the land to be allotted to the latter.

Job L. Hughey, by Thomas M. Lake, his guardian ad litem, filed his answer the same day, (November 14th,) assenting to partition, but setting forth fully the alleged advancements to his sister, Effie W., and claiming they should constitute a charge on his sister's part of the real estate. Under these proceedings, John T. Peterson, Esq., judge of the Court of Probate, issued a writ for the partition of the lands. On the 7th day of December, A. D. 1868, the commissioners made return of the writ, dividing both tracts of land into several parcels, recommending a partition (but not compulsory) between the parties, or a sale. On the subject of advancements the commissioners were silent.

*This return, it seems, was never confirmed.

William H. Eichelberger and Effie W., his wife, say they objected to the partition of the Sligh tract on the day the commissioners came on the land.

Mary A. Hughey, in the bill subsequently filed by her, alleges that William H. Eichelberger and wife obtained leave to amend their petition by alleging that four hundred and one and a half acres of the tract of land lying in Newberry county belonged to the separate estate of the said Effie W., by a deed made by Daniel Hughey, in his lifetime, to William J. Alston, as trustee; and that because of said amendment the judge of the court declined to entertain jurisdiction in the premises.

After the lapse of about one year, Mary A. Hughey, in turn, became a plaintiff, filed her bill in the court of equity for partition, on the 15th day of December, A. D. 1869, and, in addition to the heirs-at-law of her deceased husband, made David Murphy, John Murphy and Cuffy Tom Alston parties to the proceeding. Besides the questions in the pleadings in the Court of Probate, and restated in her bill, she charged that the title of Effie W. Eichelberger to the four hundred and one and a half acres of land was pretensive and unfounded, should be investigated and set aside by the court, and prayed partition.

William H. Eichelberger and wife filed their answer on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1870. They claimed the tract of four hundred and one and a half acres as being held in trust for Effie W. Eichelberger under a deed of which they alleged the consideration to be her interest in a part of the land described in the bill, which had belonged to her mother when she was married to the intestate.

On April 23d, 1872, Job L. Hughey, by his guardian ad litem, James F. Glenn, filed his answer, restating briefly his rights as heretofore set forth.

When the bill was filed, the interests of David Murphy, and of others, under leases or agreements, were existing and may have stood in the way of complete partition.

These rights, whether valid or otherwise, have ended by their own terms, and are no hindrance now. The referee regards the adjustment of these interests as matters between the plaintiff and *the parties having had the use and occupation of the land, or for account under this proceeding when full information can be given of the state of such accounts.

The first subject which presents itself for consideration is the deed from Daniel Hughey to William J. Alston, trustee, and, if valid, its effect upon the rights of the parties.

On Friday morning, April 26th, 1872, it was agreed—Messrs. Baxter, Fair, Pope and Jones being present—that the deed of trust from Daniel Hughey to William J. Alston, trustee, and three deeds executed in Mississippi, viz., one from James Liddell and Francis Liddell, his wife, to P. A. Eichelberger, trustee for Effie W. Eichelberger, and two deeds from Joab Liddell and Anna Liddell, his wife, to P. A. Eichelberger, trustee for Effie W. Eichelberger, should be regarded proved, as to their formal execution, without further proof. The referee did not understand the agreement to embrace the constitution or effect of the deeds. This mutual concession, not of rights, but of form, renders unnecessary the consideration of some technicalities connected with these papers.

William H. Eichelberger was the owner of lands in Newberry county, known as the Lyles (and Heller) tract, (or tracts) for which he paid, as he states, the sum of $5050. He was the owner of this land before his marriage with his wife, Effie W., and also at the time of his marriage. It appears he was in debt, and the land was sold by the sheriff and purchased by George Eichelberger, who wished to purchase it cheaply, with intent to befriend William H. Eichelberger. Under some arrangement William H. Eichelberger held an occupancy or use of this land for life. Daniel Hughey wished to purchase the land, and through the agency of W. H. Eichelberger became the owner of the whole estate, wife's dower excepted. According to Mr. Hope's testimony this transaction was at the instance of Mr. Hughey, and occurred about A. D. 1847 or 1848.

From the Lyles land W. H. Eichelberger and wife moved at the instance of D. Hughey to lands in Fairfield, known as the Thornton land. Effie W. Eichelberger testifies the land was once owned by her mother. William H. Eichelberger made improvements on the Thornton land whilst it was in his pos*session to the value of $500. This possession must have been brief, for again, according to the testimony of Mr. Hope, W. H. Eichelberger and wife, at the instance of Daniel Hughey, moved from the Fairfield land to the Sligh tract, in Newberry county.

At some period of time, not distant from their removal to the Sligh land, Daniel Hughey made the deed of trust to William J. Alston for the benefit of Effie W. Eichelberger and her issue surviving. The deed bears date the 5th day of February, A. D. 1850, and was recorded in the secretary of state's office the 3d day of May, A. D. 1850.

After this deed was made, houses were built and other improvements made upon the Sligh land of the value of $1500. W. H. Eichelberger testifies the improvements were by the labor of the slaves of his wife, Effie, and through her means.

Another removal awaited William H. Eichelberger and his wife, which was from the Sligh land to Winston county, State of Mississippi. This removal was commenced from Newberry county about the beginning of November, A. D. 1854, and terminated in Mississippi about the 11th day of December of same year.

The trust deed by its terms retains the land in the power of the grantor. He reserved the land, or so much as he pleased, for his own use. If he sold, the trustee was to convey according to his sale and reinsert as he directed. He retained power to revoke the deed by his own deed or will. He gave Effie W. Eichelberger a life interest. He could permit her to remain on the Sligh land for such time as he wished and again resume possession of it. During his lifetime Daniel Hughey could, by an exercise of his reserved power, have destroyed the interest of his daughter. Even when menaced by a letter from Mississippi claiming the land he forbore to exercise his power, strengthening the statement of P. A. Eichelberger at the parting in A. D. 1854, that Effie would get the land after his death.

The referee is of opinion that the deed contained a gift of the land in presenti, to be enjoyed in presenti, unless the grantor changed the possession and use by the exercise of his reserved power; and when the use was so changed again to take effect, unless destroyed by the exercise of the reserved power.

*The referee is of opinion that the trust deed took effect according to its terms and is a valid paper. The referee can find no distinct act of Effie W. Eichelberger intended to relinquish or destroy her interest under the trust deed. And much doubt might be entertained whether any act of hers (until of late) could have had such effect.

The next question relates to the advancements in money alleged to have been made to Effie W. Eichelberger.

There can be no doubt when E. W. Eichelberger left the state she received a considerable sum of money from her father—about $3000. Was this money a gift or advancement, or was it a payment?

The transactions between D. Hughey and William H. Eichelberger and wife, for some time before and to the time of their parting in A. D. 1854, wore a business air. Six or seven weeks before W. H. Eichelberger left, the witness, Clark, heard D. Hughey offer W. H. Eichelberger $1000 for the remainder of the crop, stock, &c., that would be on the farm. Without attempting to state an account, the excess, if any, in the amount received by Effie W. Eichelberger appears small when balanced with counter claim. Her claim in her mother's property, her claim of dower relinquishment, the improvements on the Sligh land surrendered to her father, improvements on the Thornton land, beside the sale by her husband, might well be regarded as, between parent and child, a fair equivalent for the $3000. Some of the claims were expressly included in such settlement as the parties made; and if all were not, (though there is no testimony otherwise) circumstances would suggest to the parties that another adjustment could not soon be made.

The referee does not regard the claim of D. Hughey as resting on a pecuniary consideration. Apart from the difficulty of a grantee repudiating a part of a deed under which claim is made and proving a different consideration from that expressed, the evidence is not satisfactory that D. Hughey intended to execute the trust deed in satisfaction of Effie W. Eichelberger's interest in her mother's land. There may have been promises by D. Hughey and expectations on his daughter's part, but the promises were vague, and the trust deed, upon its face, is evidence that no *thinking person would have relinquished a pecuniary right for its uncertain provisions.

The referee is of opinion that all the rights and claims of Effie W. Eichelberger and her husband were paid by the sum of $3000, except that contingent right in the Sligh land, depending for its existence upon the good will of D. Hughey.

The form of certain deeds in Mississippi by persons there to W. H. Eichelberger, in trust for Effie W. Eichelberger, was urged to show that the Mississippi lands were a substitute for her interest in the Sligh land. Considering the sources from which the money was derived which went in payment of the Mississippi lands, the character of a trust might well be attached to it. Besides, it is not to be overlooked that experience may have taught the propriety of securing her interest in the form of trust.

The deed of trust mentions five negro slaves, Bill Gwin, Emeline, her infant child, Sam Bull, Nance and Judy. The description of them in the deed corresponds with that given by Effie W. Eichelberger in her testimony. She says: "David Hughey gave the witness five negro slaves, one man and woman, two girls and a child."

The possession by Effie W. Eichelberger of these slaves was never disturbed by D. Hughey. They went with her to Mississippi; and there was good reason to record the trust deed there, that strangers might have notice of the title to the property.

The referee is of opinion that these slaves were an advancement, and should be accounted for.

He deems any attempt at stating the accounts premature. He has not the information, and the accounting may greatly depend upon the view taken by the court of the matters he will ask leave to report.

The referee submits as his "finding of facts:"

First. That Daniel Hughey died intestate on the 22d day of September, A. D. 1868, in the county of Newberry.

Second. That he left, as his heirs-at-law and distributees, his widow, Mary A. Hughey, and children, Effie W. Eichelberger and Job L. Hughey.

Third. That administration of his personal estate was granted to Mary A. Hughey.

*Fourth. That the personal estate in the hands of the administratrix is ample for payment of debts.

Fifth. That the intestate died seized and possessed of real estate in the counties of Newberry and Fairfield, described in the pleadings, which are subject to partition.

Sixth. That Daniel Hughey, on the 5th day of February, A. D. 1850, executed a deed of trust to William J. Alston of a parcel of land known as the Sligh land, in Newberry county, and five slaves—one man, one woman and three children.

Seventh. That W. H. Eichelberger lived with his family on the Sligh land from A. D. 1850, until November, 1854.

Eighth. That improvements worth about $1500 were made upon the Sligh land during said time.

Ninth. That Daniel Hughey had possession of the Sligh land from (about) November, 1854, to the time of his death in A. D. 1868.

Tenth. That Effie W. Eichelberger held the slaves mentioned in the deed of trust as her own property, from A. D. 1850 until they were emancipated.

Eleventh. That Effie W. Eichelberger had claims upon her father and rights which were relinquished to him, and also that William H. Eichelberger had claims for personalty sold, which were settled by the payment of $3000 by Daniel Hughey.

Twelfth. That the land and slaves described in the trust deed to William J. Alston were not included in the above settlement.

The referee finds as "conclusions of law:"

First. That the trust deed of Daniel Hughey to William J. Alston is valid.

Second. That during the time Effie W. Eichelberger was in the use and occupation of the Sligh land, she is not to account for profits or pay rent.

Third. That from November, 1854, to the death of Daniel Hughey in A. D. 1868, his estate is not to account for use and occupation.

Fourth. That the estate of Daniel Hughey is to account for use and occupation of the Sligh land to Effie W. Eichelberger from the death of Daniel Hughey.

Fifth. That the Sligh land is to be regarded and held as an *advancement to Effie W. Eichelberger, taking full effect as such at the death of Daniel Hughey.

Sixth. That Effie W. Eichelberger, in accounting for this land as an advancement, must take it with all improvements as it was left by intestate at his death, and accounting for its value at such time.

Seventh. That the former slaves in the trust deed were an advancement to Effie W. Eichelberger, and she is to account for their value as it was when the deed was made in A. D. 1850, according to the common rules of advancements.

Eighth. That the sum of $3000, paid by Daniel Hughey to Effie W. Eichelberger, is not to be accounted for by her.

Ninth. That a writ issue for the partition of the lands of which Daniel Hughey died seized and possessed, excluding the Sligh land, but that the return of the commissioners await confirmation by the court until an accounting, including both real and personal estate, can be had.

A reference was held at Newberry, September 13th, 1872, and testimony taken, the object of which was to show a use by the administratrix of funds of the estate either for personal purposes or for profit. The referee is of opinion that at this time the matter should be embraced in the accounting, and he reports the testimony taken by him without comment or expression of opinion.

To this report all parties excepted, and case came up for hearing in Circuit Court on such exceptions.

The decree of the Circuit judge, is as follows:

It is adjudged and decreed that the first exception put in on the part of the plaintiff, Mary A. Hughey, and the defendant, Job L. Hughey, be so far sustained as to charge Effie W. Eichelberger as an advancement with $2000 of this money ($3000), handed to her by her father as she was leaving for Mississippi in December, 1854, with interest from the death of her father, Daniel Hughey, and that all of the other exceptions be overruled.

It is further adjudged and decreed that the first, second and third exceptions filed on the part of W. H. Eichelberger and Effie W., his wife, be sustained, and that the deed from Daniel *Hughey to W. J. Alston, trustee, dated the 5th day of February, 1850, is a valid subsisting deed, vesting the property therein described according to the use and trust therein expressed in Effie W. Eichelberger for and during her natural life, and at her death to go to the remaindermen, according to the terms and limitations of said deed, and that said land be delivered up to the said Effie W. Eichelberger, and that the estate of Daniel Hughey account to her for the rents and profits of the same from the first of January, 1855.

It is further adjudged and decreed that the property, real and personal, described in said trust deed is not to be accounted for as an advancement by the said Effie W. Eichelberger.

It is further adjudged and decreed that the fourth, fifth and sixth exceptions put in on the part of W. H. Eichelberger and Effie W., his wife, be overruled, and that the said report, as modified by the decree, be confirmed and made the judgment of the court.

Appellants' Grounds of Appeal.

Mary A. Hughey and Job L. Hughey appeal from the decree of the Court of Common Pleas in this action on the following grounds, to wit:

First. Because the Circuit judge erred in deciding that the Sligh land and five slaves were conveyed to the defendant, Effie W. Eichelberger, in payment of debts or other contracts of the intestate, Daniel Hughey, to or with her, inasmuch as the deed of conveyance and the only competent evidence in the case show the conveyance to have been purely gratuitous on the part of the grantor.

Second. Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that the estate of Daniel Hughey shall account for the use of the said Sligh land from November, 1854, inasmuch as, by the very terms of the deed, he had the authority to use the said land or to cause it to be sold at any time during his lifetime, and inasmuch as there is no evidence showing that his control and authority over the land was ever modified by subsequent action on his part or with his consent.

Third. Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that the *sum of $1000 out of the sum of $3000 furnished by Daniel Hughey to the said Effie W. Eichelberger was a payment of a debt to her, (the said Effie W.,) inasmuch as there is no proof of his owing her any sum of money for any cause.

Fourth. Because the Circuit judge should have decided that the $3000 and the five slaves were advancements to the said Effie W. by the said Daniel Hughey, to be accounted for by her, with interest, from his death.

Fifth. Because the Circuit judge should have decided that the Sligh land was a mere loan to the said Effie W., resumed by her father with her consent on her removal to Mississippi.

Sixth. Because the Circuit judge should have excluded all the depositions of Effie W. and her husband as incompetent, in that they are the testimony of parties opposed in interest to the intestate and in regard to his declarations and transactions.

Seventh. Because, if the said sum of $3.-000 was not a pure gratuity from Daniel Hughey to the said Effie W., the circumstances show that it must have been paid her in settlement of all her claims in the Sligh land.

Eighth. Because, if the estate of Daniel Hughey is to account for the use of the Sligh land, it should be only from his death in 1868.

Eichelberger and wife also appealed upon the following grounds:

1. Because his Honor erred in deciding that Effie W. Eichelberger should account for, as an advancement, $2000 of the $3000 of the money handed to her by her father, D. Hughey, as she was leaving for Mississippi, with interest from the death of D. Hughey.

2. Because his Honor erred in deciding that Effie W. Eichel..ger should account for the value of the Sligh place at the death of D. Hughey, including in said valuation the $1500 worth of improvements put upon it by her, as an advancement, whereas in another part of his decree he has held that the Sligh land and five slaves named in the trust deed were not an advancement. This error was evidently unintentional.

3. Because his Honor erred in deciding that Effie W. Eichel*berger had possession of all five of the slaves named in the deed to W. J. Alston, from the date of the deed up to the time they were emancipated, when the evidence is that she only had possession of four of said slaves.

4. Because his Honor erred in deciding that Effie W. Eichelberger had released her right to her distributive share in her mother's real estate, except in part payment of the Sligh tract and five negroes named in the deed of trust.

L. J. Jones, Attorney for Eichelberger and wife.

Messrs. Baxter, Pope, Suber and Caldwell, for Mrs. Hughey and J. L. Hughey.

Messrs. L. J. Jones and Leroy F. Youmans, for W. H. Eichelberger and wife.

July 31st, 1878. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. Daniel Hughey died intestate on the 22d of September, 1868, leaving as his heirs-at-law and distributees his widow, the plaintiff, and two children, the defendant, Job L. Hughey, the child of plaintiff, and the defendant, Effie, a child of a former marriage, and now the wife of the defendant, William H. Eichelberger. The intestate, at one time, owned three tracts of land in the county of Newberry, one known as the Sligh place, called sometimes the Kinard place, and the Lyles and Heller tracts. After the marriage of Eichelberger to the said Effie, they lived for a time on the Lyles and Heller lands, which then belonged to him. Subsequently, however, they were sold by the sheriff for his debts and bid in by his brother, George A. Eichelberger, but W. H. Eichelberger, under some arrangement with his brother, "held an occupancy or use of this land for life," and so continued in possession until some time in 1847 or 1848, when Daniel Hughey purchased these two tracts, and William H. Eichelberger and wife removed to the Thornton land, in Fairfield county, upon which they made improvements to the value of some $500. This Thornton place was said to have been the property of Mrs. Eichelberger's mother, but the *testimony on this point was not very distinct, and it did not appear what was the value of the place nor the extent of Mrs. Eichelberger's interest therein; though it would seem from the testimony of Hope that there were other heirs of her mother besides Effie and her father, whose interest had been bought up by Daniel Hughey, who seemed to have the use and control of the place. After remaining a short time on the Thornton place, William H. Eichelberger and wife again removed to the Sligh place, but at what particular time is not stated. These several moves upon the part of the Eichelbergers seem to have been made at the instance of the intestate, Daniel Hughey.

Soon after their removal to the Sligh place, Daniel Hughey executed a deed, bearing date the 5th of February, 1850, to William J. Alston, for the Sligh place and five slaves, to be held by him in trust for the sole and separate use of the said Effie during her life, ("subject to the exception or reservation hereinafter made") and after her death to be settled upon her issue; and in case of her death without leaving issue, then the said land and slaves were to become the absolute property of said Daniel Hughey. The exception or reservation is that the said Daniel Hughey retains the right—First. "To have, use, cultivate and enjoy, in the most ample manner, free from any rent, claim or hindrance whatever, so much of said tract of land as the said Daniel Hughey may think proper." Second. The right to require the trustee to sell all or any part of the property mentioned in the deed, and reinvest the proceeds in lands or slaves, as said Daniel Hughey may direct. And, Third. The right, by deed or will, to revoke or annul this deed, or make such other disposition of the said property as he may see fit. Daniel Hughey died without exercising the power of revocation or alteration, and the Circuit judge, adopting in this respect the finding of the referee, held this deed to be valid and sufficient to convey the property therein mentioned upon the trusts therein declared, and from this part of his decision there is no appeal.

Some time in the latter part of the year 1854, W. H. Eichelberger and wife left the Sligh place, after having made improvements thereon to the value of about $1500, and removed to the State of Mississippi, where they still reside. Immediately after *they left, Daniel Hughey took possession of the Sligh place and continued in the use and occupation of it up to the time of his death—a period of nearly fourteen years; but the slaves mentioned in the deed continued in the possession of Mrs. Eichelberger until they were emancipated.

While on their way to Mississippi, Mrs. Eichelberger received from her father a sum of money amounting to about $3000, but whether as a gift, or in payment of claims which she and her husband may have had against her father is one of the questions in the case.

The questions raised by this appeal are—

First. Whether the Sligh place was an advancement—and if so, when was it made and how is it to be valued? Second. Whether the five slaves mentioned in the deed of trust can be regarded as advancements. Third. Whether the money received by Mrs. Eichelberger from her father was an advancement. Fourth. Whether the estate of Daniel Hughey must account for the use and occupation of the Sligh place, from the time he took possession, say January 1st, 1855, or only from the time of his death. There is also a question of evidence which it will be necessary to dispose of, viz., whether the testimony of Eichelberger and wife, as to transactions or communications with the intestate, was competent. The objection to so much of the testimony of Eichelberger and wife as relates to transactions or communications had with the intestate, must be sustained under the express terms of Section 415 of the code of procedure, so far as the testimony of Mrs. Eichelberger is concerned; but so far as the testimony of William H. Eichelberger is concerned, it cannot be sustained. The transactions and communications referred to were between the intestate and Mrs. Eichelberger, and not between the intestate and W. H. Eichelberger. The language of the code, Section 415, is: "That no party to the action * * * * shall be examined in regard to any transaction or communication between such witness and a person at the time of such examination deceased," &c., and as held by this court in the recent case of Roe v. Harrison [9 S. C. 279]; decision filed March 9th, 1878. The proviso to Section 415 of the code does not apply when the transaction or communication *was not between the witness and the deceased, but between the deceased and some other person.

The question whether the Sligh place is to be regarded as an advancement, is mainly a question of fact, in the solution of which the referee and the Circuit judge have reached different conclusions. We agree with the referee in the conclusion which he has adopted. He heard and saw the witnesses when they testified, and therefore had a better opportunity of judging of the force and effect of their testimony than the Circuit judge, who, as is said in the case, "did not hear the evidence in the cause," by which, we must presume, is meant that he did not hear the witnesses testify; for we certainly would not be at liberty to presume that a judge would undertake to decide a case depending largely upon issues of fact, without hearing the testimony read, which had been taken by the referee, and most assuredly we could not assume that any judge would undertake to overrule the decision of a referee upon a question of fact, without first ascertaining what the testimony was, upon which such decision was based. Therefore, while the rule is to accept the decision of the court below upon a question of fact, as conclusive, except where it is, either without any evidence to sustain it, or is, manifestly, against the weight of the evidence; yet where such decision overrules the decision of a referee, and is reached by a consideration of testimony taken in writing, the rule does not apply. Dewitt v. Atkinson, 6 S. C. 142. As this court has, then, the same opportunities of judging of the testimony as the Circuit judge had, and, as is said in Gee v. Hicks, Rich. Eq. Cas. 20, "in such cases of difference of opinion between the Chancellor and the commissioner upon the facts, this court is bound to examine the Chancellor's decree and either adopt or reject it, as the facts may appear to warrant." In doing this, however, we are not "to enter into any discussion at large of all the evidence introduced, or to take up the testimony of every witness on the one side and compare it with that introduced on the other side to rebut it. We look at it as a whole, and justify our conclusion by the influence which its entire scope makes on our minds." Dewitt v. Atkinson, supra. Looking, then, at this question in this light, the first circumstance which attracts our attention is *that the deed conveying the Sligh place is, on its face, a purely voluntary deed, made by a father for the benefit of his married daughter; next, that the interest conveyed is subject to such reservations and conditions as to render such interest so precarious, during the life of the grantor, as to make it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to suppose that any person possessed of ordinary mental capacity, would be willing to pay any pecuniary value for it; and, finally, we are at a loss to discover any sufficient evidence to show that this deed was based upon any valuable consideration passing from the grantee or the person beneficially interested thereunder, to the grantor. Regarding this, then, as an advancement, the next inquiry is, when was it made—at the date of the deed or at the time of the death of the intestate? By the terms of the deed the interest conveyed to or for the benefit of Mrs. Eichelberger, was of so uncertain and precarious a character, dependent wholly upon the contingency of the grantor's remaining in the same mind, that it can scarcely be said that any legal interest passed under it, until, by the death of the grantor, without altering or revoking the deed, such contingency had happened; and when, in addition to this, it is remembered that the intestate exercised his reserved right of resuming the use and enjoyment of the land in a comparatively short time after the making of the deed, and continued in such use and enjoyment up to the time of his death—a period of nearly fourteen years—we do not think the advancement can properly be regarded as having been made until at the time of his death, when it was no longer possible for him to exercise the reserved right of revocation. It must, therefore, be estimated at its value at that time in the condition in which it then was, and we can see no ground for allowing Eichelberger and wife anything for the improvements which they put upon the place while they were in the occupation of it, especially as the value of these improvements was, doubtless, as the referee finds, included in the settlement made between Mrs. Eichelberger and her father, when she was on her way to Mississippi, as will hereinafter be more particularly noticed.

Second. The slaves mentioned in the deed of February 5th, 1850, cannot be regarded as an advancement; for, besides the *fact that this property cannot be regarded as having been really given to Mrs. Eichelberger until the death of the intestate, inasmuch as the donor reserved to himself not merely a life estate, but, practically, the absolute title, with the right to use and dispose of the property during his life, as completely and absolutely as if no such deed had ever been made, together with the right to revoke the deed, we do not see how a slave can be regarded as an advancement when the intestate died after the abolition of slavery, whereby slaves lost their attributes as property. It is manifestly impossible to ascertain the value of such an advancement, if advancement it be called. By our act of 1791, corresponding in its terms with Sec. 7, ch. LXXXV., Gen. Stat., p. 440, the value of the advancement is to be estimated "at the death of the ancestor," relation being had to its condition at the time of the gift. McCaw v. Blewit, 2 McC. Eq. 104. Now, in this case, the intestate having died after the slaves were emancipated, it is clearly impossible to ascertain the value of these slaves by the rule established by the statute, and we are not at liberty to invent any other. It is not like the case of a slave dying after the gift and before the death of the intestate, while slaves continued to be property, because then we would be at no loss in applying the rule. In such a case, slaves continuing to be property, a standard of value of such property would still be accessible, and the question as to what would such a slave, as the one given, in the condition in which it was at the time of the gift, be worth at the time of the death of the intestate, would present no impossibilities or even difficulties, as the value could readily be measured by such existing standard. But in the case now under consideration there was no such standard at the time of the death of the intestate, inasmuch as there was then no such property. The cases of Manning v. Manning, 12 Rich. Eq. 410, and McLure v. Steele, 14 Rich. Eq. 105, do not conflict with this view, as in each of those cases the ancestor died while slaves were still property, though the settlement of the estate was not made until after the slaves were emancipated. Hence, the question presented to us did not and could not arise in those cases. Without adverting to other reasons, this we think sufficient to show that the slaves mentioned in the deed of trust cannot be regarded *as an advancement. It may be that the services or hire of these slaves, while they were allowed to remain in the possession of Mrs. Eichelberger by the intestate, might constitute an advancement, but as that question has not been raised by any exception we cannot consider it, and do not wish to be regarded as indicating any opinion with reference to it.

Third. The next question is as to the money—$3000—received by Mrs. Eichelberger from her father while on the way to Mississippi. This, too, is a question of fact, and upon it, likewise, the referee and the Circuit judge have reached different conclusions; the former, finding that no part of this sum of money was an advancement, but was a payment of sundry claims held by Eichelberger and wife against the intestate, while the latter holds that only $1000 of the sum was a payment, and that the balance should be charged as an advancement against Mrs. Eichelberger. Upon what grounds the Circuit judge drew this distinction do not appear, as no reasons are given by him for any of the conclusions which he has reached. Here, too, we prefer to adopt the conclusion of the referee, as better sustained by the evidence. It is very true that the testimony as to this point, especially after excluding the testimony of Mrs. Eichelberger, so far as it related to transactions or communications had by her with the intestate, is not as clear and satisfactory as is desirable; but still we are of opinion that there was sufficient evidence to warrant the conclusion reached by the referee, especially when it is remembered that this was a transaction between a father and his daughter, who was about to remove to a distant state, leaving behind her such property as it would be inconvenient to take with her, and having certain claims which she and her husband undoubtedly did have against him. It would be unreasonable to expect that parties so related, dealing with each other under such circumstances, would go into nice calculations of value, or make accurate and detailed statements of the several claims which were brought into the settlement. Hence, while the testimony may not, perhaps, be sufficient to enable us to make such statements, which the parties themselves did not, probably, undertake to make, we think there is quite sufficient in the testimony to justify the conclusion reached by the referee, that no part of the *$3000 was a gift, but that the whole sum was paid in satisfaction of the various claims which the one party had against the other. There is no doubt but that Mrs.

Eichelberger had a contingent claim of dower in the Lyles and Heller lands, which was released to her father; that Eichelberger left on the Sligh place, when he removed to Mississippi, his crop, stock and other articles, which went into the possession of Daniel Hughey and which he must have estimated to be worth at least $1000, as Clark proves that he offered that much for these various articles; and that Eichelberger, under an arrangement with his brother, had a life interest in the Lyles and Heller lands, which seems to have been surrendered to Hughey. We think, too, that there is good reason to believe that the interest of Mrs. Eichelberger in the estate of her mother was likewise included in this settlement. Then, too, the improvements which the Eichelbergers had put upon the Thornton place and the Sligh place, though not, perhaps, constituting the basis for any legal claim against Hughey, might very well serve as a basis for a payment by Hughey to Eichelberger and wife, upon the same principle as that announced in Murrel v. Murrel, 2 Strob. Eq. 153 [49 Am. Dec. 664], "that though a parent is entitled to the services of his children while under age, he may waive his right and may make the services of his children the consideration of a contract or promise, and that he may give property bona fide in the performance of such obligation of justice, without its being subject to a claim on the part of the other children to consider it in the light of an advancement."

All these various items might very well constitute a sufficient consideration for the sum of money received by Mrs. Eichelberger from her father, and therefore we agree with the referee that no part of this sum of money should be charged as an advancement to Mrs. Eichelberger.

After what had been said on the first question, it is scarcely necessary to say anything as to the fourth question, as it is very manifest that the estate of Daniel Hughey cannot be charged for the use and occupation of the Sligh place, except from the time of his death. We may add, however, that any other conclusion would be directly in face of the express terms of the *deed of trust, exempting him from such charge, during his life, while in the exercise of the right reserved to him by the deed.

The third ground of appeal submitted on behalf of Eichelberger and wife, does not seem to have been pressed on the argument and was probably abandoned, as it is certainly not sustained by any testimony whatever, so far as appears in the "case" as submitted, and is directly in face of the finding of fact by the referee and the decision of the Circuit judge. In addition to this, under the view which we have taken of this case, holding that the slaves were not to be regarded as an advancement, this ground loses its practical importance.

The fourth ground of appeal presented by the Eichelbergers is in the following words: "Because his Honor erred in deciding that Effie W. Eichelberger had released her right to her distributive share in her mother's real estate, except in part payment on the Sligh tract and five negroes named in the deed of trust." The language in which this ground of appeal is presented necessarily implies that Mrs. Eichelberger did release her interest in her mother's estate, and the only complaint is that the Circuit judge erred in holding that the consideration for such release was anything except a part payment for the Sligh tract and five negroes named in the deed of trust. We are unable to discover any such holding on the part of the Circuit judge. For as he decided that the Sligh tract and the slaves were not advancements, and as the grounds upon which such a decision was invoked were that they were not gifts, but were conveyed upon valuable consideration, a part of which was the release of Mrs. Eichelberger's interest in her mother's estate, the reasonable inference is that the Circuit judge did decide exactly what is demanded by the fourth ground of appeal, and hence, there is no foundation for any such ground. But as we think, as we have indicated above, that the release of Mrs. Eichelberger's interest in the estate of her mother, constituted a part of the consideration for which the sum of money—$3000—was paid by her father to her, it becomes unimportant to determine precisely what the Circuit judge did decide upon this point.

The judgment of the Circuit Court, in so far as it conflicts *with the views herein expressed, must be set aside, and the case remanded to the Circuit Court for further proceedings, in accordance with the principles herein established.

Decree modified.

FREDERICK E. FRASER v. MARY F. DAVIE, CHURCHILL B. JONES and His Wife and Children.

[1. Interpleader ⇐1; Trusts ⇐178.]

In cases where a dispute arises as to whether a deed of trust has ever become operative, it is proper for the trustee named in such deed to seek the interposition of a court of equity to define his rights and duties, as between the grantor in trust and the beneficiaries under the deed. And a complaint for such purpose is not a bill of interpleader.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interpleader, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. ⇐1; Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 232; Dec. Dig. ⇐178.]

Such trustee is bound to the exercise of good faith towards his grantor.

When one for value agrees to convey to another and the latter prepares a deed of trust for signature, professing to be upon the consideration of natural love and affection, equity will look beyond the terms of the deed to the true consideration, and finding that, will so declare it, and act upon it.

[4. Appeal and Error ⟸1012.]

A finding of fact by a Circuit judge is not binding upon this court, when a contrary conclusion rests on clear and indisputable grounds.

[5. Contracts ⟸175.]

The word "understood" as applied by a witness to his own apprehension of an agreement to which he was himself a party, is direct proof in itself of what the agreement was.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 766, 978, 1010, 1067–1069, 1786, 1803, 1810; Dec. Dig. ⟸175.]

[6. Deeds ⟸56.]

The manual delivery of a deed will not be regarded as a full and complete delivery when it is mutually understood at the time, between grantor and grantee, that such deed is not to become operative until some future event. Arthur v. Anderson, 9 S. C. 234.

Before Mackey, J., at Chester, September Term, 1876.

The allegations of the complaint and answers are sufficiently set forth in the opinion of the court. The deed is an indenture, and recites as follows:

*"Witnesseth: That the said Mary F. Davie, party of the first part, for and in consideration of the natural love and affection that she bears to her nephew, Churchill B. Jones, and Sarah, his wife, and their children," naming them, "and for and in consideration of the sum of five dollars to her in hand paid by the said Frederick E. Fraser, party of the second part aforesaid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, hath this day bargained, sold, &c., * * * to have and to hold the said bargained premises unto the said Frederick E. Fraser, his heirs, executors and administrators, upon the following trusts and conditions: In trust for the use of the said Churchill B. Jones and Sarah, his wife," &c. The deed concludes in due form and is signed by Mary F. Davie, and Frederick E. Fraser, whose seals are annexed to their respective signatures, in presence of two subscribing witnesses, one of whom makes probate in usual form of the signing, sealing and delivery of the deed.

Frederick E. Fraser testified that he was a nephew of Mrs. Mary F. Davie, and had been her general business agent since 1850; Mary F. Davie held a judgment against C. B. Jones for $4285.74, which, with interest, amounted in January, 1869, to about $6300; said Jones proposed in 1868 to compromise said debt by paying $500 in cash, and $1000 in one, two and three years, with interest at eighteen per centum per annum, to be secured by a mortgage of two tracts of land which he had purchased a year before, and which were included in the trust deed to me; Jones had deeds executed by the sheriff of Chester county to Mrs. Davie for these two tracts, paid her $500 in cash, and Mrs. Davie reconveyed the two tracts to me in trust for said Jones and his wife and children; according to my understanding this deed was not to take effect until the balance of $1000 and interest was paid; Jones has paid Mrs. D. nothing but the $500; in November, 1873, she purchased through her attorney, Maj. S. P. Hamilton, under an execution in favor of C. B. Jones, a tract of land, which, after paying costs, left a credit to Jones of $701.40, which was applied to Mrs. D.'s judgment against Jones; Jones had a credit entered on her judgment against him for $2475, purchase money of two tracts of land covered by deed of trust, leaving about $4878 still due Mrs. Davie; as *soon as trust deed was executed it was sent to either Jones or Maj. Hamilton; the existence of the deed had passed entirely out of my mind until reminded of it by Maj. Hamilton, who in 1874 found it among his papers, and handed it to me; the deed was not recorded because, as I understood, it was not to be recorded until all the conditions of the compromise had been complied with; Jones called upon me in 1874 to have the deed recorded; Mrs. D. objected, because Jones had not carried out the terms of his compromise; Jones insisted, and by the advice of my counsel I commenced these proceedings.

Cross-examination.—Do not remember whether sheriff's deed was in possession of or known to Mrs. D. at time of execution of trust deed; did not direct Hamilton in the matter, as he had charge of business as legal adviser of Mrs. D.; trust deed is in Maj. H.'s handwriting, and I paid him $25 for Mrs. D. for professional services in arranging compromise with Mrs. D.; Jones wrote to me early in 1868 proposing compromise, as stated in my direct examination, which I submitted to Mrs. D., and by her directions placed the matter in Maj. H.'s hands; in February, 1868, I wrote to Jones saying Mrs. D. would accept the offer, but would not assign judgment until the whole amount was paid.

Mrs. Mary F. Davie testified, as follows: I am seventy-four years old; am aunt of plaintiff, and I married uncle of C. B. Jones; am no relation to any of the other parties; I executed a deed in 1869 to F. E. Fraser in trust for C. B. Jones and his family; Jones then owed me about $6000 by judgment; he desired to compromise it on the following terms: $1500—$500 cash and $1000 in one and two years; I agreed to the compromise, and he paid the first $500, but has never paid anything since; this was the consideration of said deed; he now owes me about $5000; I never knew that Jones had bid in land for me and credited the bid on my judgment; I never authorized him to do so; Jones never informed me that he had done so; plaintiff has been my business agent since 1850.

Cross-examination.—I am aunt of Henry D. Fraser and Jane M. Fraser, the witnesses to the trust deed; Mr. Hamilton was my lawyer in Chester, but cannot remember what lawyer repre*sented me in the judgment in my favor against Jones, as F. E. Fraser attended to all these matters for me; I think C. B. Jones was present when trust deed was executed, but am not certain; I know nothing about two deeds from Sheriff Walker—they were never in my possession.

S. P. Hamilton, Esq., testified: Was counsel of Mrs. Davie directly after the war; was employed to manage her business here, and particularly her judgment against Jones; was from time to time Jones' attorney; not much concerned with attempted settlement, but Mr. J. made me acquainted with this matter; J. held judgment against Beckham, under which two tracts of land were sold and purchased by J.; in 1868 the two deeds were put on record; they were given to me by J.; it was agreed between J. and myself that I should give him credit for purchase price of land, $2475; terms of agreement, J. to pay $500 cash and $1000 on some credit; I drew the deed; must have been before September 26th, 1868; balance of $1000 to be paid in one and two years—judgment meantime to remain open; drew deed under instructions of J.; Fraser gave me no instructions; I sent deed to Mr. F., January 7th, 1869, by letter, by direction of, I think, Mr. J.; Mr. J. returned me the deed with two others; he directed me to have the other two deeds recorded and not to record trust deed; it lay in my office until this controversy commenced, when J. came to me and said I had it; I had forgotten, but found it; corresponded with Mr. F. in reference to Mrs. D.'s business; informed F. of the terms of the deed; in this I was acting as Mrs. D.'s attorney; did not leave the deed with the clerk; put credit on execution as attorney of Mrs. D.; think J. asked me to give him the deed—told him I thought it belonged to F.; saw F. afterwards in Charleston; said he had forgotton deed—asked me to send it to him to let him look at it; did so; he did not return it.

J. M. Brawley, county auditor, testified that since execution of the deeds by the sheriff to Mrs. Davie, J. has returned the two tracts conveyed by those deeds in Mrs. D.'s name, and has paid the taxes upon them as such.

C. B. Jones' answer, by agreement, was received as evidence; its statements are as follows: That the defendant, C. B. Jones, *having bought at sheriff's sale the lands embraced in the trust deed under an execution in his own favor, at Chester C. H., entered into an arrangement with Mary F. Davie, whereby C. B. J. paid over to said M. F. D. $500 in cash, and assigned the bids for the said land to said M. F. D., so that she, by the agreement and arrangement referred to, could make said trust deed to said plaintiff for the uses and purposes therein mentioned, which arrangement was agreed to and carried out by the said M. F. D.; that everything was done that was required between the parties to make the deed perfect, and the deed was understood to be complete and perfect at the time of its execution, and each and every allegation of the complaint to the contrary is untrue; that C. B. J. knows that the said deed was sent to the clerk's once for Chester county to be there recorded, and if it was not done, it was not on account of anything to be done by him under the agreement referred to between him and M. F. D., but must be owing to negligence of plaintiff or M. F. D., whose duty it was to have the deed recorded; and it was intended at the time by all parties to be placed on record, and was intended to be recognized as such by M. F. D. and by plaintiff, who was trustee, and by all the persons interested in the same.

In a letter of Churchill B. Jones to F. E. Fraser, put in evidence by Mrs. Davie, Jones makes the following statement: In the early part of 1868 I proposed to Aunt Davie a compromise, which she consented to—it was as follows: I would pay her $500 cash and $1000 on time—one, two and three years—interest at eighteen per cent.; after this $1500 was paid the balance of the claim she held against me she was to settle on my family; my business did not call me to Charleston until the early part of 1869; before going to Charleston I had the sheriff to execute titles to Aunt Davie for the two tracts of land, which I took with me; on my way down I requested Hamilton to draw up a trust deed for the same; he sent it by express to F. E. Fraser; it arrived too late to be executed before I left Charleston; Aunt Davie knew nothing of trust deed lands at the time of the proposition in 1868; while I was in Charleston I showed the trust deeds from the sheriff to Aunt Davie, when the following second and last arrangement was entered into; I was to pay Aunt Davie *$500

cash; upon doing so Aunt D. was to sign the trust deed for the same, and F. E. F. was to forward it, with the two sheriff's deeds, to me to be recorded; and on my paying Aunt D. $1000 more, the same in one, two and three years, with eighteen per cent. interest, Aunt D. would then settle what balance remained on her claim against me on my family in the same way as the trust deed lands; I paid Aunt D. the $500 and returned home; F. E. F. forwarded to me the two deeds from the sheriff, also the trust deed, signed, witnessed and proven; the first time I went to Chester I took the three deeds with me to have them recorded; I left them with Hamilton, requesting him to hand them to the clerk to be recorded, which he promised to do; the first time I was at Chester after that, H. informed me that the sheriff's deeds were recorded but the trust deed was not, and gave the reason why it was not; I then requested him to keep the trust deed until I called for it.

In a letter from C. B. Jones to S. P. Hamilton, also put in evidence by Mrs. Davie, Jones says: You informed me * * * that the two sheriff's deeds were recorded, but the trust deed had been refused record for the lack of revenue stamps; that the law required it should be stamped before it could be recorded, and that I would have to have it done.

The Circuit judge, after an elaborate review of the points at issue, decreed as follows: After due consideration of the law, the facts in the premises and of all the equities of the parties complaining and interpleading herein, it is hereby ordered, adjudged and decreed that the deed of trust described in the complaint herein, was duly executed by the defendant, Mary F. Davie, the settlor thereof, and by Frederick E. Fraser, the grantee named therein, and that the said deed was absolutely and unconditionally delivered by the said settlor to the said grantee, and did vest in the said grantee the legal estate in the lands described in the said deed, and did convey to Churchill B. Jones and Sarah, his wife, and the other cestuis que trust therein designated, the equitable title and beneficial interest in the said lands.

It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said deed *of trust be forthwith recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyances in and for the county of Chester.

It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff, F. E. Fraser, do pay his own costs in this action; and that the defendant, Mary E. Davie, do pay the costs and disbursements of the defendants, C. B. Jones and Sarah, his wife, and their co-defendants, the cestuis que trust interpleading herein.

Mary F. Davie and Frederick E. Fraser appealed from this decree to the Supreme Court.

Mr. Edward McCrady, Jr., for Mrs. Davie.

The deed purports to be a voluntary conveyance—one in consideration of natural love and affection. From the evidence, it does not appear that Mrs. Davie bears such a relation to the beneficiaries under the deed as would support such a consideration. 2 Black. 297. But if a voluntary deed, equity will not aid Jones and his family, for there is no equity to enforce an imperfect gift. 6 Ves. 662; 18 Ves. 140; 1 Fonb. Eq. 349. See same doctrine recognized in 2 Desaus. 191; 3 Desaus. 1; and in 1 Johns. Ch. 336. Voluntary agreement will not be completed or assisted by a court of equity in cases of mere gift; if anything be wanting to complete the title of the donee, a court of equity will not assist him in obtaining it. 4 De G., F. & J. 263, 519; 2 Mofloy 257.

But this was not a voluntary deed; there was a consideration different from that expressed in its recital, which may be proven. 7 Bro. P. C. 74; 3 T. R. 474; 3 Ad. & El. 649; May's note to § 26, 13th ed. of Greenl. Ev.; 2 Taunt. 141; 5 Barn. & Ald. 606; 18 Ves. 483; 1 Atk. 352; 2 Hill 404; 1 McC. 514; Riley Eq. 131; Best on Ev. (Am. ed., 1875,) 398, note; Sug. on V. & P. 153, note; Whart. on Ev., § 1048; 12 Eng. R. 236, note; 16 Wend. 460; 5 Barb. 455.

Mrs. Davie is not bound by compromise which she, ten years ago, generously agreed to, but of which Jones did not avail himself, and has put her to all this litigation. 2 Strob. 20; 3 Strob. 25.

Mrs. Jones and her children cannot take free from the agree*ment of Jones and unaffected by his conduct in the matter. 4 Mer. 222; L. R., 8 Ch. App. 383; 5 Eng. R. 607.

As to the delivery of the deed. It may be shown that the deed was, in fact, not executed, or that its execution was only conditional. Whart. on Ev., §§ 927, 930, 1054; 24 W. R. 159, 33 L. T. 672; 4 Barn. & Ald. 440; 2 Barn. & Cr. 82; 5 Barn. & Cr. 671; 11 M. & W. 128.

We are met by the technical rule that a deed delivered to a party in interest cannot be considered as escrow. But the deed was in Hamilton's hands, Mrs. Davie's agent, and the testimony shows was put there by agreement of all parties.

If sealed instruments are sacred, is it not upon the principle of estoppel—a principle not favored at law? 5 Barn. & Ald. 606. But deed was drawn under Jones' directions, and if she is thereby estopped, he is still more estopped by his sworn returns to the auditor that the land belonged to Mrs. Davie.

August 13th, 1878. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. This is a complaint in the nature of a bill by a trustee, to have the nature and extent of his interests and duties in regard to the trust property defined and settled, as against the grantor in trust and the cestuis que trust. It has been erroneously supposed by the Circuit decree that the case is one of interpleader. When one admits himself to be liable to perform some act, to the performance of which others make conflicting claims, he may interplead them to ascertain to whom the duty is due. But that is not this case, for the conflict does not depend on the fact that each party claims the same duty from the trustee; on the contrary, the demands of the grantor and the cestuis que trust, are of separate natures, claiming the performance of acts of a different character on the part of the trustee. From the character of the demand it will appear to bear a closer resemblance to a bill for the specific performance of a parol contract for the sale of land in part carried out, than to a bill of interpleader.

The complaint alleges that the defendant, C. B. Jones, being indebted by judgment to the defendant, Mrs. Davie, in an amount exceeding $6000, they agreed to compromise such indebtedness on the following terms: Jones was to pay to Mrs. Davie $500, and to convey to her the land described in the complaint, by way of mortgage, to secure the payment of $1000 more, in installments, with interest at an agreed rate; Mrs. Davie to assign the judgment for the protection of Jones. It is alleged, however, that Jones, without consultation with Mrs. Davie, changed the plan of arrangement in the following manner: *Instead of having title to the land, his claim upon it was under the lien of a judgment held by him against a third person, who was the owner thereof, and in addition thereto, under a bid made by him at sheriff's sale on execution, under such last-mentioned judgment, under which he became the purchaser but had not taken title. Jones without previously conferring with Mrs. Davie, but, as appears in evidence, with the consent of her attorney, transferred the bid to Mrs. Davie, to whom title was made by the sheriff, and through her attorney had the amount bid for the land credited on the execution issued against him on Mrs. Davie's judgment. Jones then applied to Mrs. Davie to execute a deed of the land to plaintiff as trustee, for the benefit of Jones and his family.

Mrs. Davie alleges that she was induced to execute such a deed, but with the understanding that it should be detained by the trustee, and not recorded until that portion of the agreement that related to the payment of the $1000 had been complied with. The effect of this agreement will be hereafter considered, but it will be assumed for the present purpose that its object was to render the deed inoperative until the sum of $1000 was paid, or secured to be paid, according to the terms of the compromise.

Defendant Jones contends that the terms of the original agreement were, by mutual understanding, changed to such extent that the land in the hands of the trustee was to be actually discharged from the lien of the judgment of Mrs. Davie upon her receiving the cash payment of $500, she to look to her judgment alone for the balance of her demand. This statement of a new contract appears to be incomplete, as it leaves it quite in doubt what was to become of the balance of the judgment, over and above the $1000 secured by it and the credits upon it. This being the nature of the controversy, the exact question is, whether certain acts are required to be performed by the plaintiff, or by the defendant, Jones, before the deed is operative, so as to accomplish the objects intended by the trust expressed in it. In such a case it cannot be doubted that a trustee may come into a court of equity to have his rights and duties defined, and for a determination whether some act on the part of a defendant is not essential to give stability to the trust, and this does not militate *against the rule that a trustee must not industriously search for secret defects in his title, as his duty is to protect rather than to destroy it.

It is clear that the nature of the controversy demands the interposition of a court of equity in behalf of the trustee to relieve him from the embarrassments of his position, and we find no reason for the severe strictures on his conduct pronounced by the Circuit decree.

There is no controversy as it regards the terms and objects of the original agreement; the controversy relates wholly to the question whether any rescission or modification of that agreement has been made by the acts of the parties. There are two modes under the facts of the case by which such a rescission or modification might have arisen—first, by the mutual agreement of the parties upon consideration; or, second, by waiver on the part of Mrs. Davie of the conditions in her favor, by the acceptance of less than the contract called for, as the consideration of doing that which she was called on to perform as her part of the agreement. Has either of these cases arisen?

It should be remarked that the contract and dealings between the parties rest wholly on a valuable consideration. The creation of a trust does not appear to have been contemplated by the original contract, unless a secret trust was intended by defendant, Jones, in the event that he should require the judgment to be assigned to a third party, intending thereby protection to himself as against his creditors.

As such a trust is not a necessary inference from the terms of the original contract as stated, and has not gone and need not go into effect, it is unnecessary to consider its possible effect as an element of the contract. As far as the original contract was concerned, it was indifferent to Mrs. Davie whether the benefits of the compromise were secured to Jones indefinitely, or to him and his family. The terms of the trust deed proceed wholly from Jones, who prepared it. When one agrees to convey to another, and the latter prepares a deed of trust for signature, professing to be upon the consideration of natural love and affection, equity will look beyond the terms of the deed to the true consideration, *and finding that it was valuable wholly, will so declare it and act upon it.

The main question in the case as above stated is one of fact, and in order to disturb the findings of the Circuit Court, it is necessary that a conclusion opposite to that of the Circuit Court should rest on clear and indisputable grounds.

We are satisfied that the conclusion of the Circuit Court holding that there was a complete and full delivery was erroneous, as unsupported by the proper legal effect of the proofs and allegations. This question is fundamental to the question already stated as presented by the case, viz., whether any rescission or modification of the original agreement has been effected by the agreement or waiver of the parties, and it will be first considered. The testimony of Mrs. Davie and that of Fraser are in substantial concurrence. The proper deduction from their testimony is, that according to the understanding of both, the deed was to remain in the hands of Fraser, inoperative, until provision was made as it regards the payment of the $1000. This fact becomes extremely important as these parties were the proper parties to the delivery, if one was made, Mrs. Davie as the grantor, and Fraser as the grantee in trust.

Unless, then, this testimony is successfully shaken, it would be extremely difficult to get rid of the consequences of such a mutual understanding between the immediate grantor and grantee, as it regards the nature and intention of the delivery.

It has been objected to Mrs. Davie's statement that she has stated in her answer that it was only the withholding of the deed from record that was contemplated by the condition annexed to the manual delivery of the deed as admitting the deed to be recorded is not essential to its effect as a valid deed between the parties. But it is clear that Mrs. Davie assumed that by withholding the deed from record, it would remain inoperative; and as delivery is an act of the mind, as well as a manual act, presupposing consent that the deed should become operative, evidence showing the absence of that consent must have weight against the inferences arising from mere manual delivery. Mrs. Davie was an aged lady, of seventy-four, dealing with a nephew, and, it is evident from her testimony, had an imperfect knowledge of *the state of the transaction at the time she executed the deed in question.

She was examined upon written interrogations and appears to have answered directly, but briefly. Although she does not state, in terms, that it was stipulated that the deed should not become operative until the conditions as to the $1000 were complied with, that question not having been put to her, yet she stated the incomplete state of the transaction at the time the deed is alleged to have been delivered, in a manner that fully accords with and corroborates the more full statement of the matter made by the trustee, Fraser. Fraser states that the deed was not recorded because, as he understood, "it was not to be recorded until all the conditions of the compromise had been complied with."

This testimony has been criticised for the reason that it is the statement of the witness' understanding alone. It is true that when it is sought to prove the existence of a fact by the statement of a witness that he understood the fact so to be, the proof is of the weakest character, for in that form of statement the sense of "understood" is equivalent to that of "believed," and that belief might be founded on hearsay or conjecture. But here the existence of such an understanding is the very fact to be proved, that word being used in the sense of "agreement," and therefore the mere statement of its existence by a party to it, is direct proof in itself.

The subsequent conduct of the parties shows that they mutually understood that withholding the deed from record was equivalent to withholding it from operating as a deed. It was handed by Fraser to Mr. Hamilton, and retained in his possession unrecorded until the commencement of this action. It does not appear that any act asserting title under the deed has been performed by the trustee.

The Circuit decree arrives at the conclusion that Mr. Hamilton is not to be regarded as the attorney of Mrs. Davie, but on this point the testimony is so clear and conclusive that it does not need comment or illustration. We hold the proof sufficient to show that Mr. Hamilton in taking possession of the deed and holding the same, did so as the attorney of Mrs. Davie.

*Then taking together the testimony of the grantor and the trustee, and that of Mr. Hamilton, it becomes apparent that the deed was delivered by the grantor to the grantee with the mutual understanding that it should not operate until the terms of the original agreement, as it regarded the payment or security of the $1000, had been complied with.

Opposed to this are the statements contained in the answer of the defendant, Jones, which, by the stipulation of the counsel for the parties, are to be treated as if sworn to by Jones as testimony in the case. The statements of the answer, as it regards the intended effect of the deed, are in general terms, and do not show any facts or circumstances tending to give probability to his statements, as against those of the trustee. Primarily it must be assumed that the immediate grantor and grantee had the best knowledge of what was intended between them, but this inference might give place to a different result, if it was made to appear that the transaction was actually with Jones, and only nominally with Fraser. But the statements of Jones lay no sufficient foundation for such a conclusion. So, too, if any purpose of equity was to be subserved thereby, Jones might be treated as the actual party; but on the contrary, the equities are with Mrs. Davie to have the purposes of her contract carried into effect. We must therefore give effect to the mutual understanding of the parties between whom the transaction was in form of law perfected.

It is clear that the course pursued by the defendant, Jones, was at variance with the original contract, and tended to place Mrs. Davie in a position in which Jones would obtain the substantial benefits intended by the transaction, without affording to her the advantages contemplated in her favor. It is not to be presumed that Mrs. Davie intended to relinquish those benefits, nor was Fraser, though interested as trustee, bound to assist Jones in stripping Mrs. Davie of these advantages. No principle of equity requires that a trustee should yield himself as a party to an overreaching transaction against his grantor. He is as much bound to good faith as one who deals in his own interest. The testimony of Fraser must, therefore, be considered as proceeding from one devoid of personal interest and acting wholly *for the benefit of others. As the testimony of Fraser cannot be shaken on the ground of credibility for anything that appears, it is clearly a case for leaving the matters where they stood, according to the mutual understanding of the parties to the act of delivery. An attempt was made by counsel to impeach the accuracy of the memory of Fraser by the admitted fact that at one time he had forgotten the existence of the deed, a circumstance not likely to have happened, had it been regarded by him as complete and operative; but, however that may be, the fact of having forgotten a transaction at some time after its occurrence and prior to giving testimony about it, is not conclusive that the memory of the witness is defective as to its details.

A subject may pass entirely out of the mind, and yet, upon being recalled, the memory of the various matters connected with it may be entirely reliable.

The principles on which the foregoing conclusion, as to the bearing on the effect of manual delivery of the intentions of the parties, were recently considered by this court in Arthur v. Anderson, 9 S. C. 234, and the cases bearing on that subject there noticed. It is not necessary to re-examine the foundations on which they rest. There is no question of an escrow in the case, the true question being the effect in equity of the understanding of the parties under which manual delivery was effected. It is, therefore, unnecessary to consider the propositions advanced relating to the validity of escrows.

There being, then, no absolute delivery of the deed, its recitals cannot be employed against the grantor, as has been attempted; not having direct effect in that respect, it cannot act indirectly upon the parties.

The only proof offered of any change in the terms of the original contract comes from the answer of the defendant, Jones, considered as testimony in the case. The onus probandi is on Jones, who alleges such change. His testimony is rebutted by that of both Mrs. Davie and Fraser, and fails to repel the presumption of the continuance of the contract in the form originally made.

The want of operation in the deed precludes the charge that Mrs. Davie had waived full performance of the terms of the original contract, for no other act of hers is alleged as having produced *that effect. It follows, therefore, that the decree of the Circuit Court was erroneous, and it must be set aside.

The cause must be remanded to the Circuit Court for an inquiry whether the situation of the property and of the parties is such that the deed of trust can take effect in substantial compliance with the terms of the contract between the parties as hereby established, and for a final decree upon the principles hereinbefore stated.

Decree reversed.

*Before Cooke, J., at Lexington, July, 1876.

The facts of the case are fully stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. H. A. Meetze, for appellants.

Mr. J. M. Baxter, for respondent.

October 29th, 1878. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This was an action to recover possession of real estate. The plaintiffs claim under a sheriff's title for the land in dispute, sold under an execution against George Epting, the husband of the defendant Elizabeth, issued to enforce a judgment recovered April 12th, 1869, in an action commenced March 2d, 1868, on two notes under seal, one due November, 1859, and the other due January, 1859. The defence set up by Elizabeth Epting, who is the only real defendant, was a denial of plaintiffs' title, and an allegation "that she is now seized and possessed of said tract of land in fee, and has been so seized and possessed thereof at all times since the 17th day of December, A. D. 1832, under a deed on that day duly and legally executed and delivered to John Chapman, for the defendant, Elizabeth Epting, by Jacob H. King." The terms of this last-mentioned deed, upon which the case will, in large part, depend, were not set out in the "case," but a copy of it has been attached to the "case," of which, it was agreed at the hearing, it should be considered a part. The plaintiffs requested the court to charge the jury "that George Epting, the husband of Elizabeth Epting, had an estate for his life in the lands of his said wife, and that said interest was subject to levy and sale under executions against said George Epting." The Circuit judge refused so to charge, and instructed the jury that the foregoing was "the law of the case prior to the constitution of 1868, but that the right of judgment creditors to levy and sell the real estate of the wife was rendered void by the constitution of 1868;" and the jury were directed to find for the defendants, which they did. The plaintiffs duly excepted.

*In order to sustain the charge of the Circuit judge it would be necessary to give a retrospective operation to the terms of Sec. 8, Art. XIV., of the constitution, securing to married women property held by them at the time of their marriage, as well as that subsequently acquired. The rule, however, is, "that a constitution should operate prospectively only, unless the words employed show a clear intention that it should have a retrospective effect." Cooley on Cons. Lim. 62. In Potter's Dwarris on Stat. 654, it is said: "There is a striking analogy, and generally an entire harmony, between the rules of interpretation of constitutions and those of statutes." And at page 162, in note 9, it is said: "The American authorities are quite uniform on the retrospective effect of statutes. The general rule is that no statute, however positive in its terms, is to be construed as designed to interfere with existing contracts, rights of action or suits, and especially vested rights, unless the intention that it shall so operate is expressly declared, and courts will apply new statutes only to future cases, unless there is something in the very nature of the case or in the language of the new provision which shows that they were intended to have a retrospective operation."

These principles have been fully sustained by our own court in the case of Ex parte Graham, 13 Rich. 277. The language of Sec. 8, Art. XIV., of the constitution, is as follows: "The real and personal property of a woman, held at the time of her marriage, or that which she may thereafter acquire, either by gift, grant, inheritance, devise or otherwise, shall not be subject to levy and sale for her husband's debts, but shall be held by her as her separate property, and may be bequeathed, devised or alienated by her the same as if she was unmarried; provided that no gift or grant from the husband to the wife shall be detrimental to the just claims of his creditors."

It is very manifest that these words of the constitution do not show "a clear intention that it should have a retrospective effect," and it certainly is not "expressly declared" that it shall so operate, nor is there anything "in the nature of the case or in the language" of the constitutional provision which shows that it was intended to have a retrospective operation. We do not *think, therefore, that a retrospective effect can be given to the clause of the constitution now under consideration. But even were we able to give that clause such a construction, the question would still remain whether such a construction would not bring it into conflict with that provision of the constitution of the United States which forbids a state from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts, because, if it did, then some other construction must necessarily be adopted. There can be no doubt but that prior to the constitution of 1868, a husband did, by virtue of his marriage, acquire an estate in the lands of which his wife was then, or might thereafter become, seized, during the coverture, which was a vested interest and liable to be sold under execution against him. If this be so, it would be difficult to escape the conclusion that any statute or constitutional provision of a state, divesting such vested interest and transferring such estate to another, would be in conflict with the constitution of the United States. This estate in the husband is property, and as much liable to the claims of his creditors as any other property he may have, and any legislation of a state, either by constitution or statute, which undertakes to withdraw such property from the reach of his creditors, would be unconstitutional. Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall. 610 [21 L. Ed. 212]; Cochran v. Darcy, 5 S. C. 125. Any estate or interest which the husband, George Epting, may have acquired in the lands of his wife, now in question, was acquired in 1832, when the deed under which the defendants claim was executed, and the subsequent provisions of the constitution of 1868, under any construction which may be given to them, cannot release such estate or interest from the claims of his creditors, who, doubtless, extended credit to him upon the faith of this very interest, the debts upon which the judgment was recovered, under which the land was sold, having been contracted after the interest was acquired and before the adoption of the present constitution. We think, therefore, that plaintiffs' exception was well taken. It is argued, however, that under a proper construction of the deed of 1832, the husband, George Epting, acquired no interest whatever in the land thereby conveyed, but that the title vested in Chapman, for the sole and separate use of Elizabeth, the wife, and therefore never was *liable for the debts of her husband; and that if this be not so, then the wife had an equity to a settlement of the same for her sole and separate use, and that the provisions of the constitution operated as such settlement. These points do not seem to have been raised in the court below, and no instruction was given or asked for on such points, so far as we can discover from the "case" submitted here, though these are the only points made in the brief submitted by the attorney for the respondent.

We might very well, therefore, under the case of Mowry v. Stogner, 3 S. C. 251, decline to enter upon the inquiry as to the proper construction of the deed of 1832, until it had been passed upon in the court below. But as we think this inquiry will be conclusive of the case, we deem it better to enter upon it now, as it may save the delay and expense of another appeal. So much of the language of the deed as is material to the questions involved, is as follows: "I, Jacob H. King, * * * in consideration of the sum of $800, to me paid by John Chapman, * * * have granted, bargained, sold and released unto the said John Chapman, for his daughter Elizabeth, wife of George Epting, a certain tract of land, containing, &c., * * * to have and to hold all and singular the premises before mentioned, unto the said Elizabeth Epting, wife of George Epting, daughter of the above-named John Chapman, her heirs and assigns forever;" with the usual clause warranting the premises to said Elizabeth Epting, her heirs and assigns forever. If we regard this as a deed to John Chapman for the use of Elizabeth Epting rather than as a deed directly to Elizabeth, as to which no question has been raised, though possibly it might have been, the question which we first propose to consider is, whether the statute of uses would not, under the terms of the deed, execute the use and vest the legal estate in Elizabeth. The rule, as we understand it, is that where land is conveyed to one for the use of another, or in trust for the use of another, and the person to whom the conveyance is made, the trustee, has no duties to perform, or where there is nothing for him to do requiring that the legal estate shall remain in him in order to enable him to do what is required, there the statute executes the use and the legal title passes to the person for whose use the grant or conveyance was made. McNish v. Guerard, 4 Strob. *Eq. 66, and Ramsay v. Marsh, 2 McC. 252 [13 Am. Dec. 717]. In this case it is very clear that the supposed trustee had nothing whatever to do, no duty whatever was required of him, for the proper performance of which it was necessary that the legal estate should remain. It cannot be claimed that it was necessary, in order to preserve the separate estate of the wife, for, as we shall see presently, no such estate is provided for by the deed. So that there is nothing in the fact that the conveyance is nominally made to a third person for the use of the wife, which will prevent the marital rights from attaching. The next inquiry is, whether the terms of the deed can be regarded as sufficient to create a separate estate in Mrs. Epting. As Dunkin, Chancellor, says in Wilson v. Bailer, 3 Strob. Eq. 260 [51 Am. Dec. 678], in considering this question we must bear in mind "that a separate estate in a married woman is in derogation of the husband's common law right—that it is the creature of the Court of Chancery—and that unless the intention to exclude the husband is clearly expressed, or arises by necessary implication, the marital right is maintained;" and after declaring that "the absolute terms in which the property is given to the wife, or the amplitude of her enjoyment has never been deemed sufficient to create a separate interest in derogation of the common law right," he proceeds to say: "The implication is, however, necessary, when the estate is declared to be for the sole and separate use of the wife, although the words 'independently of her husband,' or 'without the control of her husband,' are not superadded. So if the wife is authorized to give a receipt, or to do any other act which, as a feme covert, she would not ordinarily do, there is a necessary implication that her separate existence was recognized, and that, in this matter, she was to act and be treated as a feme sole." Now, in the case under consideration, there is no language whatever indicating an intention to exclude the husband, as in Ellis v. Woods, 9 Rich. Eq. 19, and in Martin v. Bell, 9 Rich. Eq. 42 [70 Am. Dec. 200]. The husband is not even mentioned or alluded to, except as a mode of designating the person to be benefited. Nor is there anything in the deed from which an intention to create a separate estate in the wife can be implied. There is no provision that she is to do anything which, as a feme covert, she would not ordinarily do. She is not authorized to *give a receipt for the rents and profits of the land, as in Charles v. Coker, 2 S. C. 122. The land is not even given to her "for her own use and benefit," which, in some of the cases, it has been held was not sufficient to imply a separate estate; but it is simply granted "to John Chapman, for his daughter Elizabeth." The case cannot be brought within either of the three classes mentioned in Nix v. Bradley, 6 Rich. Eq. 48, as covering the several modes of disposition by which a separate estate may be created in favor of a married woman. We do not think, therefore, that the terms of this deed are sufficient to create a separate estate in the wife. See 2 Story's Eq. Jur., §§ 1382–3, where the cases are collected.

Again, it is argued that even if the estate was vested in Mrs. Epting for her separate use by the deed of 1832, yet she had an equity to a settlement therein, and that the provisions of the constitution of 1868 operated as such settlement. The rule on the subject of the wife's equity to a settlement is that whenever the wife's property is under the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, in such a manner that it requires a decree or order of the court to put a party rightfully into possession of it, the court will not deliver it over except upon terms of a settlement being made, unless the wife has been sufficiently provided for out of other property, or unless the wife, upon a private examination, shall waive her right to such settlement. Murray v. Elibank, 1 Wh. & Tu. Lead. Cas. in Eq., note 384; Durr v. Bowyer, 2 McC. Eq. 372; Myers v. Myers, Bail. Eq. 24; Yeldell v. Quarles, Dud. Eq. 55.

So, if land in which the wife is entitled to a distributive share is sold for partition, as long as the fund remains under the control of the court the wife's equity to a settlement will be recognized and enforced upon a proper application for that purpose, because the officer of the court holding the fund has no right to pay the wife's share to the husband without an order of the court. Wardlaw v. Gray, 2 Hill Eq. 644; Ex parte Mobley, 2 Rich. Eq. 56; Hill v. Hill, 1 Strob. Eq. 25–6.

But if the wife's property has been actually reduced into possession by the husband, or is not a mere right, or chose in action, but a complete legal estate vested in the husband, the wife's *equity to a settlement cannot be recognized or enforced. Murray v. Elibank, supra 386; Thomas v. Sheppard, 2 McC. Eq. 36 [16 Am. Dec. 632].

It is true that O'Neall, Judge, does say in Heath v. Heath, 2 Hill Eq. 107, that in Thomas v. Sheppard "the court upon principles and for reasons which are, to my mind, clearly erroneous, refused to set up the wife's equity, yet recognized and acknowledged the rules which I have already stated." But this was a mere dictum, as the question in the two cases was entirely different. For in Heath v. Heath the wife's interest had never been reduced into possession and was still under the control of the court, while in Thomas v. Sheppard the property acquired through the wife had been reduced into possession by the husband, and was no longer within the reach of the Court of Chancery.

Judge O'Neall has not undertaken to indicate the grounds upon which he condemns the decision in Thomas v. Sheppard, and as we are unable to discover any such grounds, but on the contrary regard the decision as in strict conformity to the established principles of law regulating the wife's equity to a settlement, we are quite content to rest this case upon the authority of a decision made by a court consisting of those eminent judges, Nott, Colcock and Johnson.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that George Epting acquired, by virtue of his marriage, a vested legal estate in the land in dispute, which was liable to levy and sale under executions against him, and we see no ground upon which the wife can set up an equity to a settlement therein.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is set aside and a new trial ordered.

Judgment set aside.

WILLARD, C. J., and HASKELL, A. J., concurred.

*(Case No. 625.)

G. D. CARRIER v. W. WASH. THOMPSON

[1. Execution ⟸98.]

An execution which has lost its active energy, may be renewed by the written consent of the judgment debtor, endorsed on the execution and signed by him, without the service of a summons, there being no fraudulent collusion between the plaintiff and defendant in such execution. Guignard v. Glover, Harp. 457, sustained.

[2. Execution ⟸116.]

An execution issued prior to the adoption of the code has a lien upon the personal property of the defendant, even after the expiration of its active energy. Warren, Wallace & Co. v. Jones, 9 S. C. 288.

[3. Execution ⟸111.]

Such lien also attaches to personal property of the execution debtor, acquired after the adoption of the code.

[4. Justices of the Peace ⟸135.]

A sale by a constable under a junior execution issued by a trial justice, will not divest the lien of a senior execution issued in 1869 from the Court of Common Pleas. Blair & Alexander v. Horseby, Dud. 357, and Lenmond v. Short, 3 Strob. 313, doubted, and the cases in this state upon the subject reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 442; Dec. Dig. ⟸135.]

Before Kershaw, J., at Spartanburg, April, 1878.

The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

Upon the trial on appeal in the Circuit Court, the presiding judge signed the following order:

The court finds as matter of fact, that the defendant had no lawful authority to levy upon the mule in dispute.

And as matter of law, that the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the said mule, now in his possession, under his replevin bond.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the appeal herein be dismissed, with costs.

The defendant appealed to this court, upon the grounds that his Honor erred:

1. In holding that an execution issued on December 4th, 1869, upon a judgment rendered on December 1st, 1869, could not be *renewed by the written consent of the defendant in execution, after the expiration of seven years from the original entry of the execution, without application to the court.

2. In holding that the defendant had no lawful authority to levy on the mule in dispute, when the evidence showed that the defendant acted under an execution regularly renewed by the written consent of the defendant in execution.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, for appellant.

The execution of 1869 was a lien upon all the property, real and personal, of J. P. Peace, and did not lose its lien by losing its active energy. 1 Bay 295; 1 McC. 414.

The levy and sale by the constable could not divest the lien of a senior judgment of the Circuit Court, and therefore could confer no title to the purchaser. The trial justice's execution of 1878 did not constitute a lien until actual levy. 1 Hill 277; 1 Hill 286.

After the expiration of its active energy, an execution may be renewed by consent of the defendant in execution without application to the court by scire facias. Harp. 457.

If execution was irregularly renewed, objection cannot be made by third persons. 2. Strob. 220; 1 Bail. 513; 1 Nott & McC. 408.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for respondent.

Even if the sheriff's second execution had been properly issued he would have had no right to levy it upon the mule bought by respondent. The Code, § 316, and its amendments (15 Stat. 872) provide that an execution should create no lien on personal property except by levy. If the mule had been Peace's before the passage of the code (and the onus of proving that was on appellant) Cash's execution would be a lien. But the change in the law was a mere change in the remedy—that lien should date from levy and not from entry—and does not impair the obligation of the contract. Sedg. Stat. and Cons. L., pp. 635, 644; note 350, 659.

If there was lien, it may well be doubted whether constable's levy would not have divested it. Dud. 358.

*The execution upon which the levy was made by respondent was issued without authority of law. Code, § 306; 15 Stat. 872; Sedg. Cons. & Stat. L. 31, note a.

McIVER, A. J. This was an action to recover the possession of a mule, brought before a trial justice, where the plaintiff had a verdict, which, on appeal to the Circuit Court, was sustained; and this is now an appeal from the judgment of the Circuit Court. The plaintiff claimed the mule under a sale made March 2d, 1878, by a constable, under a judgment rendered by a trial justice in 1878. At this sale the defendant, as sheriff, gave notice that the mule, which was about being sold, was subject to the lien of an older judgment, and that the purchaser must pay the purchase money to him. He, however, did not object to the sale. The plaintiff paid the purchase money to the trial justice, which was by him applied to the satisfaction of the said execution in favor of H. H. Thomson, and another execution in his office junior to that. On March 12th, 1878, the defendant, as sheriff, levied upon the mule in the possession of the plaintiff, under an execution lodged in his office on March 2d, 1878, which was a renewal of an execution originally lodged on December 4th, 1869, issued to enforce a judgment obtained in the Court of Common Pleas on December 1st, 1869; and under this levy the defendant claimed. This execution was not renewed in the usual form, by issuing a summons, but under an acknowledgment endorsed upon the original execution, and signed by the defendant in the execution in the following words: "I acknowledge that the judgment in this case has not been paid, and consent that this execution be renewed against me, without application to the court. March 2d, 1878."

It is contended by the respondent—First. That the execution under which appellant claims the property in dispute, was issued without authority of law, inasmuch as the only mode in which an execution can be renewed after the expiration of its active energy is that prescribed by the code, as amended by the act of November 25th, 1873 (15 Stat. 499), viz., by the service of a summons upon the judgment debtor; and that the written con*sent of the judgment debtor will not dispense with the necessity for the service of a summons, and hence that the levy made under this execution, so illegally issued, conferred no title on the sheriff. It will be observed that the language of the act referred to is merely permissive, not imperative: "But after the expiration of its active energy, as aforesaid, the same may be renewed by the service of a summons on the judgment debtor, his heirs, executors or administrators, to show cause, if any he or they may have, why the same shall not be renewed; and if no sufficient cause be shown, the same may be revived." Now, as the only object in issuing the summons is to give the opportunity to the judgment debtor to show cause why the execution should not be renewed, it is difficult to conceive of any reason why the observance of this mere form, not imperatively required, should be demanded, where it appears in writing, upon the record, not only that the judgment debtor has no cause to show, but actually consents to the renewal. Hence, even in the absence of any authority, we would be disposed to hold that an execution may be renewed by the written consent of the judgment debtor, without the service of a summons, in the absence of allegation and proof of fraudulent collusion between the plaintiff and defendants in such execution, (and there is none such here.) But the point has been distinctly decided in the case of Guignard v. Glover, Harp. 457, and is therefore no longer open to question.

Second. The respondent contends that even if the execution under which the levy was made is held to have been properly issued, it had no lien on the property in question, and therefore no title could be acquired by such levy. This proposition is based upon the idea that an execution issued since the adoption of the code, upon a judgment obtained prior to that time, has no lien upon personal property until it is levied. We had occasion, in the recent case of Warren Wallace & Co. v. Jones (MS. decision, filed March 9th, 1878, 9 S. C. 288), to consider this question, and to show that the code, as modified by the amendatory act of November 25th, 1873, could not be so construed as to defeat the lien which such an execution had, even after the expiration of its active energy, upon the personal property of the judgment debtor; *and we deem it unnecessary to encumber this opinion with a repetition of the argument and authorities upon which such conclusion was based.

It is argued, however, in this case, that while this may be true so far as the lien upon property in the possession of the judgment debtor, at the time of the adoption of the code, is concerned, it would not apply to subsequently-acquired property, and that the onus was on the appellant to show that the property here in dispute was in the possession of the judgment debtor at the time of the adoption of the code, in order to bring it within the lien of the execution under which appellant claims. But it must be remembered that executions prior to the code were a lien not only upon the property of the debtor then in his possession, but also upon all that he might thereafter acquire. Brown v. Gilliland, 3 Desaus. 539; Grooms v. Dixon, 5 Strob. 149. Such being the law at the time of the recovery of the judgment upon which the execution in question was issued, and at the time when the contract was made upon which the judgment was founded, the rights of the judgment creditor must be determined by the law as it then stood, and cannot be abridged by subsequent legislation. For, as this court has said in the case of Cochran v. Darcy, 5 S. C. 127, adopting the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall. 610 [21 L. Ed. 212]: "The legal remedies for the enforcement of a contract which belong to it at the time and place where it is made, are a part of its obligation. A state may change them, provided the change involve no impairment of a substantial right." Now, here the substantial right which the judgment creditor had when his contract was made, was the right to a lien upon all his debtor's property as soon as he recovered his judgment and issued his execution—as well upon that which he then had as that which he might subsequently acquire; and to take away the latter would certainly be the "impairment of a substantial right." Indeed, it is difficult to conceive how, if it is unconstitutional for a state to pass a law withdrawing a certain portion of property of a specified kind from the lien of an execution obtained upon a contract entered into before the passage of such law as has been determined by the homestead cases, it would *not be equally unconstitutional to pass a law withdrawing all of another class of property from the lien of such an execution.

Finally, it is argued by the respondent that the lien of the execution under which the appellant claims, was divested by the sale made by the constable under the execution issued to enforce the judgment obtained before the trial justice. This proposition cannot, in our judgment, be maintained, for the judgment and execution issued by the Court of Common Pleas being the oldest in date, it must certainly take precedence of that issued by the trial justice. Kerr v. Montgomery, 1 Hill 277; Robinson v. Cooper, 1 Hill 286.

The proposition contended for by respondent is based upon an inference merely drawn from the point decided in Blair & Alexander v. Horseby, Dud. 357, for certainly the case does not establish any such proposition; and, on the contrary, Richardson, J., in delivering the opinion of the majority of the court, expressly says in speaking of the sale by a constable under a magistrate's execution, junior in date to the execution from the Court of Common Pleas: "It may be questionable whether the sale of the horse was not valid, inasmuch as there had been no previous levy under the senior execution." And again he says: "Supposing the proper rule to be either for or against the validity of the constable's sale," &c., showing very clearly that this case does not decide the point contended, nor does it even contain a dictum to the effect. So that, giving the case its full weight as authority, it furnishes no ground for saying that the sale of property by the constable, bound by the lien of a senior fi. fa., issuing from the Court of Common Pleas, under a junior execution, issued out of an inferior court, divests the lien of the senior fi. fa. and confers a good title on the purchaser. But we do not desire to be understood as committing ourselves to the correctness of the decision in Blair & Alexander v. Horseby. That case was decided by a bare majority of one in a court at which only five judges were present, and as the judge who delivered the opinion of the majority expressed himself in somewhat doubtful terms upon a point which seems to lie at the foundation of the whole question, and as there seems to be great force in the reasoning employed by Butler, Judge, in the dissenting opinion, concurred *in by Evans, J., it may be necessary, when a proper occasion presents itself, to review that decision; especially as it appears to be somewhat inconsistent with other cases on the subject. But as the question does not necessarily arise in the case now under consideration, and was not therefore argued, we do not propose to enter upon the discussion of it further than to present a brief abstract of the cases upon the subject, indicating the points of inconsistency.

There can be no doubt that prior to the adoption of the code of procedure, executions were liens upon personal property from the date of their lodgment in the sheriff's office, even after they had lost their active energy. Snipes v. Sheriff of Charleston, 1 Bay 295; Brown v. Gillilland, 3 Desaus. 539; Greenwood v. Naylor, 1 McC. 414. Indeed, as Nott, J., says in State v. Laval, 4 McC. 342, in speaking of this doctrine: "It is peculiar to this state; but it is too well established now by a series of decisions to be controverted." And as Harper, J., says, in Mitchell v. Anderson, 1 Hill 73 [26 Am. Dec. 158], in speaking of these decisions: "The doctrine established by them has been too long and too firmly settled to be shaken now." If this be so, then it would seem to follow, necessarily, that the sale of property so bound by the lien of an execution, whether made by the execution debtor himself, or by a mortgagee under a junior mortgage, or by a constable under a junior execution from an inferior court, would be made subject to such lien, and the property in the hands of the purchaser would still be bound by the lien of the senior execution.

The cases which treat more especially of the effect of a sale of personal property made by the officer of an inferior court, under an execution issued by such court upon the lien of a senior execution issued out of a superior court, are the following: Greenwood v. Naylor, 1 McC. 414; Kerr v. Montgomery, 1 Hill 277; Robinson v. Cooper, 1 Hill 286; Blair & Alexander v. Horseby, Dud. 357; Alexander v. Collins, 3 Rich. 62; Lemmond v. Short, 3 Strob. 313.

The case of Greenwood v. Naylor, decided in 1821, was a contest between two execution creditors, one of whom had lodged his execution, which was senior in date, in the office of the sheriff of Charleston district, with an endorsement in these words:

*"Lodged to bind;" which were construed to operate as a stay of the execution; while the other had lodged his execution, junior in date, in the office of the city sheriff, with instructions "to levy and sell." Personal property was sold by the city sheriff under the execution in his office, and upon a rule he was required to pay the proceeds of the sale to the senior execution lodged in the office of the district sheriff. The court, in this case, treated the question as if both executions had been lodged in the same office, and the only point really decided in the case is, that an execution which has been stayed does not thereby lose its priority over a junior execution under which the sale was made. The fact that the executions were lodged in different offices, seems to have received little or no attention at the hands of the court, and therefore the case throws but little light upon the question in the case under consideration. The case of Kerr v. Montgomery, decided in 1833, was this: The sheriff levied upon a wagon under executions in his office, and left it in possession of Brown, the judgment debtor; afterwards the plaintiff, as constable, levied on the wagon under a junior execution issued by a magistrate, sold it, and having bid it off himself subsequently sold it to the defendant. The wagon was then seized in the hands of the defendant by the sheriff and sold under the original levy. The action was brought by the constable to recover the amount for which he had sold the wagon to the defendant, who defended himself upon the ground that the sale by the constable conferred no title as against the lien of the senior executions; and his defence was sustained.

This case would seem to be conclusive of the question in the case now before the court. It is true that in the case of Kerr v. Montgomery, the senior executions had been levied, before the levy and sale by the constable, but that circumstance could have had but little, if any weight, in the decision, as it is not even alluded to in the opinion of the court, and on the contrary the decision is placed upon the ground that the property when sold by the constable was bound by the lien of the senior executions, the language used being: "The fi. fa.'s lodged in the sheriff's office against Brown, before the seizure of the wagon, in execution by the constable, were legal liens upon it, and the sale under *them, after the constable's sale and purchase by himself, and his subsequent sale to the defendant, was a regular eviction of the defendant, by a paramount title." And while Richardson, J., in Blair & Alexander v. Horseby, does seem to attach some importance to the fact that the senior executions had been levied before the sale by the constable under the junior execution, that fact is treated by the court as of no importance in the subsequent case of Lemmond v. Short. Indeed, if, as the law then stood, an execution had a lien from the time of its lodgment without levy, it is difficult to conceive how the circumstance that the execution had, or had not, been levied, could affect the question.

Robinson v. Cooper, also decided in 1833, was this: The plaintiff as constable, levied on certain personal property under a magistrate's execution, which was then bound by the lien of a senior execution lodged in the sheriff's office. On the day of sale the sheriff attended with his execution and levied on the property. It was agreed, however, that the sale should proceed, and, if it should be decided by the court that the constable had no right to sell, then the purchase money was not to be paid. The defendant purchased with this understanding, and gave his note to the constable for the amount of his bid. In an action on this note the plaintiff was non-suited, and the non-suit was sustained by the Court of Appeals; the court holding, that while the rule of caveat emptor applies to sales made under process from a court of general or inferior jurisdiction, yet it may be waived or varied by express agreement, as was done in this case; and that the sale by the constable conferred no title. In delivering the opinion of the court, O'Neall, J., uses this language: "In this case the true and only question is, * * * has an execution lodged in the sheriff's office priority over a constable's execution junior in date? There can be no difficulty in answering this question in the affirmative. An execution from a court of general jurisdiction binds the goods of the defendant from the day on which it is lodged in the sheriff's office." It is true that Judge O'Neall throws out the suggestion that if the proceeds of the constable's sale be applied to the senior execution its lien would be discharged, but this was not at all necessary to the decision of the question before the court, and was therefore, *as said by Butler, J., in his dissenting opinion in the case of Blair & Alexander v. Horseby, not "obligatory either on himself or on the court." Indeed, it is obvious from the language used by Mr. Justice O'Neall, while throwing out this suggestion, that he did not design to endorse the doctrine contended for in the case now under consideration; for he says, after deciding the real points arising in the case: "But it is perhaps necessary in this case to go further, and to make it the occasion of considering and deciding the effect which the lodgment of an execution in the sheriff's office might have on sales under levies subsequently made of magistrates' executions; I admit, in the outset, [as we do] that a sale by a sheriff under a junior execution would be good. For having actually or constructively, both executions, the whole authority of the law is in him to make the sale, and it is his duty to apply the proceeds correctly. The lien on the goods is discharged by his sale; for his levy vests the property in him for the purpose of satisfying the liens by execution subsisting on the property. But, I apprehend, a totally different question is presented when it is contended that the levy of an execution of an inferior jurisdiction is to divest the prior lien of an execution of a superior jurisdiction. To discharge the lien of the latter, the proceeds of the sale must be paid over to it; for it is an encumbrance on the property entitled to be levied on it, to the extent of its value. If the proceeds of the sale are paid over to it, it is, in effect, a levy and sale of the goods under it. But, if the sale by the constable under a junior levy, [execution?] could discharge the lien without paying over to the senior execution the proceeds, it would be an easy mode of defeating it, and would, in effect, authorize the defendant to alien his own property."

The case of Blair & Alexander v. Horseby, decided in 1838, was this: The defendant, as constable, sold a horse as the property of one Black, under several magistrates' executions in favor of third persons. The plaintiff, having an execution of older date, issued out of the Court of Common Pleas, of which notice was given to the constable before the sale, he was forbidden to sell. He, however, sold the horse, and the plaintiffs brought this action to recover, as is stated in the report of the case, "the *amount of their judgment and execution"—doubtless meaning the amount of the proceeds of the sale; because certainly the defendant could not, in any view of the case, be made liable for more than he received—the proceeds of the sale. The Circuit judge decreed for plaintiffs, and on appeal his decision was sustained. It is very manifest, as shown by Butler, J., that the principle decided by this case cannot be applied in cases where there are several executions in the sheriff's office, of the same or of different dates, without leading to great and unnecessary confusion, or at least to results that could not readily be accepted. If the several executions are of the same date, then the question would arise, "Which plaintiff shall have the power to elect and recover the money in the hands of the constables?" Or, if of different dates, "Shall the senior creditor have this power alone? If so, he is made the exclusive judge of the liens of others, without their option or control." For surely it could not be held that the constable was liable to the senior execution creditor for the proceeds of the sale, and still the property in the hands of the purchaser be liable to the lien of other executions senior in date to the magistrate's execution under which the constable made his sale. "If the senior execution creditor has exclusively the right to decide on the matter, he may very well save himself, while he compromises the rights of others. To illustrate the case: Suppose that a horse worth $500 should be sold by a constable for $50, and that a creditor with the oldest execution in the sheriff's office should make his election and apply $25 to the payment of a balance to that amount, due on his execution, must the junior creditor be compelled to take the remaining $25, and forego his right of selling the horse for $500, under his execution, by which he could have got $475, instead of $25?" These, and other considerations not necessary to be adverted to now, may well create a doubt whether it would not be better to hold that where property bound by the lien of a senior execution, in the sheriff's office, is sold by a constable under a junior execution, that it is sold subject to the senior lien, and remains liable in the hands of the purchaser to the satisfaction of such lien; and therefore that the senior execution creditor has no lien on the proceeds of such sale, and is not entitled to recover them. It is *undoubtedly true, as established by the case of Paysinger v. Shumpard, 1 Bail. 237, that where one purchases property at private sale, subject to the lien of an execution, of which he has express notice, and subsequently sells the same, he cannot be made liable to the execution creditor, either for the amount he paid for such property or for the amount for which he may have sold it. For, as said by Colcock, J., in that case: "The lien is on the property alone; and a third person coming into possession of it incurs no personal liability to the creditors." It is impossible to reconcile the case of Paysinger v. Shumpard with that of Blair & Alexander v. Horseby: and although the former was decided in 1829, and the latter nine years later, the one does not, even by implication, overrule the other; for the former is cited and recognized as authority in the latter, both in the opinion of the majority and minority of the court. For although in the one case the property was sold at private sale, and in the other by a constable under a magistrate's execution, it is difficult to see how this can affect the question under consideration, though it would make a vast difference if the sale under the junior execution was made by the sheriff, for the reason stated by O'Neall, J., in the case of Robinson v. Cooper, supra, and for the further reason that when a sheriff has several executions in his office, and advertises and sells under one which proves to be invalid, yet nevertheless the sale shall be valid if there is any other good execution in his office at the time; because, in selling he acts under all of the executions in his office, and if any one of them be sufficient to authorize the sale, the sale will be valid. Hence, when he sells under a junior execution, the sale is made by authority of the senior as well as the junior execution, and the lien of all the executions upon the property is thereby divested, and the title of the purchasers is unaffected by such liens. Vance & Davis v. Red & Young, 2 Speers 90; Arnold v. McKellar, (MS. decision filed March 18th, 1878, 9 S. C. 335.)

The next case on the subject, Alexander v. Collins, decided in 1846, was as follows: A constable levied on certain property of A. & C., under a magistrate's execution, which, was bound by a senior execution issued out of the Common Pleas and lodged in *the sheriff's office. The plaintiff, Alexander, who was sheriff, notified the constable of this senior execution, previous to the sale, and required payment of the proceeds of the sale to be made to the senior execution. The constable refusing to do so, this action was brought by Alexander, as sheriff, to recover such proceeds; when it was held that he could not recover. It is true that this decision was based upon the ground that the plaintiff, as sheriff, before he had levied, had no such right as enabled him to bring the action, and the case therefore cannot be regarded as in direct conflict with Blair & Alexander v. Horseby. But Wardlaw, J., in delivering the opinion, does seem to intimate doubts of the authority of that case. His language (the italics being ours) is: "The case of Blair & Alexander v. Horseby, Dud. 357, may be authority for maintaining that a plaintiff in a Circuit Court execution, waiving his right to pursue property of the defendant which was bound by the lien of his execution, and has been sold by a constable under a magistrate's execution, may, after the notice, recover from the constable the proceeds of the sale in his hands. But the general lien of an execution cannot give to the sheriff a right so to recover. After the levy the sheriff acquires an interest in the specific property levied upon, which will sustain his action of trover or trespass against a constable or other person. This interest would, in a contest between the sheriff and a constable who had levied before the sheriff's levy, but after the lien of the execution in the sheriff's hands attached, have relation back to the commencement of the lien, so as to take the property from the constable, or a purchaser from him." The fact that Judge Wardlaw uses such terms in speaking of the case of Blair & Alexander v. Horseby, and the further fact that he dissented in the subsequent case of Lemmond v. Short, would seem to indicate that he agrees with Butler and Evans, JJ., in their dissent from the point decided in Blair & Alexander v. Horseby.

The last case upon the subject is Lemmond v. Short, decided in 1848, in which it was held that where a constable had sold property subject to the lien of an execution from the Court of Common Pleas, after notice from the sheriff that he would claim the proceeds of the sale as applicable to the execution in his *office, and the plaintiff in such senior execution had become the purchaser at the sale, the constable could not recover the amount of his bid from such purchaser because it was applicable to the execution in the sheriff's office, although it had never been levied, and therefore, under the authority of Cobb v. Pressly, 2 McM. 416, such purchaser, under these circumstances, could not be required to pay the money to which he was entitled under his execution even to the sheriff, and consequently not to the constable. This case does recognize the authority of Blair & Alexander v. Horseby; but at the same time recognizes the cases of Kerr v. Montgomery and Robinson v. Cooper as deciding the point in issue in the case now before the court, viz., that a sale by a constable, under a junior execution issued by a magistrate, will not divest the lien of a senior execution from the Court of Common Pleas, and consequently confers no title on the purchaser as against the lien of such senior execution.

Consequently, whether the cases of Blair & Alexander v. Horseby and Lemmond v. Short be or be not considered as authority, the conclusion which we have reached in the case now before the court cannot be affected thereby. The most that they establish is, that the plaintiff in the senior execution may elect to pursue the funds in the hands of the constable arising from the sale made by him; not that he is bound to do so.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is set aside, and a new trial ordered.

Judgment set aside.

WILLARD, C. J., and HASKELL, A. J., concurred.

Before Shaw, J., at Marlborough, March Term, 1876.

Governor Barnabas K. Henagan, of Marlborough district, died in 1854, leaving of force a last will and testament, of which John W. Henagan, J. H. Henagan and J. J. Harllee were appointed executors; the two last named qualified, and James H. Henagan, who was a son of testator, was the chief acting executor. The opinion of the court states so much of the will as is necessary to a proper understanding of the points involved in this case.

The testator left him surviving his widow, four sons, James H., Robert Y., Andrew B. and Samuel F. G., and two daughters, Mary and Alice. Mary afterwards intermarried with Abraham G. Johnson, and Alice intermarried with John T. Northrop. The widow of testator died before action brought.

The executors cultivated the lands of testator before the war and made crops, under the directions of the will. They sold the Grove place (devised to R. Y. Henagan) under a power in the will, to pay debts with. When the war commenced, Harllee removed to Arkansas, where he remained until his death in 1866. J. H. Henagan went into the army. R. Y. Henagan took out letters of administration durante absentia, early in 1862, and, the executor having been killed in battle in July, 1862, administered cum testamento annexo de bonis non on the estate of B. K. Henagan, in May, 1863, and also became administrator of the estate of J. H. Henagan. The heirs-at-law of J. H. Henagan were his surviving brothers and sisters.

*R. Y. Henagan then cultivated crops upon the lands of his father's estate until the end of 1867, after which the devisees took possession of the lands and cultivated them. The administrator sold, in 1868, the Creek place devised to him.

J. H. Henagan, executor, sold six negroes of the estate, with which to pay a large and pressing debt. Subsequently he purchased from C. D. Evans, commissioner in equity, other negroes for the estate, which were worked as estate negroes; and he gave a bond for the amount of their purchase money, upon which payments were afterwards made. R. Y. H., after he administered, purchased a brood mare for the estate.

The two daughters of testator, with their husbands, brought this action in May, 1870, against R. Y. Henagan, as administrator cum testamento annexo of the estate of B. K. Henagan, and as administrator of the estate of J. H. Henagan, for an account of his administration of the two estates, and A. B. Henagan and S. F. G. Henagan were made parties defendant. Before judgment was obtained, Samuel F. G. Henagan died.

The accounting was taken before D. D. McCall, Esq., to whom, as special referee, it was referred. His report is as follows:

D. D. McCall, to whom it was referred as special referee in the above-stated action, to inquire and report upon the actings and doings of R. Y. Henagan, as administrator de bonis non of B. K. Henagan, deceased, with will annexed, would respectfully report:

That during the latter portion of 1870, and also during 1871 and the present year, he has held various references in said action, as will be shown by the testimony taken, which references were for the most part at the instance of the plaintiffs, and related to the crops and expenditures of the plantation known as the "Cannon place" during the years 1863, 1864, and since then up to the present year. The number of references and great amount of testimony taken have been owing in a great measure to the failure of administrator to file with his answer an account current, and from failure to make annual returns for any of the nine years covered by his administration, except 1866, and this return related only to transactions of 1863 and 1864, although made and filed on June 25th, 1866. The referee finds that *the estate has been managed in a reckless and negligent manner from the beginning, by the administrator; that at the time the administrator took charge of estate, it only owed one debt—the bond to W. H. Evans, trustee—and that on this debt only $4000 has been paid by administrator, including the $2000 paid on May 1st, 1873—the day letters of administration were granted to the administrator; while on the other hand large sums were paid out by the administrator upon the debts of J. H. Henagan, for which the estate of B. K. Henagan was in no way responsible; and the result is, that the whole real estate of B. K. Henagan has been sold, and the whole personal property disposed of by the administrator and others, with a heavy judgment still unsettled. The plaintiffs, by their counsel, urged that the seventy bales of cotton sold by the administrator to Johnson & Breeden, on the 11th day of July, 1863, for $13,846.91 (confederate money), should be charged to the administrator as on hand at the close of the war, claiming the conversion of cotton into depreciating confederate currency to be unwarranted. The balance of the cotton not sold by the administrator was saved at the close of the war, and the sale made by the administrator to Johnson & Breeden, viewed by the light of subsequent events, was a very unfortunate one for the estate, not a dollar of the large amount received from this cotton being applied to the debt due by the estate, being refused by the holder of the bond. The referee is disposed to think that the administrator in this sale acted in good faith, and, as he supposed, for the best interest of the estate, and therefore charges him with confederate currency received.

The administrator, in the account current filed by him on the last reference, and also in the return made in 1866, charges himself with fourteen hundred and fifteen bushels corn sold to different persons in the year 1863. There are no dates attached to any of these sales, nor any proven on reference. The referee therefore charges these items in part on March 15th and on November 1st, being governed to some extent by the prices obtained. The same want of dates occurs in regard to sales of corn made in 1864, and referee charges in same manner, and *scales accordingly, although by so doing the price of corn in good money is as low as nine cents per bushel.

The plaintiffs introduced testimony to show that the amount of corn sold during the years 1863 and 1864 greatly exceeded the amount charged; but the evidence was conjectural and uncertain, and the referee has adopted the amount charged in annual return made in 1866.

The referee has, with a great deal of trouble, prepared an account current covering the transactions of said administrator, which is intended as a part of this report, by reference to which will be seen the various items of credit allowed to said administrator. The account of C. Graham, for which the administrator claims credit in 1866, and to which plaintiffs object, the referee allows so much thereof as from the character of the items appears to have been for the plaintiffs or the plantation. The account of E. M. Emanuel, which the administrator claims to have been for the plantation, the referee rejects, except $15, which is allowed for bagging and rope. The items of this account, among which is quite a large one for bagging purchased in the fall of 1865, the estate could have had no use for; and when it is remembered that the administrator says that the items of the account were for the estate, and wishes credit therefor, and at the same time says that the estate for the year 1865 had only from three to five acres in cotton, the referee cannot understand the use the estate would have in November, 1865, for two hundred and seventy yards of bagging and large quantities of rope. For such reasons as this, the amount is not allowed, except as above.

As to the amount of cotton made on the Cannon place in 1866 and 1867, there appears to be considerable difference of opinion. Mr. H. H. Tart, who superintended this plantation in 1866, but did not remain until the crop was prepared for market, says in his testimony that A. B. Henagan reported the cotton made in 1866 at one hundred and seven bales, and in 1867 at one hundred and eleven bales, and that the administrator agreed to these statements, but that he, Tart, did not rely on these reports. This witness, in the opinion of the referee, is one whose veracity cannot be questioned, and who is more intimately acquainted with this place than any one else, having been overseer on it from *1854 to 1859, then in 1861 and 1866. He says that eighty-six bales of cotton were the smallest number ever made on the place within his knowledge, and in going over the crop in the summer of 1867 for the purpose of ascertaining how much it would make, at the request of J. H. Baggett, estimated the cotton at eighty-five bales, and wrote to Baggett accordingly. The administrator, on examination as witness, says that sixty-five bales were made in 1866, which were sent to Baggett, and A. B. Henagan thinks the crop of 1866 sixty or sixty-odd bales, and crop of 1867 about the same.

The administrator says that the crop of 1867 was sixty bales, sold by Baggett and Kirkpatrick. Now, it appears from the testimony of the administrator that the crop of 1866 was five bales more than that of 1867, which, according to the estimate of Mr. Tart of the crop of 1867, would make that of 1866 amount to ninety bales. The administrator, in his testimony, says that all of the items in the estate account of Baggett & Co. were for the estate. In looking over this account the referee finds that on September 20th, 1866, the estate is charged with bill bagging, rope, &c., to amount of $277.64, and on February 2d, 1867, to one bale bagging of five hundred and seventeen yards, amounting to $144.76. The proof before the referee, as to the number of yards of bagging necessary to pack a bale of cotton, taken in connection with the above testimony of the administrator, would lead to the conclusion that the one hundred and seven bales admitted by administrator to Mr. Tart in 1866 (which is denied by him in his evidence, and also by A. B. Henagan) were really below the correct amount. The referee, in view of all the facts of the case, estimates the crop of 1866 at eighty bales, and charges the administrator accordingly. According to the testimony of administrator, six hundred and forty yards of bagging were purchased for the crop of 1867, which would pack at least one hundred bales cotton, and for this year the referee charges the administrator with seventy bales of cotton. In making up the account of 1867, the referee charges the administrator with interest allowed him by J. H. Baggett & Co. on the account, but which is omitted in the account current submitted by the administrator.

By the will of B. K. Henagan, under which the administrator *acted, the plantation was to be worked and debts paid from proceeds of crops; but the administrator claims to have ceased working the plantation for the benefit of the estate after the year 1867, being unable to run same, and charges himself with $300 as rent for 1868, 1869, 1870, and 1871, during which years the lands, stock, &c., were divided out between himself and brothers and cultivated in separate crops. The plantation was not offered to the highest bidder, nor, in the opinion of the referee, attempted to be rented to any one, although the administrator in his testimony speaks of offering to rent to N. S. Rogers, who was examined as a witness in this case, and from whose testimony it might be inferred had already more lands than he could successfully manage, which was no doubt known to the administrator. The plaintiffs claimed that the entire crops of those years should be charged to the administrator, and he failing to show that he was entitled to any credits could not be allowed any.

The testimony of several witnesses examined in this case shows that the usual rent of land in this county is one-fourth cotton and one-third of corn; and Mr. Tart, in estimating what proportion of the crops made on this place should be profits after paying expenses, says that since the war thinks that one-third of the entire crop would pay the expenses, and that two-thirds of each crop ought to be clear. The referee has charged the administrator with one-third of the crops of lint cotton, and one-third of corn made on place during these years, for the use of the plantation, horses, mules, implements, &c., giving to him all the cotton seed, fodder, peas, oats, &c., made, and at the same time takes the estimate of cotton from the testimony of administrator. The $500 worth of goods claimed by administrator to have been turned over to plantation about first 1867, the referee allows, but rejects the amount claimed to have been sold to hands by store in 1866, on the testimony of Northrop and Tart. The referee allows credit for all such items on the account of Baggett & Co., as he considered were for the benefit of the estate. Commissions are not allowed the administrator except for 1866.

The referee charges the administrator with three head of cattle given away by A. B. Henagan in 1871, and with the stock of mules and horses carried from the plantation into Darlington by *the administrator and A. B. Henagan, except the two mules and wagon purchased by A. B. Henagan, and estimates these horses and mules at $500, including the implements, &c., belonging to estate.

The referee finds, that on January 1st, 1872, Robert Y. Henagan, as administrator de bonis non of B. K. Henagan, deceased, was indebted to said estate, as balance in his hands, in the sum of $22,289.23.

To this report exceptions were taken by the plaintiffs, and also by the defendant, R. Y. Henagan, as follows:

The plaintiffs except to the report of D. D. McCall, Esq., referee, filed September 4th, 1872, on the following grounds:

1. Because the referee has sanctioned the sale of seventy bales of cotton in 1863 for confederate money, whereas it is respectfully submitted that such sale was altogether unwarranted, and that the administrator in making such sale exceeded the limits within which his discretion could lawfully be exercised.

2. Because the referee has ignored the fact which is admitted in R. Y. Henagan's answer and established by the proof, that he was in fact appointed administrator early in 1862, instead of in May, 1863, and has failed to charge said administrator with the crop of 1862.

3. Because the referee has not charged the administrator with the full amount of the crops of corn made in 1863 and 1864—five thousand bushels each year—and has only charged him with the amount which he represents himself to have sold in those years.

4. Because the referee has failed to charge the administrator with the twenty-five bales cotton proved to have been on hand in the spring of 1865, after the passage of Gen. Sherman's army.

5. Because the referee has failed to charge the administrator with the full amount of the cotton crops for the years 1866 and 1867, which, according to the testimony, should have been at least eighty-six bales in each year, and which, according to the admission of the administrator, should have been one hundred and seven bales in 1866, and one hundred and eleven bales in 1867.

*6. Because the referee in estimating the amount of the crops for the years subsequent to 1867, has been governed entirely by the testimony of the administrator himself, ignoring the testimony of other and disinterested witnesses.

7. Because the referee failed to charge the administrator with the full value of the stock, farming implements, &c., which he carried off himself and permitted others to carry off from the "Cannon place."

8. Because the referee has failed to charge the administrator with the cotton seed of the crop of 1871.

The following exceptions are made to the report of D. D. McCall, Esq., the special referee in the above-stated case, by the defendant, R. Y. Henagan, administrator:

1. The item of $268 was put in the inventory and appraisement by mistake, and ought not to be charged in the account of the administrator.

2. $11,846.91 of the money received from Johnson & Breeden for cotton, ought to be charged on the 21st, instead of the 11th day of July, 1863.

3. The $850 for the hire of carpenter Sam, and the $135 for the hire of the blacksmith, ought to be charged on January 1st, 1864, instead of the days on which they are charged.

4. The payments made on the bond of J. H. Henagan to C. D. Evans, commissioner, dated April 2d, 1860, which, in 1863, amounted in the aggregate to $5277.13, under the evidence, ought to be allowed as credits.

5. The payments made on notes of J. H. Henagan to W. S. Ellerbee, R. C. Emanuel, Simeon Emanuel, R. C. Hamer, C. Graham, Ambrose & Delaney, J. D. McCulloch, S. Emanuel, ag't, and on the accounts of the same to Harris & Harrell, and on a judgment against the same for $421.32, ought to be allowed as credits to R. Y. Henagan, as administrator of B. K. Henagan.

6. The referee erred in not allowing R. Y. Henagan wages from the time he took charge of the Cannon place, 1861, till the time he took out letters of administration on the estate of his father, in 1863, a period of about two years.

7. The referee erred in charging the administrator with a *thousand bushels of corn, and sixteen thousand pounds of fodder on November 1st, 1864, the evidence being that there was really no sale of the same made, though there were some pledges made to the government for the same.

8. The referee erred in not allowing the administrator in the accounts of 1864 credits for $125, paid by him to M. Iseman for a suit of clothes for himself; for $85 to S. Emanuel, for his sisters, Alice and Mary; for $300 to J. W. Henagan, for board for Alice and Mary; for $1500 to R. C. McIntyre, for brood mare for the estate; for $150 paid dentist in Raleigh, for work on Mary Henagan's teeth.

9. The referee erred in not allowing the fee of $1000 paid Gen. W. W. Harllee, in February, 1865.

10. The referee erred in charging R. Y. Henagan, administrator, with three bales of cotton sold by Baggett & Co., on April 21st, 1866; and with six of the twenty-one bales of cotton sold by C. Graham on May 24th, 1866, the three and the six out of twenty-one being the cotton of R. Y. Henagan individually, and not the cotton of the estate.

11. The referee erred in not crediting the accounts of the administrator for 1866 with $457.53, the purchases made by J. H. Baggett & Co., in 1866, as appears by their account current made up to March 1st, 1868.

12. The referee erred in not giving the administrator credit for the whole amount paid by him on the account of C. Graham, Edwin Bates & Co., and Emanuel, in 1866, except for the items of cash paid A. B. Henagan.

13. If the administrator is not allowed credit for the amounts paid to Mowry & Co., L. D. Mowry & Co., C. Graham and others, because they were debts of J. H. Henagan and not of B. K. Henagan, it is respectfully submitted that the administrator ought to have credit for all the payments he made for the estate of B. K. Henagan with the money of the estate of S. H. Henegan.

14. The referee erred in not allowing the payments made on the accounts of Neil Alford, Alexander Thomas, P. Epstein, and the one to Francis Murphy, for $73.

15. The referee erred in not allowing the administrator credit *for $1024.19, the amount charged in plantation book in 1866 against laborers on plantation; or, if not allowing him that precise amount, he erred in not allowing him credit for one-third of the crop made that year, that being the share of the laborers, and the evidence being that they were paid and that the estate got the whole of the crop.

16. The referee erred in not giving the administrator credit for one hundred and eighty bushels of corn purchased from Fladger in 1867, for $1.40 per bushel; and for fifteen bushels purchased from Hays, in the same year, at $1.50 per bushel, which were used by the estate.

17. The referee erred in not giving the administrator credit for the amounts which he paid H. Tart, overseer's wages for 1866.

18. The referee erred in charging the administrator with $975.06, on account of interest on J. H. Baggett & Co.'s account current.

19. The referee erred in not crediting the account of the administrator for 1867, with so much of the account of J. H. Baggett & Co. for that year as was allowed and paid by sales of cotton during the year, or by money in hand, he having credited the same in 1868.

20. The referee is not supported by the evidence in charging the administrator with a crop of more than sixty-five bales of cotton in 1866, and a crop of more than sixty bales in 1867, the numbers with which the administrator charges himself.

21. It is respectfully submitted that the referee is not sustained by the evidence in concluding that there were more than sixty-two bales made in 1868 on the Cannon place.

22. The referee erred in charging the administrator, in the accounts of 1868, with $6283.14, for the purchase money of the Mill creek plantation: 1st. Because, as administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of the estate, he had no legal right to make the sale; and 2d. If he had the authority to sell, he ought only to be charged with the real value of it, which was proved to be $2000 or less; and 3d. If there was enough money in his hands to pay the debts of the estate, or enough has been made since by rents, &c., he had the right to sell the property as his own, as he did do under the advice of counsel.

*23. It is respectfully submitted that the evidence does not authorize the referee to conclude that there were three hundred and seventy-five bushels of corn and more than seventy bales of cotton made on the Cannon place in 1866.

24. The evidence does not sustain the referee in charging one-third of the corn and cotton made on the Cannon plantation for rent for the years of 1868, 1869, 1870, 1871, and that he only should be charged with the value of the rent as proved.

25. The referee erred in continuing to charge the administrator interest on annual balances after the year 1868, instead of simple interest.

26. The referee erred in charging the rent of the plantation for 1868 in the accounts for 1868, and the same for 1869, 1870 and 1871; and the rent of 1868 ought to be charged in 1869, and so on in all the different years, which is the general rule, and is supported by the evidence in this case.

27. It is respectfully submitted that there can be no decree against the administrator until the personal representative of Samuel F. G. Henagan is before the court.

28. It is respectfully submitted that there can be no decree against R. Y. Henagan, as the administrator of the estate of B. K. Henagan, until there is an accounting on the estate of J. H. Henagan, who was an acting executor of the will of B. K. Henagan, and who was a devisee and legatee under the will of B. K. Henagan, and the rights of his estate and those claiming the same, can be properly arranged in no other way than by closing up his estate first.

29. It is respectfully submitted that the referee ought to have taken down and made a report of all the payments proved to have been made by R. Y. Henagan for the estate of J. H. Henagan and for A. B. Henagan, so they might be deducted from the amounts which he may find to be due to them respectively.

30. It is respectfully submitted, that the referee ought to have made a separate account for the rents and profits of such portion of the Cannon and other property of the estate of B. K. Henagan as were respectively in the possession of R. Y. Henagan, A. B. Henagan, and S. F. G. Henagan, in the years

1868, *1869, 1870 and 1871, so that R. Y. Henagan might have the proper credit for the amounts found against the other brothers.

31. It is respectfully submitted that R. Y. Henagan is, under the provisions of the will of his father, B. K. Henagan, and in consequence of the sale of the Grove plantation for $4000, and the Mill Creek plantation for $6285.14, entitled to the whole balance in his hands, over and above the amount for which the Cannon plantation sold, and the outstanding indebtedness of his late father.

32. It is respectfully submitted that the evidence does not sustain the referee in charging the administrator with $500 for personal property taken off by him from the plantation.

The referee submitted the following report on exceptions:

D. D. McCall, as special referee in the above-stated action, having, on the 4th of September last, filed his report upon the accounts of R. Y. Henagan, as administrator de bonis non of B. K. Henagan, deceased, and having been served with exceptions to said report, both by plaintiffs and the defendant, R. Y. Henagan, administrator, would respectfully submit the following report upon said exceptions:

1. As to the exceptions of said plaintiffs, he would overrule them, for the reasons given in his former report.

2. As to the exceptions of the defendant, the administrator, the referee would respectfully report, that as to the first exception there was no testimony or allegation prior to the filing of the exceptions by the defendant, of any mistake in the inventory and appraisement.

As to the second exception, the scaling of the confederate money received for the cotton was made upon the basis indicated as the correct one in said exceptions, although the referee follows the account current of the administrator as to the mere date used.

As to the third exception, the administrator, in his account current, charges himself with said items in 1863, without giving a day or month; and the referee, by scaling same as of the last day of that year, gives to the defendant the most favorable day possible.

*As to the three foregoing exceptions, and also as to all the other exceptions of the defendant, the referee would respectfully report that after careful consideration he overrules each of them, for the reasons given in his former report, taken in connection with the testimony submitted.

The Circuit decree on exceptions is as follows:

This case came on to be heard upon exceptions to the report of the referee.

I shall not go behind the order of reference, although invited so to do by some of the exceptions of the defendant. To the report of the referee the plaintiff filed eight exceptions, all of which are overruled. I would remark, on the second exception, that the complaint stated the date of the administration of the defendant to be in the year 1863; the answer of defendant admits simply that he administered, and the inventory is dated June 12th, 1863. I might also add, there was no evidence as to the crop of 1862. To the report of the referee the defendant filed thirty-two exceptions, which I shall consider out of their order. Some of the exceptions were abandoned at the hearing.

The eighth exception charges error in the report of the referee in not allowing defendant credit for the sum of $1500, the price of a horse purchased by him from McIntyre.

The defendant states in his evidence that this animal was purchased as a brood mare for the estate. There is no evidence which satisfies me that this statement is untrue, or which throws any reasonable doubt on it. He should be allowed credit for the sum of $1500, scaled according to the act.

The ninth exception claims that the defendant should have credit for the sum of $1000, paid as a fee to Gen. Harllee. It is usual to allow administrators and executors credit in their accounts for reasonable counsel fees. There is nothing in this case which takes this from under the usual rule. The defendant should be credited with the amount of $1000, reduced according to the scaling act.

The eleventh exception charges error in not allowing defendant credit for certain amounts paid for the estate to Baggett & Co.

The administrator is charged with the whole cotton crop of *1866. My judgment is, that he should be charged with two-thirds of the crops for the years 1866 and 1867, and he should be credited with the amount paid Baggett & Co. for bagging and ties purchased for the year 1866; the amount is $277.64. The defendant should pay for the bacon out of his one-third of the crop.

The twenty-second exception will be considered in connection with the thirty-first.

The twenty-fifth exception charges error in the calculation of interest. The rule, as I understand it, is this: The administrator is to be charged with interest on whatever balance appears against him at the end of each year. I observe a charge for interest in the accounts for 1864; the first charge for interest should be in the account for 1865, for the year 1864; the balance against the administrator appearing on the first day of January, 1864, carried interest for that year.

Thirty-first exception claims, in substance, that the administrator, in accounting in this case, is entitled to retain an amount equal to the amount of sales of the Grove and Mill creek plantations. In my judgment, the mention of the Mill creek plantation only leads to unnecessary complication. There should be no charge against the administrator for the amount of the proceeds of Mill creek, for the reason that he held it under the will of the testator, subject only to sale for payment of debts; and if sold for that purpose, he had a right to re-imbursement out of the personal estate, over and above his distributive share. He paid a portion of the proceeds to Baggett & Co., for the benefit of the estate, and has been credited with that amount. The fact that the sum paid Baggett & Co., for estate was proceeds of sale of Mill creek, is entirely immaterial to this litigation.

The Grove plantation was also devised by testator to defendant, subject to same conditions. It was sold by the executor for the payment of the debts of the estate; and my judgment is, that the defendant, as against the estate in this litigation, is entitled to retain the amount for which the Grove plantation was sold, with interest thereon from the date of the sale.

The other exceptions of the defendant are overruled.

It is ordered and decreed that this case be recommitted to the *referee, for the purpose of making a report according to the principles of this decree.

I have filed herewith an explanatory statement to be taken as a part of this decree.

I think it proper to state that the delay in filing my decree in this case has been occasioned by the very complicated character of the case, and my continued ill health since the hearing. John T. Green.

May 5th, 1873.

The referee afterwards reported as follows:

The above-stated case having been recommitted to the undersigned as referee, for the purpose of making a report in accordance with the principles of the decree of his Honor Judge Green, made in said action—

The said referee would respectfully report, that in adjusting said accounting, as directed by said decree, and allowing the credits thereby directed, he finds the balance in the hands of the said Robert Y. Henagan, as administrator of B. K. Henagan, deceased, on this day, to be $1716.16.

The referee would further report, that the Grove plantation was sold and conveyed by the executors of B. K. Henagan on September 4th, 1857, from which time interest has been computed on the amount realized from said sale.

The referee having computed the explanatory statement, filed by his Honor Judge Green, with his decree, refers to same as an exhibit to this report.

The defendants refused to enter up judgment on this report, when the following order was obtained from Judge Shaw, March 8th, 1876:

The special referee in this action having filed his report of January 10th, 1874, upon the accounts of Robert Y. Henagan, as administrator, in which a certain amount is found against the said administrator and in favor of the plaintiffs, which said amount they allege to be much less than they claim to be justly due and owing by said administrator; and the said plaintiffs having given notice to the defendants that they would apply to *this court for leave to enter up judgment in this action, in accordance with the findings of said referee and the decretal order on which the same is based, with a view to appeal therefrom, the defendants having refused and neglected so to do; and argument of counsel having been heard for and against said motion: It is, on motion of plaintiffs' counsel, ordered that said final report of the referee be confirmed and made the judgment of this court, without prejudice to the plaintiffs' right to appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court.

Judgment was accordingly entered up by plaintiffs March 18th, 1876.

Both parties filed exceptions to this judgment as follows:

The plaintiffs except to the judgment in this cause rendered, and the rulings of Judge John T. Green in his decretal order of May 5th, 1873, on which the final judgment is based, in the following particulars assigned as error:

1. In that the judge in his decree of May 5th, 1873, erred in overruling the exceptions which the plaintiffs took to the referee's report of September 4th, 1872; and the final judgment in accordance with said decree is erroneous for the reasons set forth in said exceptions, which said exceptions are renewed as to said decree and final judgment.

2. In that said decree of May 5th 1873, is erroneous in sustaining the 8th, 9th, 11th, 22d, 25th, and 31st exceptions of the defendant, R. Y. Henagan, to the referee's report of September 4th, 1872, which said exceptions, it is submitted, should have been entirely overruled, and the referee sustained in these points, and the final judgment conforming to said decree in this respect is erroneous.

3. In that the explanatory statement accompanying and forming part of said decree and constituting the basis of the final judgment, is erroneous, being contrary to the principles governing the mode of stating the accounts of administrators, in calculating interest on annual balances, especially where annual returns are not made and no regular accounts kept.

4. In that said decree and final judgment should have been *in accordance with the rulings and findings of the referee in his report of September 4th, 1872, modified only in those particulars claimed by the plaintiffs in their exceptions thereto, which said report, corrected upon the basis of said exceptions, should have been made the judgment in the cause, and it was error to have held otherwise.

The defendant, Robert Y. Henagan, excepts to the judgment rendered by Judge A. J. Shaw, on the 18th day of March, 1876, in this, that he gives the plaintiffs judgment upon their own order, and that without any prejudice to their right to appeal from the same; and he also excepts to the rulings of Judge John T. Green, in his decretal order of May 5th, 1873, on which the final judgment is based in the following particulars assigned as errors:

1. In that the judge, in his decree of May 5th, 1873, erred in not sustaining the 27th and 28th exceptions of the defendant, R. Y. Henagan, to the report of the referee of September 4th, 1872, which exceptions are renewed to said decree and final judgment.

2. In that the judge, in his decree of May 5th, 1873, erred in overruling all the exceptions which the defendants took to the referee's report of Sept. 4th, 1872, except the 8th, 9th, 11th, 22d, 25th and 31st, and the final judgment in accordance with said decree, for the reasons assigned in the overruled exceptions; which last-named exceptions are renewed as to said decree and final judgment.

3. In that the judge, in his decree of May 5th, 1873, erred in overruling the whole of the defendant's 8th exception, except the item of $1500 paid R. C. McIntyre for a brood mare; which exception, except so far as was sustained by his Honor, is renewed as to said decree and final judgment.

4. In that the judge, in his decree of May 5th, 1873, erred in overruling the exceptions of the defendant to the report of the referee of Sept. 4th, 1872, except so far only as the exceptions were sustained by the decree; and with that exception they are now renewed.

The plaintiffs and Robert Y. Henagan appealed to the Supreme Court upon the grounds set forth in their several exceptions.

*Mr. J. H. Hudson for plaintiffs.

November 20th, 1878. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The action is by two of the legatees of B. K. Henagan, for an account against R. Y. Henagan, as administrator cum testamento annexo of the original testator, B. K. Henagan, and also as administrator of J. H. Henagan, who was, until his death, sole acting executor under the will of said B. K. Henagan. The interests of the plaintiffs, joined as such with their husbands, and who are styled by the will "Mary and Alice," consisted, under the will, of two undivided one-sixth parts of the personal estate, a portion of which was given to the wife of the testator for life, with remainder to the children; Mary and Alice took two sixth parts of the remainder in the personal estate given to the wife for life, and two-sixths of the balance of the personal estate.

The portion of Mary and Alice was given to J. H. Henagan, the sole acting executor, in trust, with remainders over in case either daughter should die, leaving no issue surviving her. The testator devised the "Cannon place" to J. H. Henagan and A. B. Henagan, and the "Glover land" and "Mill creek" places to the defendant, R. Y. Henagan.

The testator directs that his estate, both real and personal, "shall remain undivided until all my debts are paid and satisfied." He also directs that "crops made on the lands shall pay my debts. But that in the event that the proceeds arising from the crops and otherwise are not sufficient, then I desire my executors hereafter named to dispose of a sufficiency of personal property to pay the same; or, if my executors think best, they are empowered to sell a part or the whole of the lands given to my son, Robert Y. Henagan. If the executors should, in their judgment, dispose of a part or the whole of the lands above described, given to my son, Robert Y. Henagan, then and in that case I desire my son Robert shall be entitled, out of my personal property, over and above his distributive share, to the amount the land may sell for, above specified."

*The will contains provisions looking to a certain contingency upon which the proportionate shares of Mary and Alice may be increased out of the amount given to Samuel, one of the testator's sons; but it does not appear that such contingency has happened.

J. H. Henagan, J. W. Henagan and J. J. Harllee were appointed executors.

The complaint prays a general accounting as administrator cum testamento annexo, and as administrator of the deceased executor, and that plaintiffs may be paid their proper proportion of the estate.

The complaint alleges the death of the trustee of Mary and Alice, J. H. Henagan, but does not allege the appointment of a trustee in the place of such deceased trustee. The purposes of the trust cannot be satisfied during the lifetime of Mary and Alice, as the remainder over, on the contingency of their dying without issue, needs the support of the trust; the trust was also for their protection against the marital rights of their husbands. No attention appears to have been paid to these facts by either party, and no order appears to have been taken for the appointment of a trustee.

The wife of testator died before action brought, consequently the plaintiffs, Mary and Alice, were entitled, at that time, to one undivided sixth each of the personal property of which the testator died possessed, subject to the payment of the debts of the estate in the manner prescribed by the will.

The decree ascertains a certain sum to be due from the defendant, R. Y. Henagan, as administrator cum testamento annexo of B. K. Henagan, and directs payment of this sum among the several parties entitled as legatees or devisees under the will of B. K. Henagan, according to their respective shares. The plaintiffs, and the defendant, R. Y. Henagan, have appealed from the decree. The other defendants have not appealed, consequently their only interest in the appeal relates to supporting the decree as against the appeal of R. Y. Henagan.

The appeals bring to notice many exceptions taken to the report of the referee and the decree of the Circuit Court. In order to understand the interests of the parties excepting and appealing, it will be necessary to state, with some degree of *accuracy, their respective interests under the provisions of the will, and then it will be possible to trace the bearing of the questions raised, by way of exception, in the interests of the respective parties. We shall, in this way, discover what questions are material to be considered, and what are not.

We will first consider the interest of Mary and Alice under the will, as affected by the question raised on the accounting. Their sole interest is, as cestuis que trust, to have placed in trust that part of the estate of their testator devised to them through his will. Their only interest, under the will, is in the personal estate left by the testator; as to part of that personal estate, their interest commenced at the death of the testator, and as to the remaining part, at the death of their mother, the life tenant. The liability of the personal estate, as the primary fund for the payment of debts, is in part disturbed by the will. The realty and personalty are to be kept together until the debts are paid and satisfied. The personalty and realty combined constituted plantation property. The crops to be made upon the lands in the hands of the executors were designated as the primary fund for the payment of the debts of the estate. These crops were to be made by the united employment of that part of the realty and personalty that was available for that purpose. If the crops were insufficient for that purpose, then resort was to be had to the personalty for that purpose.

Authority is given to the executors to sell the "Glover land" and "Mill creek" property, devised to the defendant, R. Y. Henagan; in which case R. Y. H. is to be compensated therefor out of the personal estate, independent of his distributive share therein. "Mary and Alice" are clearly interested to have the produce of the plantation, over and above its current expenses, applied to the payment of debts, so as to relieve the personalty devised, as far as possible, from contribution to that purpose. If it appears that the crops were insufficient for that purpose, then to the extent of the actual payment of the debts, over and above the amount derived from the crops and applicable thereto, the defendant, R. Y. H., is entitled, as administrator, to be allowed such amount, as against the other of the personalty charged against him. If any debts remain unpaid, he is also *entitled to retain, for the purpose of applying to the payment thereof, so much of the amount that may be found chargeable against him, on account of the personalty that came into his hands, as may be necessary for that purpose. It follows that the plaintiffs are entitled to the consideration of all questions raised by their exceptions, as by those of the defendant, R. Y. Henagan, that affect the amount and value of the personalty that came into the hands of J. H. Henagan, as executor, and of the defendant, R. Y. Henagan, as administrator cum testamento annexo, and as administrator of J. H. Henagan, the executor, and the disposition of the same; also of such questions as affect the amount and value of the produce of the lands and the application thereof.

To avoid complexity, the questions at issue will be examined as raised by the exceptions to the referee's report. It is said in the decree of Judge Green, that some of the exceptions taken by the defendant, R. Y. Henagan, to the referee's report, were abandoned before him. It is not, however, stated which of them were abandoned, and as there is no other evidence of abandonment in the case, they must, therefore, be considered.

Plaintiff's Exceptions to Referee's Report.

1. Objects to the allowance of the referee of a claim made by the administrator for the sale of seventy bales of cotton, produced on the lands subsequent to the death of the testator, for confederate currency. The allowance was proper. The cotton was produced under the authority of the will for the purpose of paying debts. It was a necessary inference that the product was to be sold from time to time to pay current expenses of planting and produce a balance for payment of debts. There was clear implied power to sell. The fact that confederate currency was taken, was an ordinary incident of the transactions of that class at that time. It does not appear that the cotton was sold for less currency than, at its current purchasing rate, represented the market value of the cotton. The bona fides of the transaction is sustained by the referee, and there is no ground to disturb his conclusion. State v. Moseley, 10 S. C. 1. The exception was not well taken.

*2. This exception must be overruled. There is no proof that letters of administration cum testamento annexo, and of the estate of J. H. Henagan, were issued prior to 1863. The complaint does not lay the foundation for an account as administrator durante absentia.

3, 4, 5, 6 and 8. These exceptions involve a question of fact purely, namely, the amount produced during certain years upon the lands of the testator, appropriate to the payment of debts under the will. The conclusions of the referee are drawn from conflicting evidence, in which questions of the credibility and accuracy of testimony largely enter. Such questions belong peculiarly to the court that tries the issues of fact in the first instance, and involve important inferences of fact. We cannot see that the conclusions of the referee on this subject are overborne by any clear weight of undisputed testimony, or are unfounded in the evidence. These exceptions are not well taken.

7. This exception is, "because the referee has failed to charge the administrator with the full value of the stock, farming implements, &c., which he carried off himself and permitted others to carry off from the 'Cannon place.'" There has not been such a statement of the account as to enable us to determine what allowance, if any, should be made to the plaintiffs by reason of the loss or disposition of personalty on the Cannon place at the decease of the testator. The principles of the accounting in this respect, should be as follows: The trust account for "Mary and Alice" must be credited with two sixth parts of the value of the personal property, other than that in which testator's wife had a life interest as of the date of testator's death, and of the residue of the personalty on that place, as of the death of the tenant. As this exception only relates to the "Cannon place," the account must be so stated only as it regards the personalty on that place. To this must be added the value of all other personalty chargeable in favor of the plaintiffs, as finally fixed by this decision, taking the report of the referee first made as the basis of computation. From this must be deducted all personal property lost or destroyed by natural causes or unavoidable casualty, without the fault of the administrator; also, the amount, if any, and all sums paid for the indebtedness of the testator, over and above the amount realized for that purpose out of the crops raised upon *the lands of the testator. The defendant, R. Y. Henagan, must be allowed, out of the balance, any amount paid on account of the debts of the testator existing at his death, out of the proceeds of the sale of the "Cannon," "Mill creek" and "Glover" places. The Cannon place was devised absolutely to J. H. Henagan and A. B. Henagan, and was not liable to the payment of the debts by the will, except as it should be used for making crops for the estate, and the administrator of J. H. Henagan is entitled to a credit for any moneys derived from the sale of that place, applied to the payment of the debts of the testator. So the Mill creek and Glover places were devised to the defendant, R. Y. Henagan, and he must be credited with any part of the proceeds of the sale of those places that was applied to the payment of the debts of the testator. As the account appears to be taken on different principles, it will have to be restated in this respect; but as to its items, it will only be re-opened to the extent rendered necessary by this decision.

Defendant, R. Y. Henagan's, Exceptions to Referee's Report.

1. The item of $268, charged as cash in inventory, is not sufficiently explained to remove the inference from its appearing in the inventory. The inventory is not before us and the conclusion of the referee must stand.

2. The duty of scaling, referred to in this exception, appears, by the referee's report on the exception, to have been the basis of the scaling by him, although entries are made in the account as of different days. The argument of the defendant does not dispute the correctness of this statement made by the referee in this respect and it must stand.

3. The objection to the charge of the hire for a blacksmith and a carpenter in 1863 instead of 1864, is placed by the argument on the sole ground that it is by the custom of the country chargeable on the following January. It must be presumed that the charge was made according to the fact, and that was the correct mode of charging.

4. The amount paid by the administrator for the purchase of slaves was not a proper item of charge. He had no authority *to purchase for the account of the legatees of the personalty by the will, nor had he authority to substitute other property for that devised. If the necessities of planting for the estate could under any circumstances have authorized it, still that fact is not made out. Whether property sold or otherwise lost can be properly accounted for by other similar property acquired to the estate, is a question that cannot arise under this exception which involves merely the question whether debts created by the administrator for the purchase of permanent property can be ranked as debts of the testator, as against the personalty.

5. This exception is in part disposed of by what is said as to purchasers for the estate, under the last preceding exception. As it regards the other portions of this exception, the evidence referred to in support is too vague and indefinite to afford ground for disturbing the referee's conclusions.

6. As the question of the settlement of the defendant, R. Y. Henagan's account, as administrator durante absentia, is not open, the charge for his wages while in charge of the Cannon place, before letters of administration were taken out on the estate of R. K. Henagan cum testamento annexo, and on the estate of J. H. Henagan, cannot be considered.

7. This exception depends upon inferential conclusions to be drawn from conflicting testimony, and cannot be allowed, for want of overbearing testimony.

8. The referee properly rejected the demand of the plaintiff for a suit of clothes for himself. If this is intended to cover a claim for personal services, it cannot be so considered, as it is not properly connected with that subject. The evidence claimed as supporting the claim for money paid to S. Emanuel has not been found, possibly owing to the fact that no particular reference to the folio where found was made, as required by the rules of this court. The claim of $300 for the board of Alice and Mary was, probably, a gratuity merely, and, as such, not chargeable. The purchase of a brood mare is already disposed of by what has been held as to that class of purchases; such purchases are not chargeable against the legatees. The testimony as to payment for dentist's work is not referred to by folio, and has not been found. This exception is not well taken.

*9. The charge of $1000 paid as counsel fee, is not supported by the facts, sufficient to enable the court to judge of its necessity and propriety.

10. This exception depends on the credibility and accuracy of the testimony of the defendant, R. Y. Henagan. The character of the testimony is such that a view opposite to that taken by the referee, is not a necessary inference. This exception is not well taken.

11. The accounts rendered by parties dealing with the administrator, are not, in themselves, proof of disbursements. This exception is not well taken.

12. The referee was justified in not crediting amounts paid for articles purchased, unless satisfied, by evidence, that they were proper disbursements for the protection of the personal estate, and the cultivation of crops for the benefit of the estate. This exception is not well taken.

13. It must be assumed, upon the testimony and findings of the referee, that the money paid for the debt of J. H. Henagan came from the assets of B. K. Henagan. J. H. Henagan was entitled to a distributive share of the personal estate of B. K. Henagan, and to that share R. Y. Henagan must look for reimbursement. As the object of the present accounting was, among other things, to ascertain the amount of the share of J. H. Henagan, as well as the other legatees, that credit cannot come into the present account. This exception is not well taken.

14. The account of Niel Alford was not proved—it was conjectured merely. No proof was offered that the account of A. Thomas was chargeable to the estate. The account of King and Cassidy was not sufficiently explained. The statement that the account of P. Epstein was for the benefit of the estate, was insufficient as proof, as it does not appear that the benefit was of the nature that could justify expenditure by the administrator. This exception is not well taken.

15. The item of $1024.19 was not sufficiently proved by the mercantile books of Henagan & Northrop; these books required proof. The transactions between the hands and the store of H. & N., are not entitled to be admitted into the account, without additional proof that such transactions cover advances *made for the production of crops for the estate. This exception is not well taken.

16. The statement that corn was purchased for "estate purposes," is insufficient; nor was the statement that corn was "used on the plantation" sufficient, as there may have been other uses for it than such as concerned the case of the stock belonging to the estate and making the crops. This exception is not well taken.

17. The testimony as to payments to Tait, as overseer for 1866, is too indefinite and uncertain to afford ground to disturb the conclusion of the referee. This exception was not well taken.

18 and 19. The account of J. H. Baggett & Co. will have to be restated. The items allowed should be stated in the several years in which the transactions that constituted that account occurred. It does not appear with sufficient clearness what items of the account were allowed. The allowance of interest must be revised accordingly. The administrator must be allowed interest on all items of that account allowed as a credit against interest charged. These exceptions must be sustained to the extent just stated.

20, 21 and 23. The subjects of these exceptions have already been disposed of, as they relate to the quantity of produce, fixed by the referee on disputable testimony—for this reason, the conclusion of the referee cannot be disturbed. These exceptions are not well taken.

22. The legatees are not entitled to be credited with the value of the Mill creek place, as that place was specifically devised, and if sold to pay debts, the amount used for that purpose was to be replaced out of the personalty. This exception was not well taken.

24. The referee erred in charging for the use of the plantation for the years 1868, 1869 and 1871. The plantation, independently of the personalty, was not subject to the claims of the legatees, and its rental could not be charged for the benefit of the legatees of the personalty. The use of the personalty by the administrator, or by others with his assent, in planting in these years, should be compensated to the legatees, on the principle that when the administrator ceased to plant for the estate he *held the personalty for division alone, subject to the usual liability in such cases. The devotion of the lands to cultivation for the relief of the personalty was not absolute, but to some extent dependent on the discretion of the executor during his life; we cannot say that the administrator cum testamento annexo was bound indefinitely, as it regards time and circumstances, to continue planting, nor is there a proper foundation in the pleadings and proofs, to charge the administrator cum testamento annexo, as for a breach of duty in ceasing to plant for the estate. The account must be reformed in this respect.

25. Interest is improperly charged in the account after 1868. The rule of computation, in such cases, was laid down by this court in the case of Livingston v. Wells, [8 S. C. 347] S. C., April Term, 1876, and need not be recited. The interest account, subsequent to 1868, must, under this exception, be conformed to that rule.

26. This is substantially disposed of by the conclusion stated under the twenty-fourth exception, calling for a revision of the account as it regards the annual rent charged. The rent for the use of the personalty should be charged in the year in which the property was used.

27. The want of representation in this action, on the part of S. F. G. Henagan, is not material to the stating of the account as affecting the interests of the plaintiffs. If all the proper parties were not before the court, it was within the power of the administrator to cause them to be brought in, and, failing to do so, he can gain no advantage, as against the plaintiffs, from their absence. This exception was not well taken.

28. If the settlement of the estate of J. H. Henagan was material, in order to reach the indebtedness of the administrator of B. K. Henagan, then the administrator should have brought forward his accounts, as such administrator—that accounting being open under the pleadings; and, failing to do so, it must be assumed that such a settlement is unnecessary. The estate of J. H. Henagan is only incidentally concerned in the accounting, as affecting the legatees of B. K. Henagan, and to the extent only of the assets of B. K. Henagan that came into the hands of J. H. Henagan. This exception is not well taken.

29. As it regards the subject of this exception, the referee *appears to have stated the account as fully as the evidence would admit of. The referee was not bound to assume the truth and accuracy of verbal statements made by R. Y. Henagan, not accompanied by proper vouchers, nor can this court make such assumption as against the referee's report. This exception is not well taken.

30. In view of what has already been said as to rent subsequent to 1868, this exception need not be further considered.

31. The principle on which the account should be stated, as it regards the sale of the Grove and Mill creek places, has already been stated, and disposes of all matter that need be considered under this exception.

32. This exception involves the effect of disputable evidence, and affords no ground for disturbing the referee's conclusions. There must, however, be a statement of the amounts chargeable to the administrator on account of personal property of the estate, improperly disposed of and unaccounted for, subject to the limitations herein stated.

It will not be necessary to notice any of the exceptions interposed to the final judgment, except that of the defendant, which seeks to exclude the plaintiffs from reviewing the ground on which the judgment was taken, for the reason that the judgment was entered, in form, by the plaintiffs. The act of entering judgment was formal, merely, and cannot be considered as a waiver of the objection that existed to the decree embodied in that judgment, and which were in invitum. The other exceptions are already disposed of.

The judgment and decree of the Circuit Court, so far as it is not in accordance with the general and particular conclusions stated, must be set aside, and the first and final reports of the referee must be modified according hereto, and there must be an account upon the principles above stated, in which all matters finally determined by the decree and report of the referee, and not disturbed hereby, shall stand established as between the plaintiffs and the defendant, R. Y. Henagan; and as against the other defendants, parties to the suit, the account must be opened only to the extent of the matters determined under the appeal *by the defendant, R. Y. Henagan, as affecting defendants made parties by proper proceedings.

There must be provision also made for the ascertainment and payment of the debts, if any still due, provided for by the will, and after the payment of such debts, or provision made therefore, the amount, if any, due the plaintiffs must be ascertained, and a trustee appointed, and a decree taken for them in accordance with the foregoing conclusions, with liberty to the other defendants properly represented before the court, or who may become so represented, to move for such order or decree as may be proper in the premises.

Decree modified.

HASKELL, A. J., and KERSHAW, Acting A. J., concurred.

BLAKELY & COPELAND v. WILLIAM H. FRAZIER and WILLIAM A. SANDERS, as Executors of Marshall Frazier, Deceased.

An action was instituted in 1871 in the county where plaintiffs lived; after the amendment to the code, adopted November, 1873, and after answers put in, an application was made by defendants to have place of trial changed to the county wherein they resided, and was refused, and defendants at the trial again objected to the venue and the objection was overruled. Held, that such rulings were denials of substantial rights material to the defence, secured by statute, and were erroneous.

Before Cooke, J., Richland, May, 1876.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs against the executors of Marshall Frazier, deceased, to recover a certain amount of money paid by plaintiffs under the following circumstances:

In March, 1866, the house of Marshall, Beach & Co., of Charleston, received through Blakely & Copeland, of Columbia, two hundred and eleven bales of cotton, which belonged to Marshall Frazier, of Edgefield, Frazier, in person, delivering to Marshall, Beach & Co. the letter of advice written by Blakely & Copeland, which accompanied the shipment of the cotton. The cotton was sent by Marshall, Beach & Co., to Beach, Root & Co., of Liverpool, and Frazier was given a letter of credit to Salomon, Root & Co., of New York, by which he drew from the New York house $20,000 as an advance upon this shipment. The Charleston, New York and Liverpool houses were composed of the same individuals as partners, and were identical in interest. A check on a New York bank, payable to Frazier and endorsed by him, was produced in court by E. W. Marshall, *head of the Charleston house, having been accounted for by the Charleston firm in its settlements with the New York house, and received by Marshall, Beach & Co. from Salomon, Root & Co. in due course of business: and Frazier subsequently acknowledged to E. W. Marshall that he had received the money. According to the testimony of E. W. Marshall, it is the custom of merchants through whom produce is shipped, that advances go forward with the shipment as a charge thereon, and are paid from the sales of the produce. As soon as Salomon, Root & Co. advanced the $20,000 to Frazier, they wrote to Beach, Root & Co. informing them of the advance and sent the account forward, reducing it to pounds, shillings and pence, at the prices that day prevailing in New York for sterling exchange on Liverpool. According to account-sales rendered by Beach, Root & Co. it appeared that this draft was paid May 1st, 1866, it being £4186 5s. 6d.

In May and June, 1866, this cotton was sold in Liverpool and fell short of paying charges and advances by £778 11s. 4d. This amount was paid by Marshall, Beach & Co., and its repayment demanded by them of Blakely & Copeland; afterwards at B. & C.'s request, demand was made upon Marshall Frazier for this amount. Frazier thought Blakely & Copeland were primarily liable. The question, who was primarily liable to Marshall, Beach & Co.—Blakely & Copeland or Frazier—was submitted to Gov. F. W. Pickens, selected by Frazier, and Wm. M. Martin, selected by Marshall, Beach & Co., who awarded as follows:

"We, the undersigned, agree and decide that the said Blakely & Copeland were factors of the said cotton, and in the first instance directly responsible for all said reclamation." Signed by the arbitrators and dated November 19th, 1866.

On December 10th, following, Blakely & Copeland paid to Marshall, Beach & Co. £778 11s. 4d. "at the current rate of exchange this day, say $6.70 per pound sterling, making the sum of $5216.40 United States currency," balance due on account of the shipment of cotton made by M. Frazier.

To recover this amount, Blakely & Copeland brought their action against Marshall Frazier, in Edgefield district, February 16th, 1867, and the same on motion of plaintiffs' attorneys was *ordered by Judge Melton to be discontinued and plaintiffs pay the costs, July 18th, 1870. In August of the same year, Marshall Frazier died. Another suit on same cause of action by same plaintiffs against W. H. Frazier, executor of M. Frazier, was instituted in Richland county, in August, 1871. W. H. Frazier, in his answer, objected that Wm. A. Sanders, his co-executor, had not been made a party. On March 2d, 1872, Judge Melton "Ordered, that the plaintiffs have leave to amend their summons and complaint in this action by adding the name of William A. Sanders, one of the executors of Marshall Frazier, deceased, as a defendant in this action." Another order to same effect was passed by Judge Carpenter, October 25th, 1873, which reads as follows:

1. That the above case be withdrawn from the jury, and that the same be continued.

2. That the plaintiffs have leave to amend their complaint within thirty days by making as a party defendant, William A. Sanders, as co-executor of Wm. H. Frazier, of the last will and testament of Marshall Frazier, with apt words to charge him.

Summons under this order was dated November 19th, 1873; entered in the sheriff's office at Edgefield, January 7th, 1874; served, together with amended complaint, on Sanders, January 14th; entered in the sheriff's office at Greenville, March 24th, and served together with amended complaint on W. H. Frazier, March 27th. Amended complaint was filed in the clerk's office in Columbia, November 22d, 1873.

The defendants denied any liability for the money claimed; denied that the payment was made at request of M. Frazier; denied overdraft on cotton; plead statute of limitations; that the amended complaint and summons had not been served, or attempted to be served, within thirty days, as required by the order; and that the costs in the action brought against their testator in Edgefield had not been paid.

At May Term, 1875, of the court for Richland, it was objected to the jurisdiction of the court that the action was properly triable only in Edgefield county, and the court was requested so to order. Judge Carpenter refused, and the defendants excepted. At the trial of the cause in May, 1876, the same objection and *request was made, and Judge Cooke overruled the objection and refused the request, and the defendants excepted.

At the trial objection was made by defendants to testimony by E. W. Marshall, of Marshall, Beach & Co., and by J. M. Blakely, one of the plaintiffs, as to conversations relating to the matters at issue had by such witnesses with Marshall Frazier, during his lifetime; they were admitted and defendants excepted.

The complaint alleged that plaintiffs were partners when payment of the reclamation was made in December, 1866; a witness testified that the firm was dissolved in December, 1866.

According to one of the witnesses, "Reclamation is, where there is a deficiency, as in this case, the claim made for a payment of such deficiency."

No proof was offered of the correctness of the accounts rendered by Beach, Root & Co., of the sales of the cotton: but such account sales, received by Marshall, Beach & Co. from Beach, Root & Co., were put in evidence.

At the trial the defendants made the following requests for rulings and charges:

The defendants requested the court to rule that this action could not be maintained, because the costs of the former suit of the same plaintiffs against Marshall Frazier had not been paid when this action was commenced against William H. Frazier, executor, and were not paid until long after the said William H. Frazier, executor, had answered plaintiffs' complaint, setting up this, among other grounds of defence. The court refused to rule as requested; whereupon defendants excepted.

The defendants requested the court to rule that the plaintiffs could not proceed with this action against William A. Sanders, executor, on two grounds:

1. That the order of the court, October 25th, 1873, not having authorized plaintiffs to amend the summons by adding William Sanders as a party defendant, their doing so was unauthorized, and set up as a ground of defence by Sanders in his answer.

2. That the order of the court, October 25th, 1875, granting leave to plaintiffs to amend their complaint within thirty days, by making as a party defendant William A.

Sanders, as co-execu*tor of William H. Frazier, of the last will and testament of Marshall Frazier, with apt words to charge him, had not been complied with, as appeared on the record. The court refused so to rule, and the defendants excepted.

The defendants requested his Honor to charge the jury that the liability incurred by M. Frazier to plaintiffs, if any such liability was incurred, arose upon the sale of the cotton in Europe, or, at latest, when the proceeds of sale fell due; and the statutes of limitation ran therefrom in his favor. His Honor refused this request, and the defendants excepted.

The defendants requested his Honor to charge the jury that the statutes of limitation ran in favor of the defendants until process was lodged with the proper officer for service upon them both. His Honor refused this request, and the defendants excepted.

The defendants requested his Honor to charge the jury that the defendants could not answer as executors of M. Frazier until process was served upon them both, and that there was no action properly instituted until process was lodged with the proper officer for service upon both of them. His Honor refused this request, and defendants excepted.

The defendants requested his Honor to charge the jury that the statutes of limitation ran in favor of the defendant, Sanders, until the lodgment of process with the proper officer for service upon him. His Honor refused this request, and the defendants excepted.

The defendants requested his Honor to charge the jury that whatever benefit accrued to the defendant, Sanders, from the statutes of limitation, enured also to the defendant, W. H. Frazier.

The defendants requested his Honor to charge that when new parties, who ought to have been parties originally, are brought before the court by amendment, such new parties may avail themselves of any valid defence which they may have under the statutes of limitation at the time they are made parties to the suit. His Honor refused this request, and ruled that the proposition was inapplicable; and defendants excepted.

of the defendants to *charge as aforesaid on the statutes of limitation, charged the jury that the statutory period had not elapsed when process was lodged for service on W. H. Frazier, and that the bar of the statute did not exist in favor of either of the defendants. Whereupon defendants excepted.

The defendants requested his Honor to charge the jury that the account-sales introduced in evidence, alone or taken together with the other testimony, are not sufficient proof that the cotton of M. Frazier was actually sold, nor of the prices at which it was sold, nor of the expenditures therein charged against M. Frazier; these transactions having occurred in Liverpool, England. His Honor refused so to charge, and the defendants excepted.

The defendants requested his Honor to charge that the check of Salomon, Root & Co., introduced in evidence, alone or taken with the other testimony, is not sufficient proof that the money herein referred to ($20,000) was advanced to M. Frazier. His Honor refused so to charge, and the defendants excepted.

The defendants requested his Honor to charge that even if the account sales are sufficient evidence of the transactions therein referred to, M. Frazier was entitled to the proceeds of sales in English money reduced to United States currency, at the current rates of exchange and gold at the time the cotton was sold, or at the time the proceeds fell due, as stated in said accounts of sales. His Honor charged the jury that while this was true, if considered independent of the award and of Frazier's acquiescence in the account of sales rendered, yet, that if M. Frazier signed the award, and afterwards stood by and permitted plaintiffs to pay the reclamation claimed on the cotton, he was estopped from further objecting to the accounts and returns of the sale of his cotton, and was liable for the money paid as reclamation by Blakely & Copeland. Whereupon the defendants excepted.

The defendants requested his Honor to rule and charge the jury that the drafts of Salomon, Root & Co., on Beach, Root & Co., April 18th and 19th, 1866, were their own drafts, and not the drafts of M. Frazier, and that M. Frazier was not liable for the same, and that it was a breach of duty to apply Frazier's money to the payment of said drafts. His Honor charged the *jury that while this was true, if considered independent of the award, and of the fact that Salomon, Root & Co. had advanced to Marshall Frazier $20,000, to be repaid out of the proceeds of the sale of his cotton, yet, if M. Frazier, after having received the $20,000, signed the award and afterwards stood by and permitted plaintiffs to pay the reclamation claimed on the cotton, he was estopped from further objecting to the accounts and returns of the sale of his cotton, and was liable for the money paid as reclamation by plaintiffs. Whereupon the defendants excepted.

The defendants requested his Honor to rule and charge that plaintiffs' action should have been brought upon the entire account of their transactions and those of the other factors, Marshall, Beach & Co., Salomon, Root & Co., and Beach, Root & Co., stated in United States currency, in an account between Blakely & Copeland and M. Frazier, and that the balance should not have been in account between Beach, Root & Co. and M. Frazier. His Honor refused so to rule or charge, and the defendants excepted.

Defendants requested his Honor to charge that it was the duty of Blakely & Copeland to render full and complete returns of all the transactions in regard to this cotton: and that if the jury believe they did not do this, they are not entitled to recover. His Honor refused so to charge, and the defendants excepted.

The defendants requested his Honor to rule and charge that the partnership of Blakely & Copeland having been dissolved before the alleged payment of the money by Blakely & Copeland to Marshall, Beach & Co., the plaintiffs could not recover under the allegations of the complaint. His Honor refused so to charge, and the defendants excepted.

Verdict for the plaintiff for $8,455.77, and defendants appealed.

The "points submitted by appellants," and referred to in the opinion of this court, are found in the argument of Mr. A. J. Norris, and are as follows:

First Point. The court, in Richland, had no jurisdiction to try this action, because neither of the defendants resided in that county. Code, § 148, and amendment; 15 Stat. 913.

*This amendment is a remedial statute, and should be construed liberally. Potter's Dwarris on Stat. 73; 16 Abb. Pr. 31; 18 Abb. Pr. 31; 25 How. Pr. 416—a case directly in point. See, also, 2 Paige 284. The whole code refers to matters of practice only, and the amendment should be applied to cases pending at the time of its passage. The general doctrine (Potter's Dwarris on Stat. 162) that statutes are not to have a retroactive operation, does not apply to remedial statutes. Ibid., and p. 164, note; Bishop on Stat. Crimes, §§ 84, 85. There is no interference with a contract by such changes; if so, defendants would have rights under the law as it was in 1866.

Second Point. Plaintiffs failed to amend their pleadings in accordance with order of October 25th, 1873, by being too late; and said order gave no authority to amend the summons. 2 Wait Pr. 508, 569; 4 Wait Pr. 688; 14 How. Pr. 337; 3 Sandf. 736; 32 How. Pr. 310. Filing amended complaint was not sufficient. 4 Wait Pr. 690; Code, §§ 122, 150, 154, 431.

Third Point. The action of plaintiffs is barred by the statute of limitations. Code, § 122. If both executors had been originally sued, the lodging of the summons with the sheriff, or the service of one, would have bound both. But not so when one only is sued. The limitations in the code do not apply to this demand. § 96. Under the old law, a suit against one only of two or more qualified executors was void. 2 Bay 194.

Fourth Point. The shipment and sale of the cotton, what it sold for, what charges were paid on it, &c., must be proven by persons having personal knowledge; accounts and statements of sales, &c., are not sufficient. See proper practice in Kuhtman v. Brown & Goldsmith, 4 Rich. 485.

Fifth Point. Check of Salomon, Root & Co. should not have been admitted in evidence, because not proved by drawers or payers.

Sixth Point. M. Frazier was entitled to the proceeds of the sales of his cotton in English money, reduced to United States currency at the current rates of exchange and gold, at the time the cotton was sold, or at the time the proceeds fell due, as stated in said accounts of sales. 3 Kent Com. 115, 116, 117, note; 11 East 269; Chitty on Bills *686; 1 McM.

320; 2 B. & Ad. 78; *3 Sumn. 523; 1 McLean 423; 4 Johns. 124; 20 Johns. 102; 16 Ves. 461; 2 Wash. C. C. 167.

Seventh Point. The alleged drafts are not Frazier's drafts, and he is not responsible for them. There is no proper proof that they were drawn or paid. But suppose they were; his draft on them in New York could not be changed in its character by drafts of those three firms inter sese.

Eighth Point. The plaintiffs should have brought their action on the entire account made out in United States currency, and covering all their transactions with the cotton. They could not select one item of the account and sue upon that. 11 Rich. 466.

Ninth Point. Plaintiffs did render an account after action brought, showing that Frazier only owed them $4881.40. So judgment was excessive.

Tenth Point. E. W. Marshall is assignor of the claim for reclamation, and his testimony was incompetent. Code, § 415.

Eleventh Point. Same objection applies to the testimony of J. W. Blakely, a party to the cause.

Twelfth Point. Plaintiffs were not entitled to recover under the allegations of the complaint, as their partnership had been dissolved before they made their payment to Marshall, Beach & Co.

November 21st, 1878. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. This action is brought by the plaintiffs as factors of Marshall Frazier, deceased, against his executors for money alleged to have been paid by plaintiffs for the account and benefit of said Frazier. The transactions out of which the present demand arises was a consignment of cotton for sale by plaintiffs, as factors of and on account of the defendants' testator, to Marshall, Beach & Co., of Charleston, who consigned to Beach, Root & Co., of Liverpool, by whom the cotton was sold and account of sales rendered. In the account-sales after crediting the proceeds of the sales of the cotton, and debiting commissions, charges, advances, and interest, a balance appeared to the credit of Beach, Root & Co. This balance appears to have been paid by Marshall, Beach & Co., and by them collected from the plaintiffs who now seek to recover the same, less an admitted offset, *from the executors of Frazier. A verdict was rendered for plaintiffs, and the present appeal is based on exceptions to the rulings and charge of the Circuit judge. So far as these exceptions are brought to notice by the points submitted by the appellants, they will be considered, and in the order stated by the appellants.

The first point is that the court in Richland county had no jurisdiction to try this action, because neither of the defendants resided in that county.

It appears that prior to the term at which the cause was tried, and at May Term, 1875, an application was made to the Circuit Court to transfer the cause for trial to Edgefield county, where the defendants both resided, which was refused, and that the defendants at that time excepted to such ruling. It does not appear whether such application was made on notice to the parties, or upon the call of the docket. Properly, it should be made before the cause is reached on the docket, so that the parties may have due notice of the place of trial in order to enable them to make their preparations for the trial. As no irregularity is alleged as the ground of the refusal of the Circuit Court to change the place of trial, we must assume that the application was made in due form, at all events that the plaintiffs assented to the time and manner in which it was made. As objection to proceeding with the trial in Richland county was made on the same ground at the trial, and an exception taken to its denial, whatever may be the force of the last-named exception, in itself considered, it certainly apprised the plaintiffs that the defendants intended to insist on the claim which they had made at a prior time, and therefore they cannot be regarded as having abandoned any right that they might have, as it regarded an error in the previous ruling. The question then arises, was the refusal of the Circuit Court to order the case to be tried in Edgefield county erroneous, and can advantage be taken of such error on this appeal. It is clearly not a question of jurisdiction, in the proper sense of that term, but of the denial of a substantial right material to the defence. The defendants being residents of the county of Edgefield, that was the proper county for the trial of the cause. 15 Stat. 913. The court had the right, however, to change the place of trial "in the cases provided by statute." *Unless this power is duly exercised the right of a defendant under the statute is absolute.

The cases in which the court may change the place of trial are stated in Section 149 of the code, as follows: "1. When the county designated for that purpose in the complaint is not the proper county. 2. When there is reason to believe that an impartial trial cannot be had therein. 3. When the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted by the change."

In order to warrant a change on the grounds stated in the second and third subdivisions, it must be shown by the allegations and proofs of the parties that such grounds for the action demanded exist.

The order of the court interfering with the right secured by the statute, can only be supported when resting on such allegations and proofs.

The reasons that may have existed in the breast of the judge are no sufficient ground of his action in such cases, and seldom in any case. It does not appear that any allegations or proofs were submitted to the Circuit Court that could have justified the exercise of the power of the court to change the place of trial from the county in which, by law, it was entitled to be tried in the absence of special grounds for its removal.

On the other hand it was the clear duty of the court under the first subdivision to order the place of trial designated in the complaint to be changed, when it appeared that that was not the proper place of trial. The directions of the statute, that the court may change the place of trial when not laid in the proper county, is not merely a grant of authority for that purpose, but imposes a duty, in view of the fact that the right to such change was secured by the statute.

It must be assumed that the court had the record of the case before it, and determined that as matter of law the residence of the defendants in Edgefield was immaterial to the question raised by the motion. As imperfect as is the statement of the nature of the decision we feel warranted in assuming thus much. The refusal to change the place of trial was clearly wrong, and it *remains to be considered whether that wrong can be alleged as an error at law under the present appeal.

The jurisdiction of this court extends to all appeals from intermediate orders and final judgments in actions where such order or judgment involves the merits. 15 Stat. 868. An order involving merely the exercise of discretion on the part of the court making it is not appealable, as error of law cannot be alleged as against such an order. 1 Wait Prac. 465. When, however, the order affects a substantial right, necessarily affecting the judgment, it must be regarded as involving the merits. The term "merits" is not very clearly defined. It certainly embraces more than the questions of law and fact, constituting the cause of action or defence. As it regards the principles of construction, the necessary means of attaining an end stand upon the same ground of privilege as the end itself. If, then, a party is entitled to an appeal as a means of securing a proper judgment, he is presumably entitled to such appeal, in order to secure that without which the judgment could not be rightfully had. The word "merits" naturally bears the sense of including all that the party may claim of right in reference to his case. Nor is any authority brought to notice that limits the sense to any particular class of rights among those that have a tendency to control the results of cases. The expression "affecting the judgment," employed by the statute (15 Stat. 868) must be regarded as equivalent, in the sense of that statute, to the other expression, "involving the merits," as defining the cases to which that jurisdiction shall extend. They must be regarded as different definitions of the same case. In Section 11 of the code, as it originally stood, the expression was, "involving the merits and necessarily affecting the judgment." As that section now stands, the review of judgments, and intermediate orders upon direct appeal from such judgments or orders, extends to all cases "involving the merits," the other words being omitted, while as it regards intermediate orders, brought up for review by an appeal from the final judgment, the expression employed to limit the jurisdiction is "necessarily affecting the judgment," omitting the words "involving the merits." It is evident that the words "involving the merits," is used in its large significance in the original text *of the code, as appears from the character of the terms limiting it to cases where the judgment was necessarily affected. On the other hand, in the amendment of 1873, this limitation is dispensed with, presumably as unnecessary, and the terms there employed are treated as equivalents. Whatever can be regarded as affecting the necessary means of obtaining a judgment, must be regarded as affecting the judgment itself.

It may be concluded from the foregoing that whenever a substantial right of the party to an action material to obtaining a judgment in such action is denied, a right of appeal lies to this court. Prior to the recent amendment of the code relating to the place of trial, the defendant could not, as matter of right, claim that a trial should be had in the county of his residence. In those cases where the venue was not fixed by the nature of the cause of action itself, it was the right of the plaintiff to select the place of trial, subject only to the limitation that such place of trial must, when any of the parties reside within the state, be in some county where one or more of such parties, either plaintiff or defendant, resides. If the defendant desired to effect a change, it could only be obtained by the order of the court on the grounds specified by law. It is evident that under the law as it now stands, the defendant may claim of right that the trial should be had in the county where he resides, in cases of the class to which the present belongs. If, then, it is material to his defence that the jury, convened to try his case, should be drawn, summoned and empaneled in the manner prescribed by law, so that the denial of right, in this respect, entitles him to an appeal, it is manifest that to change it from a vicinage other than that designated by law, is an error in a matter involving a substantial right material to his defence, and thereby necessarily affecting the judgment. The conclusion reached renders a new trial necessary.

The second point involves the question whether irregularities in complying with an order of the court allowing amendment to the pleadings, can be taken advantage of upon the trial of the cause. It is the duty of the parties, if they wish to take advantage of an irregularity in the mode of interposing a pleading, to move the court in due time before the cause is called, for such order as the nature of the case may demand. It is too late to *take such an objection after the parties have framed an issue and gone to trial upon it. If the parties had a right to object to the validity of a pleading on the ground of irregularity merely, it would be equivalent to saying that a pleading irregularly interposed may be disregarded as a nullity. The contrary of this is true, namely, that such a pleading is good until set aside on the ground of irregularity. The defendant, in making the objection before us, does not stand on the ground of vindicating a substantial right denied to him, but of taking advantage of mere irregularities in form by the opposite party; clearly no such appeal can be allowed by this court.

The third point relates to the statute of limitations. The court properly refused to charge that the cause of action in suit arose upon the sale of the cotton in Europe. The liability of defendants' testator to the plaintiffs could not arise until the actual payment by the plaintiffs of the amount of the reclamation made by the parties who sold the cotton. If, prior to that payment, the plaintiffs had sued M. Frazier, it is clear that they would have failed in their action. The question of the effect of the statute of limitations, as it regards the defendant, Frazier, depends upon the fact that at the commencement of the action the defendant, Frazier, was the only executor having authority under the will to act. The will does not admit of any joint executor during the existence of due qualification on the part of Frazier. Consequently the action was well brought, as it regards Frazier, and the statute cannot be pleaded by him as running after service upon him. As it regards Sanders, we do not know by what title he is treated as the executor, inasmuch as by the will he cannot claim to be such; and as we are not informed upon what ground he is claimed or admitted to be such, we cannot, at the present stage of the case, determine his relation to the statute of limitations.

The fourth point involves the question of the necessity of proof of the right of the Liverpool house to demand a reclamation. It was of course necessary to make proof of the state of the accounts, in order to show that the money advanced by the plaintiffs was paid for the advantage of the defendants. The plaintiffs had the right to put the parties making claim against *them to proof of the accounts in an action, and by waiving such proof by voluntary payment they could not throw that burden on the defendants, but must be regarded as having assumed that duty. The submission and award cannot properly be regarded as an admission by the testator of the defendants of the propriety of the reclamation. The question submitted was as to on whom the duty of settling the accounts was incumbent in the first instance —whether upon the owner of the cotton or his factor; and the decision imposed that duty on the plaintiffs, as such factors. This was the whole effect of the arbitration. There was therefore error in this respect in the charge and refusal to charge.

The request to charge, to which the fifth point relates, was properly refused, as it involved a charge as to the sufficiency of evidence apart from its legal character and tendency, and therefore as to matters of fact within the exclusive competency of the jury.

The charge to which the sixth point relates was clearly erroneous. It involves the proposition that the award of the arbitrators fixed the amount of the reclamation as due from the testator, and therefore the account could not be examined as it regarded the charges for premium on gold and for exchange. As the award could not have such effect, the charge is erroneous. The court having charged the proposition embraced in the request, independently of the erroneous charge that followed, no further question of error is presented.

The observations made as to the sixth point apply to and are decisive of the seventh point. The proposition embraced in the request to charge was submitted to the jury, but its effect destroyed by an erroneous conclusion as to the effect of the award.

It is not necessary to determine the true form of stating the accounts between the plaintiffs and defendants, or their testator, as that is a matter of detail not necessarily affecting the results of an accounting. The court, having reposed the settlement of the accounts upon the effect of the award, rendered questions as to the form of stating the accounts immaterial, as far as it concerned the matters presumably embraced in the verdict. We do not deem it necessary to lay down the rule that should govern *the statement of the accounts as it regards matters of form on any future trial of this cause.

The proposition embraced in the ninth point was properly refused. The effect of rendering imperfect or conflicting accounts by the plaintiffs was a matter to be determined by the jury, and not by the court.

The tenth point is not well taken. E. W. Marshall was not a party to the suit, nor, as far as appears, directly or even indirectly interested in its results. The fact that the witness was a member of the house in Charleston to whom the cotton was consigned by the plaintiff, and through whom the reclamation was made against the plaintiffs, does not put him in the position of having once owned or been interested in the demand made by the plaintiffs. The cause of action upon which they sue arose only in their hands by the payment of the reclamation. They did not assume or acquire any right that had subsisted in the hands of the Charleston house as against M. Frazier; for the effect of the arbitration, as assented to by all the parties, and which is necessarily regarded as the law of the case, fixed the liability, primarily, on the defendants, of stating and settling the account; and the defendants cannot assume a state of relations at variance with that ascertained by the award. Besides, the effect of payment by the plaintiffs was to destroy the right of reclamation, not to preserve it in their own hands, inasmuch as they acted as the agents of the testator. The testimony in question was clearly competent.

The objection to the testimony of the plaintiff, Blakely, made by the eleventh point, was well taken. He was a party to the action, and his testimony related to conversations with a deceased person, and was given in a case where the executor of such deceased person had an opposite interest in such action. The admission was therefore clearly improper.

The twelfth point seeks to take advantage of an immaterial variance between the allegations and proofs, which cannot be done.

It does not appear distinctly what the facts were upon which objection was made to the commissions put in evidence. Nothing appears on the subject but general admissions affecting them. *As upon another trial admissions made on the present record will not be conclusive as to the right to introduce the commissions, it does not appear that the questions in this respect, raised by the present record, can arise on such future trial, and we deem it unnecessary to consider them in the absence of the facts. The present action being against the executors of M. Frazier, we cannot see how the unpaid costs of an action against M. Frazier, brought and discontinued during his lifetime, can be interposed as a defence. Although the cause of action may be the same, there is not an identity of parties. The defendants, as defendants, have no right to demand such costs, but merely as the personal representatives of the deceased former defendant. Under the view taken of the case, we do not regard it as at all material to consider the other matters discussed, as they arise out of the view taken of the case by the Circuit Court, which, as we have seen, was erroneous, and as not likely to be of importance as the further consideration of the case.

There should be a new trial.

New trial granted.

(Case No. 650.)

HENRY KOON, as Administrator de Bonis Non of Clinton Wilson, v. WILLIAM MUNRO, as Administrator of W. J. Keenan, and the Distributees of Wilson's Estate.

[1. Executors and Administrators ⟸86.]
An administrator during the war was justified in receiving confederate money at its nominal value, on ante-bellum contracts, when such money was needed to defray current or extraordinary expenses of the administration, or to pay outstanding debts, whose payment was capable of being enforced, or where there was danger of losing an unsecured credit if not collected, or for purposes of payment to a legatee or distributee with his or her sanction. But an administrator should not be held to strict accountability as an insurer of such reasonably anticipated results, if actuated by a fair and honest judgment, resting on reasonable grounds. Our cases since 1868 upon this subject reviewed.

Before Northrop, J., at Union, March Term, 1877.

This was a case in chancery brought by the plaintiff as administrator de bonis non of Clinton Wilson, deceased, against William Munro, as administrator of William J. Keenan, deceased, who during his lifetime had been administrator of the said estate of Clinton Wilson, and against the distributees of the said Wilson, praying an account by said William Munro of his intestate's administration of said Wilson's estate, and for a sale of the lands of said Wilson in aid of assets. The distributees, in their answer, join in the prayer of complainant that William Munro, as the legal representative of the said William J. Keenan, do exhibit a full and particular account of his intestate's administration up to the time of his death of the estate of Clinton Wilson, that came into *the hands of the said William J. Keenan to be administered. The defendant, as administrator as aforesaid, filed his answer, and therewith submitted an account of his intestate's administration of the said Wilson's estate, claiming "that the estate of Clinton Wilson is indebted to the estate of Wm. J. Keenan, in the sum of $291.96 on September 16th, 1867; and also in the sum of $650.87 in Confederate States money."

By order of the court, dated March 24th, 1873, it was referred to John L. Young, Esq., as special referee, "to take the testimony in the above-stated case, and to state the account of W. J. Keenan as administrator of the estate of C. Wilson, deceased."

The referee submitted his report on September 10th, A. D. 1873.

To this report exceptions were taken by the administrator of Keenan, and also by the distributees of Clinton Wilson's estate.

The following facts were brought out by the testimony and the accounting: Clinton Wilson died November 23d, 1860, and letters of administration on his estate were granted to William J. Keenan, December 14th, 1860. The estate consisted principally of choses in action to a very considerable amount, nearly all of which were collected in Confederate States currency; among these were a note of said W. J. Keenan for $2000, less a credit, besides interest, and a note of Keenan & Norris (a firm, of which Keenan was a member,) for $9712.83, besides interest. On December 31st, 1860, Keenan, administrator, had received for the estate $2056.65, in excess of his receipts. On his own indebtedness and the indebtedness of Keenan & Norris, he charged himself, in his first return, filed April 2d, 1862, with $5125, paid by Keenan & Norris, January 21st, 1861; in his second return, filed March 11th, 1863, with $2500, paid by Keenan & Norris, July 1st, 1862; in his third return, filed January 10th, 1866, with $7047.37, balance, paid by Keenan & Norris, February 22d, 1863, and with $2298.32, balance, paid by W. J. Keenan, February 22d, 1863. Keenan collected large amounts from other parties during those years and paid out large sums to creditors. In 1864 and 1865 he made no returns; his transactions for those years were embraced in his return of January, 1866. *Of the moneys in his hands, $5800 were invested in Confederate States bonds.

Some of the collections made by Keenan were shown to have been from parties insolvent at the close of the war, and some from parties insolvent at the time they made their payments, and also insolvent at the close of the war.

Keenan died November 17th, 1867, in New Orleans; William Munro administered on his estate in South Carolina. Letters of administration de bonis non on the estate of Clinton Wilson were granted to Henry Koon, the plaintiff, March 6th, 1869.

The case came on for a hearing before Northrop, J., at March Term, 1877, and on October 1st, 1877, his decree was filed, which was as follows:

This cause is one of complicated accounts in the settlement of an estate. It was heard on exceptions to report of referee. The testimony shows that Clinton Wilson died A. D. 1860. Keenan administered December 14th, 1860, and died November 17th, 1867. Henry Koon, on March 6th, 1869, took out letters of administration de bonis non upon the Wilson estate, and William Munro, defendant herein, became administrator of the personal estate of Keenan, deceased. Henry Koon filed his bill in this court March 11th, 1869, praying for a full and particular account of the administration of his intestate's estate, and making the heirs-at-law of Clinton Wilson, deceased, parties defendant. Their answer was filed November 29th, 1870.

John L. Young, referee, made his report September 10th, 1873. In the meanwhile, the defendants E. P. Coulter, W. Harrison Gregory and his wife, and Austin Wilson died, and Charles Bolt, clerk, administered upon their estates and has filed his answer herein.

The referee reports $8745.55 as due by William J. Keenan, administrator, in "Confederate currency" on September 19th, 1867, and $304.61 due to him on same date in "United States currency."

Plaintiff and defendant excepted. The second exception taken by defendant's counsel; that the referee should have allowed W. J. Keenan, administrator of Clinton Wilson, deceased, credit *for the sum of $428.50, interest from January 21st, 1861, to April 1st, 1862, according to vouchers Nos. 27, 28, and 29, is sustained.

The real issue raised by the pleadings in this cause, appears in the plaintiff's exception, objecting to the finding of the referee: that the balance due the estate of Clinton Wilson, was due in "Confederate currency," and not in legal or United States currency, as well as in the defendant's exception, objecting to the finding of the referee, refusing the administrator of Clinton Wilson credit for $3500, invested in seven per cent. confederate bonds. It seems to be admitted for the purposes of this decree that the investment was made on December 31st, 1864. Was this investment just and legal, and is the balance found against the defendant to be struck in confederate currency, or in lawful currency?

The testimony was voluminous, and the argument on either side eminently laborious and accomplished.

I am clearly of opinion that the investment was not proper, nor can it be allowed, and that the balance against the administrator should be found in legal currency. It seems plain from the testimony that the assets were ante bellum, and that their origin was of a gold valuation. The administrator was largely indebted to his intestate's estate, and I am not satisfied that he was authorized to receive in confederate currency any further payments than were necessary to the purposes of the administration, and surely not more than were actually paid out by him in discharge of the liabilities of his intestate's estate. He was able to pay the same, $17,000 of his own debt, contracted at a gold valuation, by paying out confederate currency, and cannot take refuge behind the general reputation for patriotism to which he was entitled. It is good law, that debts due an estate by the administrator are as cash in his hands, but it appears here that the administrator charged himself from time to time with the collection of these assets, subsequent to the administration, and that he was one of a co-partnership indebted to the estate.

There was much effort to show by letters and other testimony that the defendants, Elkanah Coulter and John Coulter, bound their wives as distributees, to the ratification of this investment. *If this was proved, it could hardly bind the other distributees to their loss.

Nor am I satisfied that these defendants could bind their wives—the distribution not having been completed before the death of the wives. There would have been no settlement, nor reduction into possession. But as matter of law, I find the proof insufficient. Story on Agency, § 237, and note. They, the Coulters, do not appear to have had knowledge of the essential facts.

This investment appears to me, therefore, to have authority neither in fact nor law.

If it could appear that the administrator had received, as a matter of necessity, the confederate currency invested in confederate bonds, I would not hesitate to hold the investment legal and valid. Fitzsimons v. Fitzsimons, 1 S. C. 413; Horn v. Lockhart, 17 Wall. 576 [21 L. Ed. 657]; Cureton v. Watson, 3 S. C. 454.

The facts, however, as I understand them, do not warrant this view of the case, and I am constrained to conclude that this investment was without authority of law. So far as interest is concerned, I have reached the conclusion that interest should be charged on the balance struck on January 1st of each year; that no interest should be allowed on the balance due by the administrator, Keenan, from time of his death, until letters of administration were granted de bonis non—that is, from November 17th, 1867, to March 6th, 1869.

Counsel have agreed to allow the commissions to the administrator on the balance found due by him, and they are allowed.

I file with this decree a statement of the administrator's account as it appears to be made out.

It is therefore ordered, judged, and decreed that the plaintiff, Henry Koon, administrator de bonis non of the estate of Clinton Wilson, recover of Wm. Munro as administrator of the estate of Wm. J. Keenan, deceased, the sum of $11,122.61, to be paid by the said Wm. Munro, out of any assets in his hands belonging to the estate of his intestate not yet administered, and any that may hereafter come into his hands to be administered, and that the said Henry Koon do, after paying all the costs of this suit, *and expenses of administration, pay over the balance in his hands to the distributees of the estate of Clinton Wilson, deceased, their attorneys or assignees, according to their respective interests.

And it is further ordered that the said distributees, and Henry Koon, as administrator de bonis non, have leave to apply at the foot of this decree for such orders as may be necessary to carry out such decree.

In the statement of the administrator's accounts, filed with the Circuit decree, the administrator is charged with interest on balance in his hands December 31st, 1860, and is allowed no commissions on his receipts and disbursements for 1863 and 1864. William Munro, administrator, appealed to this court upon the following grounds:

1. Because, from the proof, the collections made by the administrator in confederate money, were rendered necessary by the exigencies of the estate, were proper under the circumstances attending them, and should therefore be sustained.

2. Because the administrator should have been allowed credit for the amounts collected on the notes of Keenan & Norris and of W. J. Keenan, that were actually expended in paying off debts of the intestate, contracted in legal currency.

3. Because the administrator should not have been charged in legal currency with amounts collected by him in confederate currency from insolvent persons, who could not have otherwise paid their debts due to the intestate, or any part thereof.

4. Because, even if charged with amounts collected by him in confederate money on debts outstanding at the intestate's death, and unsecured, due by insolvent or doubtful persons, he should only be charged with the actual value of the money so collected by him, and not with the whole amount in legal currency.

5. Because the administrator is charged with interest on $2056.65 for one year, from December 31st, 1860, to December 31st, 1861, when administration was granted on December 10th, 1860.

6. Because the administrator is not allowed commissions upon the amounts due from W.
J. Keenan and Keenan & Norris, col*lected during his administration; nor upon amounts paid to the same parties.

7. Because the administrator is not allowed commissions upon his receipts and expenditures during the years 1863 and 1864, but is charged with the amount thereof as legal currency.

8. Because, if the collections from Keenan & Norris and Keenan are not sustained, interest should be calculated upon their notes, and not upon annual balances against the administrator.

9. Because the conclusion of fact reached by his Honor the Circuit judge, that the investment of the administrator in confederate bonds was made on December 31st, 1864, was not admitted by the defendant, and is not sustained by the proof.

10. Because the investment made by the administrator in confederate bonds ought to have been sustained.

11. Because, if not sustained as to all the distributees, it should have been as to the wives of John Coulter and Elkanah Coulter, and especially as to the interest of John and Elkanah Coulter, purchased by them from Wilson, one of the distributees of Clinton Wilson, deceased.

12. Because, if the investment in confederate bonds is not sustained, then the amount of confederate money in the hands of the administrator, on April, 1864, should have been reduced one-third, as provided by act of congress of Confederate States.

13. Because the decree of his Honor the Circuit judge was not filed within sixty days from the last day of the term of court at which the cause was heard, as required by Article IV., Section 17, of the constitution of this state.

November 22d, 1878. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. W. J. Keenan administered on the estate of C. Wilson. At Keenan's death, administration de bonis non *was granted to the plaintiff, Koon, and the defendant, Munro, became the administrator of Keenan.

The administrator of Keenan is now called to account for the administration by his intestate of the estate of C. Wilson.

The principal question in the case is whether the estate of Keenan should be allowed certain credits claimed as due from the fact that he had converted assets of the estate into confederate bonds in 1864. It must be assumed that this transaction was, in point of fact, the funding of confederate currency in bonds of a like character, though bearing interest. It appears in evidence, and is also notorious as part of the general history of those times, that at the time of such funding (1864) confederate currency was the only currency in circulation in this state. It is not alleged nor suggested that any other currency was in the hands of the administrator at the time of such funding; on the contrary, the scope of the argument in the case embraces the inference that the collections for the estate were made in confederate currency, so far, at least, as the character of those collections could enter into the present question.

Should it appear that at the time of such funding the administrator had rightly become possessed of, and held as part of the assets of the estate, an amount of confederate currency in excess of what was capable of being disbursed for the legitimate purposes of the administration, and that in 1864 he had funded that amount in confederate bonds, he would be entitled to account for the confederate currency by credit for the bonds taken in exchange for it. Such a transaction would amount to no more than the conversion of a non-interest-bearing security of a certain class into an interest-bearing security of the same class, and, as such, could manifestly occasion no loss of assets. The important question in this case is whether the administrator can be regarded as having converted confederate currency, rightfully in his hands, as assets of his intestate, into confederate bonds. It is possible that the administrator might, consistently with a due discharge of his official duty, have become possessed of assets of the estate in the form of confederate currency, notwithstanding the fact that such currency was not, in a legal sense, money, so that the debtors of the estate could compel its reception in discharge of *their debts, and notwithstanding the further fact that its current value was less than its nominal value as compared with gold, and that it should be taken at its nominal value in the discharge of debts due the estate.

The object of administration is the distribution of the decedent's estate among those entitled to it according to law. Debts must be collected and paid as the first step towards distribution. That it may happen that a community is stripped of the due and legal medium of discharging obligations, namely, coined money or its legal equivalent, is a possibility not so remote but that it may be considered by the courts. Such a state of things existed in this state during the period covered by the administration of Keenan. Although the circumstances that accompanied such condition of things were peculiar, yet, even if we could conclude that their exact recurrence in any community could not be regarded as a reasonable possibility, the fact remains that the real cause of the monetary condition was the absence of gold and silver from the state to such an extent as to deprive the community of a proper medium of exchange. This fact was not necessarily dependent on the circumstance that there was pending a dispute as to the right of supreme governmental authority over the territory of the state, maintained by arms, and involving incidentally the question of what was to be regarded as lawful money for the purposes of discharging obligations. Coined gold and silver, of a suitable character to obviate all question as to the proper medium of payment, might have existed in sufficient quantities to meet all demands upon a currency, notwithstanding the pendency of such a question. Other causes than that of the nature of the political questions involved induced the disappearance of gold and silver. Commercial causes afford the real means of explaining this fact. The pendency of the war at once created a demand for purchases abroad, and prevented exportations of a class of commodities that would have supplied the place of gold and silver in such transactions.

Gold and silver disappeared from the state as the medium of exchange. This was not a peculiar consequence of a war of an exceptional character, but a natural and ordinary consequence of war dependent only on the fact that one of the belligerents pos*sessed the means of excluding the others from ordinary exchanges in foreign markets, to which the other was compelled to have recourse as a purchaser. The disputed question of sovereignty had no necessary connection with its occurrence. We must therefore conclude that the possibility of the deprivation of a community of the proper medium of the payment of obligations is within legal contemplation and consideration, and we are at liberty to look for the rules that should prevail under such a state of circumstances.

Although when such a state of things exists, it must be regarded as temporary as affecting the general functions of the state, yet it is not in such a sense temporary that administration and similar legal functions can be suspended during its continuance. To maintain a state of war without exhaustion, or to overcome any other natural cause tending to paralyze public economy and private industry, must be the care of every government, and a reasonable view of the objects of laws must lead to the conclusion that there are principles intended to meet such exceptional cases, intimately connected as they must be with the general well-being of the community. To interrupt the due course of law as to the transmission of property or solution of debts, is to diminish the general prosperity to the degree that such interruption is important as it regards the extent of the transactions affected, or its duration. In view of these circumstances, it is impossible to conclude that when, from the pendency of war or other cause, the community is deprived of the customary and legal means of paying debts and making exchanges, and resort is had by common consent to a substantial currency without definite legal authorization, the course of administration must cease, and administrators retain the assets in their hands unconverted and unapplied to the purposes of administration, whatever might be its consequences as affecting the administration. Such a rigid rule would work peculiar hardship in the case of administrations.

Death seldom finds estates in such complete preparation that outstanding credits are equivalent to investments and debts without power of compelling the disposition of assets. On the contrary, it must be anticipated that the assets of an intestate estate *will embrace credits of an unsecured and doubtful character, and debts capable of creating a pressing necessity for calling in the credits of the estate. It must be assumed as a general fact that there is a necessity for prompt action on the part of administrators that cannot admit of suspension or interruption under such a state of public affairs as that under consideration. If debts are not paid, the sale of assets can be compelled, and from the necessity of the case supposed the assets must be sold for the prevailing currency, such as it is, and that currency must be the means of paying the debt. To require that property be sold at public sale, for gold and silver, when those commodities cannot be obtained, would be oppression under the forms of law and contrary to justice. If the administrator, unwilling to take collections of credits in such cases in such currency, permits the realized property of the estate to be seized and applied to the payment of its debts, then, while the sacrifice is only transferred from the doubtful assets to the good, not only the natural order of looking in the first instance to the outstanding credits as the means of paying debts is disregarded, but the collection of uncertain and doubtful demands postponed at the very time when it should be specially pressed, for the existence of such a state of affairs necessarily depreciates all obligations resting merely on personal responsibility.

It cannot be doubted that when an entire community, without dissent, and under the spur of necessity, concur in adopting a medium of exchange that can only derive its value from common consent, and the language of commerce and trade, and, indeed, of all industry, becomes accommodated to such medium of exchange, power to employ such medium in transactions would be implied from such general consent, in many supposable cases, which would bind parties in the absence of their declarations to the contrary. It would be difficult to define this principle with accuracy, and establish its conditions and limits; but its existence cannot be doubted. The existence of such a presumpton as existed between the attorney who issued an execution during the period under consideration, and the sheriff who sold property for confederate money under such execution, is illustrated in State v. Moseley, 10 S. C. 1.

The present ques*tion does not directly depend on the operation of such an implied power, but the principles are closely allied.

It would follow, if the foregoing deductions are sound, that the test of the right of the administrator to receive, in satisfaction of the debts of the estate, a currency in common use but not having the quality of a legal tender, is the necessity of the administration; one element of this necessity being the existence of debts capable of affecting, prejudicially, the assets of the estate unless satisfied, and the other would be just ground to apprehend loss of assets by allowing unsecured debts to remain outstanding. As it regards the payment of legacies and distributive shares, it is evident that either the express consent of persons entitled thereto, or such facts and circumstances as would give rise to a presumption of such consent, would warrant the reception of such currency when only required for purposes of that description. It is clear that in either of these cases, as well as when money is needed to defray current or extraordinary expenses of the administration, the administrator would be authorized to receive such currency at the rate at which it passed from hand to hand in the community as money, unless there should be reason to conclude that it could not be advantageously employed at such valuation for the purposes of the administration. In the cases supposed it might wholly defeat the end proposed, for the administrator to insist that currency should be used in such transactions at its value, according to a gold standard. It is unlikely that parties who might use their currency more advantageously, would employ it for the purpose of paying debts. Besides, the case supposed rests on the reasonable idea that such currency may be used at its nominal value for the legitimate purposes of administration, and in that case the value of the currency would be that for which it would be advantageously used in the purposes of the administration, and not what it is worth, according to a legal standard, practically inapplicable to the case.

It is proper to add that, in applying these principles, the administrator ought not to be held to strict accountability as an insurer of such reasonably anticipated results, but so long as he brings a fair and honest judgment, resting on reasonable grounds, to guide his conduct in this respect, he should receive protection. *This depends on the principle that one clothed with the exercise of discretion is only responsible for its abuse.

There is nothing in the cases heretofore decided by this court on this general subject that conflicts with the foregoing propositions, but much to sanction them. Clarke v. Deveaux, 1 S. C. 172. The point decided in this case was that a trustee could not make a profit to himself out of the trust estate by retaining assets of the estate and accounting for them in depreciated currency at its nominal value. Here there was no question on the ground that advantage to the estate was contemplated, but the interest of the trustee was alone the ground of his action. Gibbes v. Guignard, 1 S. C. 359, involved a question of fact merely. The legal question of the right of a trustee to invest in confederate securities did not arise for decision, the fact of such investment not being established. Mayer v. Mordecai, 1 S. C. 383 [7 Am. Rep. 26]. In this case, bonds adequately secured and constituting a settled fund, were unnecessarily called in and invested in confederate securities. The case turned upon the necessity, under the deed of trust, of consultation with the cestuis que trust in the case of a change of investment. It was held that there was an impropriety in calling in the settled investment and taking in payment currency at a less actual value than the bonds called for, although at its nominal value, but the force of this consideration was in the fact that there was no necessity, actual or presumable, that warranted such action on the part of the trustee, and the absence of such a necessity was pointed out as material in the opinion in the case.

Sanders v. Rogers, 1 S. C. 452. In this case the trustee called in a secured bond in confederate currency at its nominal value, as he alleged, with the expectation of purchasing other bonds, as directed by the terms of the trust. It was held that the trustee had no reasonable ground for calling in such bond, as no arrangements had been made at the time of calling it in for such a purchase; in fact, no substantial purpose of re-investing appeared, but the confederate currency was suffered to lie unproductive for a long time, and finally was converted into confederate bonds. The loss for which the trustee was held liable was not for converting the currency into bonds, but for taking it in payment of a secured bond without any necessity therefor.

*Womack v. Austin, 1 S. C. 421. The investments in this case were required to be of certain specified kinds, excluding an investment in confederate bonds. Confederate bonds are stated in the views of the court to have been unsafe means of investment. This does not apply to the conversion of a still less valuable security, as not bearing interest, into such bonds, and by no means conflicts with the proposition under consideration, which only contemplates the use of confederate currency for a temporary purpose, as a medium of exchange, but in harmony with a view that looks only to necessity, as connected with the interests of the estate, as the ground for receiving such currency.

Moorehead v. Orr, 1 S. C. 304. The point decided in this case was that the administrator of a guardian has no right to exercise the powers of his intestate as guardian, in the matter of making investments on account of the ward's estate.

Fitz Simons v. Fitz Simons, 1 S. C. 400. In this case the administrator was held liable for calling in a secured bond in depreciated currency at its nominal value, for the reason that no necessity of administration warranted such act. This impliedly concludes that if such necessity had, in fact, existed, or its existence could be reasonably presumed, authority so to do might have been inferred. If capable of being inferred in the case of a secured debt, it clearly would be so in the case of an unsecured debt.

Creighton v. Pringle, 3 S. C. 77. This was a case of changing investments that were optional and upon consultation, and, of course, no necessity can be presumed to have existed for calling in secured debts, constituting settled property for depreciated currency at its nominal value.

Cureton v. Watson, 3 S. C. 451. In this case a security was called in in depreciated currency at its nominal value, and the liability of the guardian was put upon the absence of necessity for so doing.

Waller v. Cresswell, 4 S. C. 353. The point decided in this case was raised as a naked one, namely, whether a guardian could legally make a loan to the confederate government, and as it directly involved a question of the construction and effect of the constitution and laws of the United States, it was decided under *the authority of Head v. Tally [Fed. Cas. No. 6,293] U. S. S. C. This case differs from all the other cases of the class in this court, as a federal question was directly interposed that was ruled by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Chalk v. Patterson, 5 S. C. 290, was a case of investment by a public officer acting under the direct orders of the court, and is not, therefore, an analogous one. That case, with Pickens v. Dwight, 4 S. C. 360, was placed on the ground that an officer of the court obeying the requirements of the act of the confederate congress, as it regards funding currency, must be regarded as yielding to superior force which he has no power to resist, and could not be held responsible therefor. The question presented was not one of investment, as the officer had no general authority to invest, and no special authority appears.

It will thus be seen that the cases in this court are in perfect harmony with the conclusions already stated, and even go so far as to give implied support to them. It remains to examine the bearing of these principles on the facts disclosed by the present case, as it regards the further question whether the administrator is to be regarded as having converted confederate currency rightfully in his hands as part of the assets of his intestate's estate into confederate bonds.

It appears that the administrator was indebted to the estate both individually and as a member of a co-partnership. Assuming that there was in his hands, as administrator, an amount of confederate currency at the time of funding, that currency must, according to the account submitted in evidence, represent an amount wholly or in part placed by the administrator among the assets on account of such indebtedness. Such a transaction is equivalent to a payment by the administrator on account of his indebtedness in confederate currency. Applying the principles heretofore stated to such facts, but with regard to the additional fact that the administrator in taking from himself depreciated currency at its nominal value was acting in his own interest, though not necessarily to the exclusion of the interest of the estate, and it is clear that he should be credited with so much only of the amount paid by him in currency on account of the indebtedness with which he was connected personally, as was *advantageously used for the benefit of the estate. An expenditure for the purchase of confederate bonds could only be sanctioned by necessity, and must be regarded, independently of such necessity, as disadvantageous to the estate, and of course the administrator would not be justified in paying his indebtedness to the estate in depreciated confederate currency at its nominal value for the purpose of converting such currency into confederate bonds. It would not necessarily result from this that the entire investment in confederate bonds should be disallowed independently of an examination of the accounts, to ascertain whether any portion of the currency that went into such bonds was derived from assets of the estate, other than that paid by the administrator himself, in discharge of his individual and joint debts. The decree of the Circuit Court advances a different principle from that here propounded as the basis of the account with which it is accompanied. It must be accordingly assumed that in stating such account, regard was not had to circumstances that might restrict the liability of the administrator upon the principles already stated. Although we might readily, on the basis of the returns set forth, arrive at a solution of the present question, yet to some extent that conclusion would rest on presumptions and inferences arising from those accounts.

As the statement of the accounts was not conformed to the principles that should have been applied to them, the attention of the parties not having been directed, as may be assumed, to such considerations, there should be a new inquiry directed and confined, as it regards the present question, to ascertaining how much, if any, of the amount funded in bonds consisted of confederate currency rightfully in the hands of the administrator as assets of the intestate not available for outlay to meet any other proper exigency of the estate, to the end that the administrator should receive credit for such amount upon the principles above stated. To the extent thus indicated the conclusions of the Circuit judge should be set aside.

What has already been said disposes of the questions raised by the appeal in the first, second, third, fourth, tenth and twelfth grounds of appeal.

The fifth ground of appeal is not well taken. Interest is *charged in the customary manner, commencing at the beginning of the year next succeeding the granting of administration. The argument of the appellant seems to treat the charge of interest as a penalty for not disbursing funds in due time; on the contrary, as the rule has been applied too long to admit of question, it is intended to enforce upon the administrator the duty of keeping the funds of the estate productive which are employed for the purposes of administration.

The first proposition embraced under the sixth point is that forfeiture of commissions for want of making due annual returns cannot be enforced as incidental to an accounting, but must be made the subject of a judgment directly establishing the forfeiture and imposing the penalty. The doctrine contended for is undoubtedly sound in its application to forfeitures affecting vested rights, but commissions are compensations for services rendered. The forfeiture imposed by the statute afforded only the right to commissions as compensation for mere work to be performed, which was an executory right and not anything in the nature of a vested right.

The other proposition under this sixth ground of appeal claims commissions on the amount found to be due by the final judgment in this action. Upon the final adjustment of the account in conformity herewith, the administrator will be entitled to such commissions upon the amounts ascertained to have been received and disbursed by him as shall not have been previously credited in the accounts, provided such commissions shall not have relation to years in which the administrator failed to make his returns.

As the footing of an account remains to be finally ascertained, the principles in question cannot be applied to ascertain at the present time the proper allowance for commissions.

Nor can we yet determine, as affecting the question of commissions, on the amount of any judgment that may be recovered by plaintiff, whether conforming to such judgment should be regarded in equity as a voluntary payment under judicial construction, or as purely in invitum. What has been said disposes of the points raised by the seventh ground of appeal.

It is urged that the omission to file returns

during the dis*arrangement of business occasioned by the war, was excusable. The requirement is a statute requirement, and conditions not expressed cannot be interpolated. Whether it is competent for a court of equity to allow to an administrator compensation, where he ought not to be chargeable with the failure to file his returns, is a question that cannot be considered, for want of sufficient ground laid for raising such question; the claim here is for commissions and must be pursued under statute.

It will become necessary to settle the interest account in harmony with the ultimate conclusion, whether the administrator is to be regarded as having actually paid in the amounts due from himself and from Keenan & Norris. If it is found that no such payment was made, then interest should be computed on the notes and no charge for interest made in the accounts as for cash received. If it is found that any part of that indebtedness is to be regarded as paid, the interest will, as to such part, run into the interest account, and as to the unpaid balance, be computed on the notes as indebtedness. The parties in interest had an undoubted right to hold the administrator to the statement of an actual payment, and also to rely on the principle of equity that deems the amount due from the administrator as paid. In taking the position that there was no actual or legal payment, they demand a re-adjustment of the account according to the actual facts and that entails a corresponding re-adjustment of the interest account.

The ninth ground relates to matters that can have no important bearing on the questions at issue. The eleventh ground cannot be supported; the facts on which it depends were seriously controverted by testimony conflicting with that of the administrator, and the conclusion of fact that he had failed to establish the fact that his action complained of was taken with the advice and consent of certain of the distributees, cannot be disturbed, for the reason that it depends almost wholly on a question of the credibility of the conflicting testimony.

The twelfth ground contains the proposition that because the debtor in a certain transaction (the confederate government) had said to its creditors that unless they performed certain acts, not called for by their contracts, those debts should be reduced to a *certain amount, such declaration should be judicially enforced. We do not think that this proposition demands argument to show that it has no foundation.

The objection that the judgment was not filed in sixty days after the adjournment of the court, is without force. The constitution imposes no penalty for the failure of judges to render their decisions in the required time, and the courts certainly would not visit the consequences of any wrong that might be committed by a judge on the innocent party entitled to a judgment, and who is the only party prejudiced by the delay, by taking from him a judgment admittedly just.

The judgment of the Circuit Court must be set aside, so far as inconsistent herewith, and in all other respects affirmed, and the case remanded for further proceedings in conformity herewith.

Decree modified.

Before Mackey, J., at Union, October Term, 1877.

The seven causes above stated were heard together on Circuit and in this court, and they all involve the same questions.

The Spartanburg, Union and Columbia Railroad Company is a common carrier; as such it had received at its two termini the goods for the recovery of the value of which the above-entitled actions were brought. The goods in some of the above-stated cases were unladen from the cars on the forenoon of Friday, June 1st, 1877, in some on Saturday afternoon, June 2d, and in the others before either of the above-specified dates, and placed in the depot at the time of unlading—the freight charges thereon being unpaid.

During an extensive conflagration in the town of Union, in the said state, (not originating at the depot,) on the 3d day of June, 1877, the depot and its contents, including the goods above mentioned, were consumed.

It was in proof that no notice of arrival had been given to the consignees, and that the company required payment of freight charges before delivery. The plaintiff, Farrar, lived in Union county, fourteen miles from town; all the other plaintiffs resided and did business in the town of Union.

The court charged the jury that unless there is a special exemption, in terms, of liability, brought home to consignee, a common carrier retains its character as a common carrier until notice of the arrival of the goods is given to consignee, and he *had reasonable time afterwards to take the goods; to which defendant excepted.

The court further charged the jury that the liability of common carriers, as such, must extend over the whole time of the existence of their lien for freight; to which defendant excepted.

The jury found verdicts for plaintiffs.

Defendants appealed upon the same grounds taken in their exceptions to the judge's charge.

Mr. James H. Rion, for appellants.

1. We admit that if the goods were in the custody of the defendant as common carriers, then the company is liable for their destruction by an accidental fire.

2. If, however, the custody was that of warehousemen, then the company, having proven that the fire occurred without fault on its part, the defendant is not liable. 11 Rich. 339.

3. The whole question in this case turns, then, upon determining in what character the defendant had custody of the goods when burnt—as common carriers or as warehousemen.

4. His Honor erred in holding that a notice of the arrival of the goods was necessary to terminate the liability of the company as a common carrier.

(a) As a matter of custom, the proof establishes the fact that at Union, where there is only this one railroad, no notice was ever given, except under peculiar circumstances not affecting this case.

(b) As a matter of law the company was not bound to give any notice.

2 Redf. on Rail., p. 63, § 4, says: "And we understand the cases to have settled the question that the carrier by railway is neither bound to deliver to the consignee personally, or to give notice of the arrival of goods."

5. Upon unloading the cars and placing the goods in the depot, there being no custom or statute law requiring notice of the arrival to be given, the company immediately became relieved of its liability as common carriers, and only liable as warehousemen.

*1 Gray 263. In this case it is distinctly held that no notice of arrival of goods need be given.

The same law as that laid down by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts is held in Indiana, in 12 Ind. 55; in New Jersey, in 5 Dutcher 394; in Iowa, in 25 Iowa 60; in North Carolina, in 6 Jones 343; and in Illinois, in the latest case that I can find, 42 Ill. 132, it is held "that the rule, though not the best that might be adopted in the premises, is well settled that a railroad company, to discharge its liability as carrier, on getting the goods to their place of destination is not bound to deliver them to the consignee personally, or give notice of their arrival; and after storing them in a suitable place to await the demand of the consignee, the liability is only that of a warehouseman."

I am also informed that the same rule obtains in Minnesota.

I think the argument contained in the last two paragraphs of the decision of Chief Justice Shaw, in the above-cited case from 1 Gray 263, unanswerable, and as furnishing the law, where the lex loci is not contra.

I admit that in other states the rule is different; but in some this notice is required by statute or custom; and in other states railroad charters uniformly require this notice. In South Carolina, Judge Whitner, in 11 Rich. 341, says: "Some future case may settle this question."

6. This, if held to be error in the charge of his Honor the Circuit judge, was one of so material a nature that no authorities are necessary to establish that the defendant is entitled to a new trial.

Mr. William Munro, for respondents.

The same point is involved in the seven cases, and is that made in the first ground of appeal, viz.: "Because his Honor charged the jury that unless there is a special exemption in terms of liability brought home to consignee, a common carrier retains its character as a common carrier until notice of the arrival of the goods is given the consignee, and he has a reasonable time afterwards to take the goods."

The liability of the defendant as common carrier continued *until notice to the plaintiffs of the arrival of the goods at Union, and until a reasonable time thereafter for their removal.

The obligation of the carrier is to deliver as well as to carry.

Delivery is either actual or constructive. "Constructive delivery consists of notice, tender, readiness and present ability to deliver according to the contract, all such conditions being reasonable as to time and place, and so constituting duty to receive." 23 How. 35. Mr. Cushing's argument and authorities cited.

Carriers by land must make actual delivery to the consignee at his dwelling or place of business. Story on Bail., § 543; 2 Kent 604, 605; 2 Redf. on Rail. 60; Chitty on Carriers 89, 90.

Carriers by ship deliver at the wharf, but due notice must first be given to the consignee. Story on Bail., §§ 544, 545; 4 Bing. N. C. 314; S. C., 3 Mann. & G. 642; 2 Redf. on Rail. 65, and authorities hereafter cited. The rule is stated in the case of The Eddy, 5 Wall. 495.

The delivery must be on a proper day as regards the weather, and must also be on a business day, and at a proper hour of such day, and the liability of the vessel continues until the owner or consignee has had a reasonable time to examine the goods and determine whether he will take them or not. 23 How. 39; Parsons on Maritime Law, Book I., ch. VII., pp. 152, 153, 154, and cases cited.

Notice must always be given. The carrier cannot relieve himself by storing in his or any other warehouse, without giving notice. 49 N. Y. 444; 15 Johns. 39; 5 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 692; 45 N. Y. 13; 1 Denio 45. Notice to the consignee or a due effort to find him, if he is unknown, is a condition precedent to the right to warehouse the goods. 14 Wall. 107; 49 N. Y. 444, supra.

The rule as to delivery is the same in the case of carriers by sea and inland waters. 52 N. Y. 45, 52; 2 Kent 605; 5 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 692, supra; Angell on Carriers 310; 3 N. Y., (3 Comst.) 322; 49 N. Y. 444.

As to what constitutes a sufficient delivery by a railroad company as common carrier, the decisions are conflicting, and the law is not definitely settled. In 16 Wall. 324, Justice Davis, speaking of delivery by railways, says: "Different views have been *entertained by different jurists of what the carrier is required to do when the transit is ended, in order to terminate his liability." Justice Bradley, in a very recent case, (Grand Trunk Railway v. Stevens, Vol. V., No. 6, of The Reporter, 163,) says: "The business of the common carrier, in this country at least, is emphatically a branch of the public service, and the condition upon which that public service shall be performed by private enterprise are not yet entirely settled." In 11 Rich. 341, the court says: "Though it may well be claimed that the terms of the contract," (which limited the liability of the company to the unloading of the cars) "dispensed with a personal delivery, some future case may settle the question raised in the argument, whether it also dispensed with notice of arrival."

The Supreme Court of Michigan, in 16 Mich. 79, says: "Three distinct views have been taken by different jurists, neither of which can be said to have been, so far, generally accepted as to have become the prevailing rule of the courts." These are—First. That the liability terminates when the transportation is ended, and the goods are deposited in the carrier's warehouse, at the place of destination. Second. That the liability continues until a reasonable time has elapsed, after the arrival, for the consignee to examine and remove the goods. And, Third. That in addition to such reasonable time, notice of arrival must be given to consignee.

The first rule above mentioned was originated by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in 1 Gray 263, and was re-affirmed in 118 Mass. 201. It holds that the delivery is complete when the goods are deposited on the platform, if in daytime, and in the depot if at night. It withdraws all protection from the goods at the moment when most exposed to hazard of loss.

The second rule is sustained by a majority of the cases, and probably grew out of dissatisfaction with the first. They generally condemn the Massachusetts rule, and in the greater number, if not all the cases, notice had, in fact, been received by the consignee of the arrival of the goods. And the reasoning which leads to the conclusion reached, would seem to lead to the rule of the common law. See the authorities collected in the argument *for plaintiff in 118 Mass. 201; S. C., 19 Am. Rep. 436, 437. See, also, 2 Wait Actions 50, 51.

But the strength of the argument is with the third rule. It is thus stated in 44 N. Y. 511: "If the consignee is present upon the arrival of the goods, he must take them without unreasonable delay. If he is not present, but lives at or in the immediate vicinity of the place of delivery, the carrier must notify him of the arrival of the goods, and then he has a reasonable time to take and remove them. If he is absent, unknown, or cannot be found, then the carrier can place the goods in its freight-house, and, after keeping them a reasonable time if the consignor does not call for them, its liability as a common carrier ceases." 49 N. Y. 225; 49 N. Y. 444; 45 N. Y. 13; 52 N. Y. 637.

It is the rule of the common law. Carriers were, at common law, held to actual personal delivery. But carriers by ship were excused from delivery at the consignee's warehouse, because the ship could proceed no further than the wharf; notice of arrival and of readiness to deliver were substituted in place of actual delivery to the consignee at his warehouse or dwelling. 44 N. Y. 510; 10 N. Y. 438; 34 N. Y. 501; 49 N. Y. 444, supra; Story on Bail. 545. In 2 Redf. on Rail. 65, it is said: "The course of doing business upon railways, their being confined to a particular route, having stated places of deposit, and generally erecting warehouses for the safe keeping of goods, all seem to require that the same rule as to the delivery of goods should prevail, which does in transportation by ships and steamboats."

Indeed, the similarity in the two modes of carriage is complete. Take the case of a line of sea-going steamers, or say river steamers, for the same rule applies to both. The steamer cannot leave the water, as the cars are confined to the track. One lands at the wharf, the other at the depot. There may be, and sometimes are, as many landings for the steamer as stations on the railroad. The time of arrival of the steamer is as reasonably certain as the train. And the consignee is as likely to know upon which steamer as upon which train his goods may be. Wherefore should not the same rule be applied to both? Why should the ship be required to give notice of arrival and the railroad not? Is there any reason why the rule which is applied with rigor in *the one case should be relaxed in the other? Is it because the railroad company deposits its freight in its own warehouse? And without charge? But the ship cannot relieve itself by depositing in its warehouse.

Besides, the depot is not built for the convenience of the shipper or consignee, but for the convenience of the railroad company. 2 Redf. on Rail. 56, 57, 58, 59, 67. Depots and warehouses are useful and necessary for the safety and protection of the railroad company as a carrier, but are not absolutely essential to its business or employment as carrier.

For goods lost or destroyed while in the depot awaiting shipment, the railroad company is liable as well as another. Why not also for freight awaiting delivery?

The shipper makes but one contract with the railway, as with the ship. It is to carry and deliver the freight. He makes no contract for storage. Railroad companies are not warehousemen. They store no goods except such as are awaiting shipment or delivery. This is the purpose for which their depots and warehouses are built; to enable them to comply with the strict rule of the law as regards delivery with safety and advantage to themselves. Railways are constantly receiving and discharging freight, and as during those times goods would be liable to be damaged from exposure to all sorts of weather, for which the company would be responsible, depots and warehouses are necessary for the protection of the company. The process of unloading and separating the different consignments, and comparing with the bills, is necessarily tedious, and if carried on without doors would require great additional force, would cause vast accumulations of freight and entail heavy expense, besides multiplying the opportunities for theft. For this reason railways never deliver from the cars; and the consignee, even if present, is required to wait until the goods are placed in the depot and there assorted and compared with the bills, and until the company is ready to deliver.

In Wisconsin, the rule requiring notice to be given was defeated, and the rule limiting the carrier's liability to a reasonable time after deposit in the depot, was established by a divided court, Judges Cooley and Christiancy favoring the former view, *and Campbell and another the latter. The argument on our side is ably put by Judge Cooley in 16 Mich. 79.

November 25th, 1878. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. Each of the above-entitled cases rests in substantially the same state of facts, and involves the same legal questions. Counsel have presented these cases as if precisely the same proceedings were had and the same rulings given in each, and we must so consider them as it regards the questions raised. There are some minor differences in the facts that do not affect the questions raised by the appeals, and will not be noticed.

The facts are simply that the plaintiffs in the various cases shipped goods by the defendant corporation, as a carrier by rail, that were carried to their place of destination, but before actual delivery were consumed by fire, without fault on the part of the defendants, while in the defendants' depot. No evidence appears to have been offered tending to show that the place in which the goods were deposited was a safe and substantial warehouse, and no such question appears to have been submitted to the jury.

The court charged the jury "that unless there is special exemption, in terms of liability, brought home to consignees, a common carrier retains its character as a common carrier until notice of the arrival of the goods be given to consignees, and he has a reasonable time afterwards to take the goods;" also "that the liability of the common carrier, as such, must extend over the whole time of the existence of their lien for freight." To both of these propositions defendants excepted.

The question involved is, when, in the ordinary course of business of a carrier by rail, independent of any special features in the contract, does the liability of the common carrier, as such, cease after the goods have arrived at their place of destination? The rule as to the termination of the liability of a carrier by rail, as a common carrier, is unsettled in this state, as was recognized in Wardlaw v. Railroad, 11 Rich. 337. In the other states of this Union much conflict of authority exists. Such is the divided state of authority that the present decision cannot be largely influenced by any unbalanced weight of authority derived *from the adjudicated cases of the other states. We may, however, be largely aided in recognizing the principles fundamental to the question, by the able discussion it has received in the courts of various states.

The business of carrying passengers and goods by rail did not directly grow out of that of either the carrier by land or by water, as known to the common law. If the one had passed into the other by insensible steps, the legal identity of the relations would have been perfect. In that case it would only be necessary to ascertain whether any modification of the rule applicable to the ancient modes of carriage was rendered necessary by alterations, either in the means employed or the mode of transacting business, the foundation of the liability of the carrier remaining the same in both cases.

The business of a common carrier, as known to the common law, was a mere private undertaking, conducted on a limited scale. Goods were entrusted to the hands of private persons to be conveyed from place to place. The common law rule of liability took its present form while the highways of Great Britain were infested by predatory bands, and the carriage of persons and property attended with much hazard. No one but the carrier and his servants could know to what extent goods undergoing carriage might be unnecessarily exposed to depredation or destruction from the elements, and the law wisely placed the carrier in the attitude of an insurer against all injuries to the property, except such as happened by what was called the act of God and of the public enemies of the realm. He was compelled to seek out and make personal delivery to the consignee, unless by contract or local custom a substituted delivery was permitted in lieu of actual delivery.

What is just said of the carrier by land is equally applicable to the carrier by water of early times, except that he was excused for damages that happened through the perils of navigation, and he was not bound to seek out the consignee.

It sometimes happened that both the carrier by land and by water could relieve himself of the special liabilities incident to his calling by depositing goods in a warehouse, but that was out of the due course of his

The introduction of railroads not only changed radically the nature of the means employed for carriage, but the character and responsibility of the carrier, the sanction under which his business was conducted, and the methods and habits of dealing between him and those transacting business with him. Public sanction was necessary before the business could be undertaken. Legislation was framed to mould the business to suit the public convenience. The necessity of a large capital to supply the means of conducting the business insures adequate responsibility. The mode in which goods were received, transported and delivered was the subject of rules and regulations publicly known. The consignee, instead of dealing with an obscure person, transacting his business either by himself alone or with the aid of one or more servants who might be in secret accord with him to wrong those entrusting their property to him, dealt with a conspicuous public body, transacting its business by the aid of a large retinue of railroad officials, amply sufficient to protect the property from depredation, and too numerous to unite as conspirators for any predatory purpose. Goods undergoing transportation, instead of being exposed in a wagon, poorly attended, upon a highway, or standing in the public yard of an inn, were received in substantial enclosures, locked up in safe cars, and delivered from depots or warehouses with as much safety as if in the storehouse of the owner.

The history of railroads is part of the public history of the country, and furnishes the means of tracing any relationship that may exist between the ancient and the modern calling. We do not find the wagon-road undergoing gradual change until it was converted into a railroad, nor the wagon gradually transmuted into a train of cars.

Railroad transportation displaced rather than modified the former modes of conveyance, and must be regarded in the highest sense a new method of transportation. In many respects it has been assimilated to the old, for the purpose of defining the legal relations of the carrier by rail. He has been called a com*mon carrier and subjected to the liabilities incident to that calling. This conclusion is universally adopted and cannot be questioned at this late day. But it is still competent to inquire to what extent this assimilation may be carried without running the risk of denoting as identical, things diametrically opposite.

The common law held both the carrier by land and water subject to his primary measure of liability until actual delivery, or where substituted delivery was allowed, until such substituted delivery was perfect. The reason of this was obvious. In the case of the carrier by land the goods were supposed to be exposed to the peculiar risks incident to that mode of conveyance until actual delivery. Neither general nor local custom regarded the carrier as fulfilling the double office of a carrier and warehouseman. He was not called upon to provide himself with any such means and appliances for guarding the goods committed to his custody. In legal contemplation the goods had no other security than the personal watchfulness of the carrier or his servants. He was not at liberty to divest himself of the duty of making a personal delivery by placing the goods in either a public or private warehouse, such a course not being contemplated by his contract. As a necessary consequence of this view the peculiar risks attending the transportation of goods did not cease when he reached the place of their destination, and accordingly the measure of liability remained unchanged notwithstanding such arrival.

So with the carrier by water. While goods were conveyed by sailing vessels, the duration of a voyage was too uncertain to allow the consignee to estimate with any degree of certainty the time of the arrival of his goods; besides in the imperfect and irregular modes of transmitting intelligence in early times a consignee in a remote or foreign port might be dependent on notice of the arrival of a shipment for his advices concerning it. Under such circumstances it is obvious that where the contract in its primary import was to make personal delivery, the shipowner could not discharge himself of its obligations without at least notice to the consignee, if he could with reasonable diligence be found. The reason why notice to the consignee was expected in the case of the carrier by water, was that his contract was to *make actual delivery on board his vessel or on a suitable wharf, lighter or other place according to the usual custom of such port of delivery, while the carrier by land was bound to convey to the consignee's usual place of receiving such goods. The carrier by water to get rid of his liability had to put the consignee in default, so that he might deposit the goods subject to his charge for freight, and to do so, notice was, in the nature of the contract, indispensable.

both land and water depended upon the nature of the contract of carriage, and that the law treated the two contracts in a somewhat different manner corresponding to the difference in the means employed and the nature of the business; and we may reasonably conclude that any entirely new mode of conveyance, while still regarded in a general sense as giving rise to the known contract of carriage, would receive the same discriminating consideration at the hands of the law.

These considerations bring us to the conclusion that while a railroad company is to be regarded as a common carrier, yet not in the sense that no modification of the rule of liability of common carriers is to be indulged, but that the same measure of liability exists in both cases where, by parity of reason, like grounds exist for it, and that where the reason of the rule is inapplicable the rule itself cannot be applied. But, even if the railroad company is a common carrier in the strictest sense, still its business would have to be regarded as of a special class, distinct from that either of a carrier by land or water as understood at common law, and therefore entitled to such modifications as it regards the measure of liability as naturally springs from the altered terms of the contract of conveyance, this conclusion being justified by the consideration of the difference allowed between the two species of conveyance formerly comprising the whole ordinary means of transport. These views will find support in the adjudicated cases presently to be considered. It is generally conceded by the authorities that a railroad company as a carrier of freight is not bound to make delivery to the consignee at any other place than its own depot. The prevailing idea is that the company only agrees to convey to a place of *destination and hold safely there for the use of the consignee or owner. In other words, the railroad company is regarded not as contracting to convey generally, but by the special means of conveyance with which it conducts its business. As its carriages are made to run only on a road of particular construction they are regarded as strictly confined to such road, and therefore the points at which the company contract to take and deliver goods are regarded as identical with the terminal points of the road on which their carriages run, or with points intermediate such termini.

In the respect just mentioned, the contract of the carrier by rail differs materially from that of the ordinary common carrier by land, and as has been noticed in the cases, approximates more nearly that of the carrier by water.

Notwithstanding this fact, the liabilities imposed by the authorities, if those of the State of New York are excepted, are those that belong to the common carrier by land.

While, as has been said, it has become well settled that the measure of liability is the same under both contracts, yet it is clear that the time when that peculiar liability ceases, as it regards the carrier by rail cannot be fixed by reference only to the rule in the case of the ordinary common carrier, for the difference between the contracts is material as it regards the mode of terminating the risks by delivery.

It certainly would not be proper to say that the contract of the carrier by rail shall be referred to that of the ordinary carrier by land, for the purpose of determining the measure of primary liability, but to that of the carrier by water to ascertain when that primary measure of liability ceases. This would be dealing with the subject on merely arbitrary grounds and not rationally. There is another reason why we cannot look to the contract of the carrier by water as affording the tests for saying when the liability of a common carrier ceases in the case of carriage by rail. The carrier by water, although not bound to take goods beyond the customary landing-place, in search of the consignee or owner, is bound to give notice of the place of intended delivery, yet, according to the clear weight of nearly all the authorities, the railroad company is not bound to give such notice. It is proper *here to notice what will be more fully considered hereafter, that there are dicta in the judicial decisions of New York to the contrary of the proposition just stated, but the judicial authority of a single state is not sufficient to outweigh general consent in a matter depending on general considerations and not on local statute law. The reason of the distinction referred to is obvious. No particular place of delivery is usually fixed by the contract for carriage by water; but any customary point of delivery at the port or place of destination, is within the contemplation of the contract, so that while the consignee may know that at a certain port or harbor his goods will be found at the end of the voyage, yet at what particular place in such port or harbor cannot be ascertained from the terms of the contract of carriage. The port of delivery may be a large seaport town, where it would be practically impossible to keep himself informed, without notice, of the arrival of vessels or goods at all the points of delivery possible under the contract. On the other hand, the contract of the carrier by rail contemplates a certain known place as the point of delivery, namely, the depot of the road at the point of destination. In following the clear weight of authority and reason to the conclusion that the railroad company is not bound to give notice to consignees of freight, we depart materially from the terms and intentions of the contract of the carrier by water, and cannot rest upon it as a test of the present question.

We must, therefore, come back for such help as we can get from the principles and analogies that are suggested by the contract of the ordinary common carrier by land.

The primary liability of the ordinary common carrier is only continued by the law of his contract so long as the goods are subject to the risks incident to that mode of carriage. This follows from what has been already said. To use a simple illustration, not far from the fact in early days, when the law was taking its final shape, the goods did not leave the carrier's wagon until they were put in the consignee's hands. In other words, the goods are assumed to be subject to the risks attending transportation until actual delivery, or what might be substituted for it. The primary liability lasted, therefore, no longer than the period *during which the property was subject to the risks of transportation.

Allowing the full force of this principle to the case of carriage by rail, and there still remains a question whether goods in the hands of a carrier by rail are to be regarded as subject to the risks of transportation at all times while they are in the hands of the carrier, even after their arrival at their place of destination and though placed in a safe and proper warehouse belonging to the carrier for the benefit of the consignee, and until the consignee takes them away or is in default for not complying with his part of the contract by paying freight and taking them away.

This is the exact question that has been discussed and variously decided in the courts of different states. Although the present case does not bring to view all the possible elements of this question, inasmuch as it is not made to appear that the goods of the plaintiffs on arrival were placed in a safe and proper warehouse, yet it is essential that the question should be discussed upon all its features, although a less extended consideration might suffice to dispose of the case as it stands.

That railroad companies who conduct their business in the most approved manner, have at command warehouses properly constructed and guarded for the safe custody of the goods of consignees appears to be conceded in all the cases as a matter of public notoriety. Assuming such to be the fact in a supposed case, and that at the arrival of goods the consignee not being in waiting to receive them, they are placed in such a well-constructed and guarded warehouse under the care of proper persons ready at all reasonable times to deliver such goods to the owner or consignee on demand and compliance with the contract of affreightment, could such goods be properly said to be subject to the peculiar risks of transportation while so placed? To make such an affirmation would only be possible through a confusion of terms. If, on the other hand, the goods have actually passed beyond the reach of the proper risks of transportation, what warrant is there from any principle or analogy furnished by the law of the ordinary carrier's contract, for insisting that the carrier shall remain bound as an insurer against a certain class of risks after such risks have ceased to exist? Clearly there is *none. If we are at liberty to follow the reason of the case, it is clear that we must come to the conclusion that the liability of a carrier by rail, considered as an ordinary common carrier, ceases the moment the goods have arrived at their place of destination, and are placed in a properly constructed and guarded warehouse subject to the demand of the consignee. The mere unloading of goods upon an open platform, accessible to persons who have no right to handle the goods, is clearly not contemplated by the proposition just stated, nor ought it so to be, for goods so placed are in every sense subject to the risk of transportation, and even more exposed than when locked up in cars either in motion or at rest.

It remains for us to consider how far a clear weight of authority must be allowed to influence our final conclusion. A question much discussed in the cases, as to whether the liability of a common carrier does not remain even after the goods have been securely placed in a proper warehouse at the point of destination until after the expiration of a reasonable time for the consignee to call and take them away, will be discussed in connection with the adjudicated cases.

Norway Plains Co. v. Railroad, 1 Gray (Mass.) 263. This is a leading case in Massachusetts and has been recognized as such by the courts of several of the states. It fully sustains the proposition that placing the goods at the place of destination, in a proper warehouse for the use of the consignee, without additional charge, provided he shall demand them in a reasonable time, is a complete performance by the carrier by rail of his duty as a common carrier, and his subsequent liabilities are those of a warehouseman. It indicates the proper effect of the delay of the consignee to take away his goods in a reasonable time, namely to authorize the carrier to charge as warehouseman for the subsequent custody of the goods, while, until the lapse of such reasonable delay, the sums agreed to be paid for transportation include the proper charges for storage. The carrier is, by this case, treated as a warehouseman from the moment that the goods are lodged in his warehouse.

This case illustrates the principle, that where the peculiar risks to which goods are exposed in the course of transportation cease, *the special compensations for such risks ought to cease also. Rice v. Hart, 118 Mass. 201; s. c., 19 Am. Rep. 436. This case follows the last-mentioned, but unless carefully read might create the impression that that case went to the extent of holding that the mere unloading of the goods upon the platform of a depot at the place of destination of itself terminated the liability of the carrier, but a careful comparison of the cases shows that the Norway Plains Co. case treated the platform in that case as within and part of a suitable warehouse. The probable explanation of the peculiar language of Rice v. Hart is, that it intended an inquiry, whether conceding the platform in question to be part of a suitable warehouse, there was a termination of the contract of the carrier, as such until after the goods had been removed from such platform into a place fitted for more permanent storage.

In this point of view the Norway Plains case certainly holds that the platform, being part of the warehouse, deposit upon it was sufficient in itself. This is perfectly consistent with the general rule that goods delivered to a warehouseman, at the usual place for receiving goods, are regarded as stored, prior to their removal to a position for permanent storage. The rule established by the cases appears to be finally settled in the State of Massachusetts.

Railroad v. Ayres, 29 N. J. 393. This case does not involve the direct question under consideration, but merely the reasonableness of a by-law of a railroad company relating to the mode of discharging freight. Haines, J., however, undertakes to state the rule of duty by which the carrier by rail is affected. He says "the obligation of a common carrier by railway is, safely to transport the goods to the place of destination, to deposit them without delay, and without additional charge, in their warehouse, until the owner or consignee has a reasonable time to remove them. They are not required, as carriers by wagons, to deliver at the door or place of business of the owner or consignee, nor as carriers by water, to give notice of their arrival."

This is certainly a clear interpretation of the contract, but the statement of the consequences flowing from it is not equally fortunate. He says again: "Having the merchandise in good order *and safety, stored and protected from weather and from trespasses and ready for delivery, allowing a reasonable time for the owner or consignee to remove them, their duty as carriers ceases; and they were no longer liable as carriers." The case did not call for the statement of the consequences to flow from the carrier's contract; had it done so, doubtless some explanation would have been offered for the continuance of the carrier's liability as such, after the goods had been placed beyond the reach of the peculiar risks attending transportation, by being safely lodged in a warehouse at the place of destination. Accepting the interpretation here put upon the contract, that the carrier by rail is bound to put the goods at the place of destination in a suitable warehouse, what, we would ask, was the intent of such a stipulation, whether actually made or to be presumed? Clearly none other than that the goods, at their arrival at the place of destination, should forthwith be put in a state of security, freeing them from subjection to the risks of transportation. If the carrier complies with such obligation and places the goods beyond exposure to such hazards, there is no propriety in still holding him to the same responsibility as if the goods were yet exposed to those risks. Such a construction would be equitable, the carrier would gain nothing by providing a warehouse for the security of the goods, while the consignee would be under a motive to leave the goods stored at the cost of the carrier, protected by the double security of a proper warehouse and a carrier's liability as insurer up to the last moment that the law would adjudge reasonable.

Public convenience is often referred to as influencing the view to be taken of the contract of the carrier by rail, but if that consideration has any weight here, it would be on the side of furnishing railroad companies with an adequate motive for providing all their depots with safe warehouses, which might be afforded, could they know that their special liability as common carriers might be terminated by the proper use of such appliances.

Moses v. Railroad, 32 N. H. 523. The discussion of the general question of the mode by which a carrier by rail may discharge himself of liability as a common carrier, might well have been avoided in this case, for the jury had found actual negligence on the part of the railroad, and as the verdict in other *respects did not present all the elements necessary for a full discussion of the question, Sawyer, J., enters at length into the discussion. While seeming to assent to the proposition that the carrier by rail ought to provide suitable warehouses for the protection of goods awaiting removal, yet he holds that the full measure of liability as common carrier remains until a reasonable time for removing the goods has elapsed. The reason assigned for this is that the goods, though in a warehouse, were still subject to the exclusive control of the carrier and his servants. Doubtless this is true, but the nature of the risk remaining must be looked to, and this is the same and no other than all goods are subjected to that are undergoing storage in the hands of a bailee. The law properly estimates that class of risks when it places the liability of the warehouseman, on the ground of failure of due care. The risks attending transportation belong, in the estimation of the law, to an entirely different class, and call for a measure of liability that is exceptional, as compared with the responsibilities incident to all other forms of bailment. No good reason is presented in the case or perceived why this exceptional liability should remain after the risks have been reduced from an exceptional character to the ordinary risks incident to a bailment for the purposes of storage. There is no propriety or authority for holding railroad companies to providing storehouses in addition to what is imposed on ordinary carriers, unless such is the contract of carriage; and if such is the contract of carriage, it is senseless unless compliance with the obligation to place in warehouses involves a release from that liability which would ensue if such obligation was not complied with. It would be equivalent to saying we will hold you as insurers of the goods unless you place them beyond the reach of the risks of transportation, but nevertheless, though you so place them, we will still continue to regard you as insurers. Judge Sawyer regards the claim of exemption from the liabilities of a common carrier by showing that the goods were placed in a warehouse, as a case of attempting to throw off the liabilities of the contract of conveyance without the fault of the consignee. How this can be reconciled with the concession that it is part of the duty of the carrier by rail to "protect the goods from weather and depredation," is *not apparent. It is probable that he had in mind the case of a carrier by water, who is not at liberty, by the terms of his contract, to place the goods of a consignor in a warehouse without attempting a direct delivery, but as he fully recognized the difference that exists between the contract to convey by water and that by rail in this respect, it might be supposed that he would have traced such distinction in the consequences flowing from the two contracts. The explanation given in the opinion for this conclusion is, that placing the goods in a warehouse, solely protected by warehouse responsibilities, is an act not called for by the contract of conveyance. But he had previously said that it was the duty of the carrier to protect the goods "from weather and depredation" while in the process of unloading and awaiting removal. This language certainly would not be applied to the carrier by wagon, considered as an insurer of safe delivery in good order, and its only force lies in the fact that railroad companies usually offered warehouse facilities for such purposes. If the learned judge in the language noted means merely that such discharge of the liabilities of the common carrier is no part of the contract, then the contract is left without that reciprocity of obligation that is demanded by the rules of sound interpretation. In other words, the contract is one-sided—increasing the duties of the carrier without any corresponding consideration for such accession of responsibility. The case just considered cannot be regarded as finally adjudicating the various matters discussed in the opinion of the court, as they were not necessarily involved.

Blumenthal v. Brainard, 38 Vt. 402. This case seems to have involved, principally, the question whether the defendant had modified his liability as a common carrier by notice relating to the mode of discharging goods. But the discussion of the question was carried beyond that view of the case. The contract of carriage was treated in this case, precisely as if it had been a contract to convey by water, with the single exception that it was conceded as the result of the authorities that no notice of arrival was necessary. The doctrine of the case is, in general terms, that the carrier by rail remains liable as a common carrier until the consignee has had a reasonable time to remove the goods. It admits of doubt, whether the court had in mind the *case of goods placed on arrival in a suitable warehouse, but assuming that such was the intended meaning of the case, it certainly affords a striking illustration of the objection to continuing the strict liability of a common carrier after the goods are placed in safety. The necessity of determining what is a reasonable time within which the consignee should call for his goods, according to this case, renders necessary the introduction of a jury; that the law furnishes no other solution than that which can be afforded by the verdict of a jury. If the parties can come to an understanding as to what time shall be deemed reasonable, it must be by compromise, for no legal rule or principle, capable of being applied without a jury, can solve the problem according to this authority. It is certainly unfortunate, if no better mode can be found for adjusting the differences that must frequently arise, even without the fault of the parties concerned in the course of an immense commerce of this class, especially when arising, as it often does, out of a purely accidental event, such as the accidental burning of a building, a hardship equally to both parties. To require parties under such circumstances to add to their misfortunes a law suit, is certainly to be avoided if possible. It is true, that even under the view that a railroad company may discharge itself of the liabilities of a common carrier by storing the goods, yet if such storage is neglected, the question of what is a reasonable time within which the consignee should have called for his goods may arise, and have to be disposed of by means of a jury, but in that case the burden of the suit would be occasioned by the neglect of the railroad company to avail themselves of the means of discharging that liability. In that case the railroad company could only justly blame themselves, and not the law for not providing them with the means of avoiding litigation. But the hardship is apparent when the railroad company having faithfully done all demanded by them for the security of the consignees' goods, still incurring this misfortune of an accidental destruction of its buildings by fire, are yet compelled to undergo the burden of ascertaining by a burdensome appeal to a jury whether there had been no delay in removing his goods by the consignee.

Still such considerations are not in themselves conclusive. We *must follow the contract and not abstract considerations of justice. If the contract bears the construction that appears reasonable, then this evil is avoided. And the question whether it is reasonable, looks to some extent to the character and mode of adjusting the ultimate rights growing out of it. If parties have in view a direct and simple way by which they may disentangle and adjust their relations, and another that leads to entanglement and needless litigation, all other things being equal it must be assumed that they intended the better and rejected the worse.

If resort to the verdict of a jury in such cases is a hardship, it is all the more so when the mode of determining the reasonableness of the delay is unequal and arbitrary, as it is made by the language of the case under consideration. Kellog, J., holds that a reasonable time is such "as would give a person residing in the vicinity of the place of delivery, and informed of the usual course of business on the part of the servants of the company in unloading the cars and delivering the goods of that character, and also informed of the time when the goods may be expected to arrive, suitable opportunity within the usual business hours for delivering such goods after they had been placed in readiness for such delivery, to come to the place of delivery and inspect the goods and take them away." After all, as full as the statement of this rule is, it is virtually a negation of the rule that the consignee is entitled to reasonable time to call for his goods, except where the consignee is a resident immediately at the termini and intermediate stations of the railroad. All other consignees must be satisfied with the measure that fits those who reside in the immediate vicinity of a railroad station, although it may not afford a reasonable time considering their circumstances. In its application to land conveyance this statement of the rule must be regarded as purely arbitrary, having no antecedent in general or local custom. Perhaps it is the best that could be done to avoid the intrinsic difficulties of the position assumed, but that admission would be fatal to the construction of the contract of conveyance that calls for judicial interposition of such a character. Such a rule may be necessary in the case of vessels trading from port to port, having goods consigned to a port at which it can only make a temporary stay, and under the necessity *of discharging such freight either by immediate delivery to a consignee, or of depositing for his account in a public warehouse, but even in that case its form must come from general usage, but has no applicability to a railroad having a storehouse for freight at every point at which it can be called on to make delivery. It is the irresistible conclusion from the case just considered, that the view of the contract of the carrier by rail that holds him responsible as a common carrier after he has deposited goods at the place of destination in a suitable warehouse, is attended by difficulties theoretical and practical so numerous as to enforce the conviction that it is a departure from the beaten paths of the law.

Bausemen v. Railroad, 28 Ind. 434. This case fully sustains the proposition that the liability of the railroad company as common carrier ceases when the goods are placed in a warehouse at the point of destination, without notice to consignee.

Francis v. Railroad, 25 Iowa, 60, sustains the same proposition as that last stated. Wood v. Crocker, 18 Wis. 345, follows Moses v. Railroad, already commented on, but adds nothing to the strength of the reasoning of that case.

Railroad v. Scott, 42 Ill. 132. The rule, as applied by this case, is thus stated by Breeze, J.: "But the rule is settled that no notice is necessary to the consignee, and if he is not present to receive the goods, which he has no means, by the use of ordinary diligence, of knowing have arrived, the carrier can store the goods safely in a suitable warehouse and await the demand of the consignee. When thus stored, the duty of the railroad as a common carrier terminates and that of a warehouseman begins; the warehouse must be a safe and secure place."

This same proposition is again stated in Vincent v. Railroad, 49 Ill. 247, although not directly involved in that case.

McCarty v. Railroad, 30 Penn. 247. While this case can hardly be regarded as finally settling the rule for Pennsylvania, as it involved circumstances of a special character, yet the language of the case is explicit, and sustains the views presented above.

The New York cases do not appear to have received that clear *investigation that have usually characterized the treatment of commercial cases in the courts of that state.

McDonald v. Railroad, 34 N. Y. 497. This case related wholly to the duty of an intermediate carrier, as it regards transmission to the next carrier in line. The decision is not necessarily inconsistent with the doctrine that the carrier, at the point of destination, may discharge himself of liability by deposit in a warehouse; but in the course of the remarks made by Smith, J., a different view was presented. He holds that, according to the weight of authority in that state, as applicable to both carriers by rail and water, notice to the owner or consignee of the arrival of the goods, and a reasonable time and opportunity after notice to remove them, would come in lieu of personal delivery. On examining the antecedent cases in that state, no such authority has been found as applicable to railroad carriage, although the rule, as applied to water carriage, has abundant support. Fisk v. Newton, 1 Denio 45; Ostrander v. Brown, 15 Johns. 39; Miller v. Nav. Co., 10 N. Y. 431. It is to be inferred that the learned judge assumed that the two cases were without distinction as it regarded the applicability of the rule, and that his reference has relation to the cases bearing on the liabilities of carriers by water. This case can, in no proper sense, be regarded as deciding the proposition thus commented upon.

Witbeck v. Holland, 45 N. Y. 13. Again, in this case a statement of the general rule as affecting carriers by rail was attempted, although the case was against an express company, and therefore involved a more strict application of the rule as affecting ordinary common carriers than is appropriate in the case of carriers by rail. Groon, J., incidentally remarks, in regard to carriers by boat and railway, that "such carriers discharge themselves from responsibility as such by transporting the goods to their nearest business station to the residence or place of business of the consignee, and notifying the consignee of their readiness to deliver the goods at such station." The object of making this statement is clearly disclosed as merely negative, by his adding that express companies were not entitled to this exemption. This case must be excluded from the list of those entitled to authority in the settlement of the present question.

*Fenner v. Railroad, 34 N. Y. 505. In this case, the consignee was present when the goods arrived, and, at his request, the goods were placed in the defendant's warehouse and there consumed by accidental fire. It was clearly a case for the discharge of the defendant from liability as common carrier under either view that might be taken of the general rule, for it was the case of an independent bailment disconnected from the duty of the defendant as common carrier. The court might well have avoided discussion of the general rule, nevertheless, Earle, commissioner, states that the rule adopted in Massachusetts had not been adopted in New York. He holds the contrary of that doctrine, alleging, as the ground of that conclusion, certain considerations of public convenience. He says: "From the drift of the decisions in this state, I think we may fairly infer the following rules as to the delivery of goods at their place of destination by a railroad carrier. If the consignee is present upon the arrival of the goods, he must take them without unnecessary delay. If he is not present, but lives at or in the immediate vicinity of the place of delivery, the carrier must notify him of the arrival of the goods, and then he has a reasonable time to take and remove them. If he is absent, unknown or cannot be found, then the carrier can place the goods in its freight-house, and, after keeping them a reasonable time, if the consignee does not call for them, its liability as a common carrier ceases. If, after the arrival of the goods, the consignee has a reasonable opportunity to remove them and does not, he cannot hold the carrier as an insurer. The carrier's liability thus applied and limited, I believe, will be found consonant with the public policy and sufficiently convenient and practicable." Considered as a statement of the state of the law in New York, this is deficient. In the first place, because not essential to the decision of the case; and, secondly, because it professes to be matter of opinion alone. Its conclusion is not stated as constructed from the solid wood of adjudicated cases, but from the "drift" of the decisions. As a judicial inference, which, in terms, it professes to be, it lacks fundamental character, for, instead of reasoning from the terms and equity of the contract itself, it summons to its support only considerations derived from what is conceded to be public con*venience. When carefully considered, we think public convenience will be best promoted by the opposite rule, but, at all events, too great stress should not be laid on that consideration, as it is peculiarly the province of the legislature to conform the transactions between private individuals to such forms and modes as may be essential to promote public convenience.

Hedges v. Railroad, 49 N. Y. 223. This case depended upon special circumstances, that rendered a statement of the general rule unnecessary. The question actually considered was whether the consignee had used due diligence in removing his goods before the burning of the defendants' depot by fire. The appeal appears to have been based on a charge, that the question of negligence was for the jury. On appeal it was held that this was erroneous; on an admitted state of facts it was for the court to say whether there was or was not negligence. This conclusion is in conflict with Blumenthal v. Brainard, supra, and assumes that the law supplies a fixed standard of what is to be considered negligence in such a case—a proposition that needs better support, as it regards carriage by rail, than any that has been found in the adjudicated cases. In this case Folzer, J., states the general rule on the authority of Fenner v. Railroad alone, the authority of which case has just been considered.

It is singular that this question does not appear to have received in the courts of that state the consideration that its importance demanded. This is to be regretted, for the decisions of the courts of New York, especially on commercial questions, are consulted with great interest wherever its able judiciary bestow full consideration upon them. It is also singular that the view of the New York judges should run counter to the general current of the authorities elsewhere on the subject of the duty of the carrier by rail to give notice.

On the whole, the weight of best authority appears to be with the conclusion already stated, as naturally flowing from the contract of the carrier by rail. Certainly the reasons that induce that conclusion have not been shaken by the positions assumed in the various cases by those holding opposite views.

The Circuit judge was clearly in error in holding the defendants liable, as common carriers, until notice was given and a *reasonable time elapsed for removing the goods. Notice was not necessary, and the question whether the liability as a common carrier remained after the arrival of the goods, and until the consignee had a reasonable time to remove them, depended on whether the goods remained exposed to the risks of transportation or were safely stored in a suitable warehouse.

The judge also erred in holding that the liability of common carrier subsisted as long as the lien of the carrier subsisted for freight. Had the goods, on default of the consignee to claim them in due time, been deposited in a public warehouse, the liability of the carrier would have ceased without destroying the lien for freight, and this is sufficient to render the statement of the proposition erroneous without regard to the effect of other modes of terminating the carrier's responsibility. There must be a new trial.

McIVER, A. J. I concur fully in the result of the opinion, filed by the CHIEF JUSTICE, in these cases. I think he has conclusively demonstrated that there was error in the charge of the Circuit judge in both points embraced by the exceptions. But I am not prepared to assent to the proposition contained in the opinion, "that the liability of a carrier by rail, considered as an ordinary common carrier, ceases the moment the goods have arrived at their place of destination, and are placed in a properly constructed and guarded warehouse subject to the demand of the consignee." And on the contrary, as at present advised, I am inclined to the opinion that while the carrier by rail is not bound to give notice to the consignee of the arrival of his goods, yet that his liability as carrier continues until the consignee has had a reasonable time after the arrival of the goods to remove them. The error, therefore, of the Circuit judge, according to my view, consisted in fixing the period when such reasonable time would begin to run, at the time when notice was given instead of at the time of the arrival of the goods. The rule as to a carrier's liability has been too long and too well settled to admit now of any dispute, even though we might, upon abstract principles, be disposed to regard it as a harsh and unjust rule. That rule is based largely upon considerations of public policy. As Best, *C. J., says in Riley v. Horne, 5 Bing. 217: "Where goods are delivered to a carrier they are, usually, no longer under the eye of the owner; he seldom follows or sends any servant with them to the place of their destination. If they should be lost or injured by the grossest negligence of the carrier or his servants, or stolen by them, or by thieves in collusion with them, the owner would be unable to prove either of these causes of loss. His witnesses must be the carrier's servants, and they, knowing that they could not be contradicted, would excuse their master and themselves. To give due security to property, the law has added to that responsibility of a carrier which immediately arises out of his contract to carry for a reward, namely, that of taking all reasonable care of it, the responsibility of an insurer." This language implies that the reason of the rigid rule as to the liability of carriers rests, mainly, upon the fact that the evidence of the cause of the loss or injury to goods, while in the hands of the carrier, must be sought for from those who are supposed to be under the influence or control of the carrier.

Now while it is very true, as abundantly shown in the opinion of the Chief Justice, that the introduction of this new mode of carriage, by rail, differing so essentially, in many respects, from any mode of carrying known at the time the rule was established, demands some modifications of the rules regulating the contract for carriage by land, yet the same reason as that above indicated, applies with equal, if not greater, force to a carrier by rail as to a carrier by wagon or other primitive mode of tansportation.

The rule was established not merely, as seems to be assumed, for the purpose of protecting the shipper while his goods were in the course of transportation, or as it is expressed, while exposed to the risks of transportation, but also while they were in the possession and under the control of the carrier for the purpose of being transported and until they were delivered. It is obvious that if the goods of the shipper are destroyed after being placed in the depot of a railroad company, it would be quite as necessary for him to resort to the servants and employees of the company for evidence showing the cause of the loss, as if they were destroyed in the cars before they were taken out and placed *in the depot. It will not do to say that the carrier's liability, as such, exists only while the goods are exposed to the risks of transportation, which must mean only while the goods are in the course of transportation, for goods in a depot, awaiting shipment, are certainly not in the hands of the railroad company, as a warehouseman, but as a carrier. Suppose cotton is hauled to the depot of a railroad, and deposited either on the platform or placed in the depot in the evening to be shipped the next day, and the railroad agent gives a receipt to the shipper for the cotton; if, during the night, it is destroyed by an accidental fire, would not the company be liable? If so, why? Because the carrier has received the cotton under a contract to carry it to a certain point, and although it is destroyed before the transportation commenced, and therefore before it was exposed to any of the risks of transportation, having so received it the liability of carrier immediately arose. This is adverted to merely for the purpose of showing what is conceived to the defect in the argument in support of the view taken by the Chief Justice, viz., that the carrier is only liable, as such, while the goods are exposed to the risks of transportation. It is said, however, that the obligation of a railroad company to provide safe and suitable warehouses or depots is one-sided and without any corresponding advantage, unless it is allowed to use these depots for the purpose of relieving itself from liability as a carrier. To this it may well be answered that these depots are erected for the convenience and security of the company, and are required by the exigencies of its business demanding that its vehicles of transportation should make only short stops at the various stations, which forbid delivery directly from such vehicles to the consignee; and that, as it is exempted from the obligation of making actual delivery of the goods intrusted to it, at the place of business of the consignee, as in the case of carriers by wagon, and from the obligation of giving notice, as in the case of carriers by water, such exemptions afford it ample compensation for the additional obligation imposed upon it. It seems to me that there is an obvious inconsistency in the proposition laid down in the case of Norway Plains Co. v. Boston and Maine R. R. Co., 1 Gray 263, which may be regarded as the leading case in support *of the view presented by the Chief Justice. In that case the proposition is laid own, that placing the goods, at the place of destination, in a proper warehouse for the use of the consignee, without additional charge, provided he shall demand them in a reasonable time, is a complete performance by the carrier by rail of his duty as a common carrier, and his subsequent liabilities are those of a warehouseman. This proposition involves the idea that the freight money is a sufficient compensation not only for the actual transportation of the goods, but for the subsequent care of them between the time of their deposit in the warehouse and the expiration of a reasonable time thereafter, within which the consignee may take them away without paying anything for storage during that time. It follows, therefore, that during such reasonable time within which the consignee is allowed to remove them, that the railroad company could not charge for storage as a warehouseman. If this be so, how can it be said that during that time the railroad company holds the goods as warehouseman? If it did, then clearly it ought to have the right, which is denied by the terms of the proposition under review, of charging for storage as a warehouseman.

The theory upon which the case rests, as is said in the subsequent case of Rice v. Hart, 118 Mass. 201; 19 Am. Rep. 433, is "that delivery from themselves [the railroad company] as common carriers to themselves, as keepers for hire, discharges their responsibility as common carriers." If so, then the company must be considered as though it were two separate and distinct persons—a carrier and a warehouseman—and by what authority one can be regarded as under an obligation to perform the duties incident to his calling as a warehouseman, among which is that of securely keeping the goods entrusted to his care, for a single day or a single hour, without any compensation whatever, simply because he may have received compensation for performing duties incident to another and altogether different calling, I am unable to understand. If, at the moment that the goods are delivered by the railroad company, as a common carrier to itself as a warehouseman, its liabilities as a carrier cease, and its liabilities as a warehouseman begin, it would seem necessarily to follow that at the moment when its liabilities as a warehouseman begin, its *rights, as such, among which is the right to charge for storage, would also begin; for it would be a strange anomaly to subject one to the liabilities incident to a calling or position without, at the same time, conferring upon him the rights incident to such calling or position. And yet both of these Massachusetts cases necessarily involve this result. During the period between the deposit of the goods in the warehouse and the expiration of the reasonable time within which the consignee is permitted to remove them without charge, the goods are in the possession of the company, in the one capacity or the other, either as carrier or warehouseman. If the former, then the liability is that of a common carrier. If the latter, then the right is that of a warehouseman, to charge for storage. The only possible way of avoiding this inconsistency would be to push the doctrine to its legitimate result, by holding that the consignee must not only pay the freight for the transportation of his goods, but also storage from the moment they are placed in the depot until he is able to take them away. To this result, so glaringly unjust, the courts of Massachusetts do not seem willing to go, and hence the inconsistency which has been pointed out. If it is conceded that this question has never been decided in this state, and that the decisions elsewhere are conflicting, I do not propose, now, to enter upon a review or analysis of the cases, my only object being to indicate some of the reasons why I am unable to assent to the proposition above stated.

HASKELL, A. J. I cannot concur that there was error in the first proposition charged, but believing that there was error in the second, I concur in the result.

New trial granted.

R. C. McFADDEN v. A. A. GILBERT & F. E. DINGLE.

A sealed note for $1397, dated March 30th, 1870, and payable November 1st, 1871, "in currency at its gold value on the 10th day of January last passed," held to mean that the obligor would pay to the obligee at the maturity of the note so much money in currency as $1397 in gold would have commanded on January 10th, 1870. Haskell, A. J., dissented.

Before Shaw, J., at Sumter, September, 1876.

This was an action by Robert C. McFadden against Allen A. Gilbert and Francis E. Dingle to foreclose a mortgage of real estate given by the defendant, Allen A. Gilbert, to secure the payment of four sealed notes, dated March 30th, 1870.

The main question in the case was as to the construction of two of the said notes, one for $1397, payable on November 1st, 1871, "in currency at its gold value on the 10th day of January last passed, with interest from that date payable annually until the whole is paid;" and the other for the same amount and in the same terms, except that it was payable November 1st, 1872.

Upon the question as to the construction of the two notes above-mentioned, the decree of his Honor the Circuit judge is as follows:

I come now to the main question of law in the case, to wit, the construction of the contract to pay two sealed notes each for the sum of $1397 "in currency at its gold value on the 10th January, 1870."

As stated, in the finding of facts, it was argued by counsel that on January 10th, 1870, gold stood at a premium of twenty per cent. being worth $120, and currency at a discount of sixteen and two-thirds per cent. being worth eighty-three and two-thirds per cent. Either amount in a calculation, will bring the same result. The contract to pay "$1397 in currency, at its gold value, on 10th January, 1870," is not a contract to pay $1,-

397, but a different *sum, either more or less; whether more or less, depends entirely upon the wording of the sealed instrument itself and cannot be varied or altered by any parol agreement or calculation between the parties, if any such had been proved.

The words of the contract "in currency at its gold value" make evident the intent of both parties that the defendant, Gilbert, was not to be bound to pay in gold, nor to deliver to Mrs. Dingle so much gold as a commodity, but that he should have the privilege of paying, in currency, the amount the contract bound him to pay. The whole is, therefore, reduced to the single question, what amount does the contract bind him to pay in currency?

By admission of all parties $1 in currency on January 10th, 1870, could have commanded in the market only eighty-three and one-third cents in gold; Mr. Gilbert therefore had the right to tender currency, but was bound to tender so much as would command $1397 in gold.

A promise to pay $1397 in currency would be performed by the payment of so many dollars in United States treasury notes, called legal tenders, or in bills of national banks. But the promise in this case is not such a simple one. The value of the currency which was to be used in the payment, was not one hundred cents to the dollar, but its value in gold on a certain day, which value in gold was eighty-three and one-third cents.

The court cannot see how the contract is to be performed except by the payment of so much currency, as estimating each dollar at gold value on January 10th, 1870, to wit, eighty-three and one-third cents, will amount to the sum promised to be paid; upon the principle above enunciated, there was due on December 28th, 1874, on one of said notes the sum of $1507.62, all of which was principal, and on the other note, the sum of $2340.16 of which $1676.40 was principal, and $663.76 was interest.

A decree of foreclosure according to the foregoing opinion was duly entered and the defendant, Gilbert, appealed.

Messrs. Moise & Lee, for appellant.

Messrs. Blanding & Earle and Fraser, Haynsworth & Cooper, contra.

*November 25th, 1878. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The question in this case depends upon the construction to be put upon the language of two sealed notes, as it regards the amount to be paid. One of these notes is as follows:

"On or before the first day of November, 1871, I promise to pay to Joseph A. Duffin or order, thirteen hundred and ninety-seven dollars, in currency, at its gold value on the 10th day of January last past, with interest from that date, payable annually, until all is paid, for value received."

The other note is payable in 1872, but is, in all other respects, identical with that recited. The notes bear date March 30th, 1870, and cover the consideration of a sale of property.

It was evidently the intent of the parties that the payee should be put in the same position, as it regards the extent of his pecuniary interest under it, as if the money had been actually paid on the 10th day of January next preceding the date of the note, and the money put at interest at the rate contemplated by the contract. They were dealing in a fluctuating currency, and the parties, no doubt, intended to eliminate the fluctuations that might occur subsequent to the 10th day of January, 1870. If this conclusion be correct, then the instrument is to receive the same construction that would have been given had the parties contracted together on the 10th day of January, 1870, in the following terms, viz.: "I promise to pay J. A. D. this day $1397 in currency, at its present gold value." It is not disputed but that the parties could legally contract with reference to gold as the sole standard of value under the contract, nor that they might contract for payment in currency, according to its market value, in terms of gold instead of its nominal value, so that the amount of currency called for would be that which might be required to bring it to a purchasing value equal to the amount of gold coin called for by the terms of the note. The question placed before us for determination is, simply, what was the intention of the parties? When there are two standards of value of unequal purchasing power, and parties are at liberty to adopt either for their contracts, it is not unusual to find them so *doing. Where one of these standards is a fluctuating one, and the other is practically stationary, the motive to select one or the other of these standards as the rule of their dealing, is strong, according as the parties desire certainty in their dealings or the speculative advantage of fluctuations. It is evident that in the present case the parties desired a result certain on the 10th day of January, 1870, but at the same time the payor desired the convenience of liquidating the amount to become due at the maturity of the note in currency, more readily accessible than gold. It is, therefore, clear that they intended to refer the ascertainment of the amount to be paid in currency to the standard of gold value prevailing at that day. The question is, in what manner did they intend to apply this standard? The view taken by the Circuit decree is based on the fact that on the 10th day of January, 1870, $1 in gold was worth "one dollar and twenty cents in currency."

This fact is not disputed. The decree holds that each dollar called for by the notes was to be paid at maturity by $1.20 in currency. On the other hand the appellants contend that in order to ascertain the amount of currency required at maturity, the amount called for must be taken at the gold value of $1397 of currency, according to the value that prevailed on January 10th, 1870; that as each dollar of currency was worth only eighty-three and one-third cents at that time, the actual amount to be paid, measured by gold value, was $1164.12; that this is to be paid in an amount of currency worth at maturity that sum in gold. It follows that, as currency had appreciated at the maturity of the notes as compared with its value January 10th, 1870, a less sum was required in currency than was required by the face of the notes. The difference between the two views is, that, according to the Circuit decree, the value of the contract was fixed in terms of gold, and the quantity of currency required for payment to be ascertained by comparing the value of currency with that of gold on the 10th day of January, 1870, its nominal amount to be increased accordingly; while the appellants contend, in effect, that the amount of $1397 was nominal, merely, the gold value of that currency being the real agreed sum; and that the terms "at its gold value" were not used to estimate the value of the *currency by which payment might be made, but to convert a nominal liability, stated by the parties, into a real liability for a diminished sum. The Circuit decree rests on the idea that by "dollars" the parties meant legal dollars of the United States, fixed in reference to a certain quantity of gold of a certain fineness, while the appellants hold that "dollars" means something that was neither according to the standard of gold nor of currency at the date or maturity of the contract, but was an amount agreed on for that purpose, namely, eighty-three and one-third cents. Had the parties contracted in the terms above supposed, viz., to pay, on the 10th day of January, 1870, $1397, in currency at its gold value, the amount called for would have certainly been that arrived at by the Circuit decree. In that case the words "at its gold value" would have been senseless if the debt could be discharged by currency at the nominal value of $1397 that being less than gold value. To give these words any efficacy in the case supposed, it is necessary to assume that the amount to be paid was to be fixed according to the gold value of "dollars," and the currency to be taken for what it was worth relatively to gold. The result would have been that the amount of currency required on the 10th day of January would have been greater than the amount stated on the face of the notes by twenty per cent. The effect of this rule would be that the amount of currency required to discharge the contract would be unaffected by any subsequent fluctuations in the value of currency relative to gold, and this is the only motive that can be assigned to the parties for fixing a day certain as the basis for computing the relative value of currency and gold. Under the view taken by the appellants, the fluctuation of currency would not be alienated from the calculation of the amount due, for the more the purchasing value of currency increased, the less amount of it would take to satisfy the terms of the contract. On this view the payee would take the whole consequence of present depreciation without the benefit of future appreciation. Thus, as currency was in the course of appreciation, the payee would neither get the benefit of a gold contract nor a pure currency contract, but a mongrel less valuable than either. That the parties had in mind any such artificial rule of dealing is not for one moment to be supposed. What *were the essential characteristics of a gold contract was well understood by the community, and they often had recourse to such contracts. They also understood what was meant by a currency contract. The idea that "dollar," as used in this contract, should mean the amount of gold that a depreciated currency dollar would sell for on a particular day, is too metaphysical to suppose that it would influence practical dealings. Habits of dealing always enter largely into the construction of contracts. Disputable language in a contract is to be solved, if possible, by reference to familiar habits of dealing.

Fanciful and unusual intentions cannot be ascribed on merely inferential grounds, and without a necessity imposed by the sense of the terms employed.

In the present case there is no difficulty in the language employed to prevent placing the contract in question in the familiar class of "gold contracts," as dealt in by the people, and therefore we are not at liberty to assume intentions of a very special and unusual kind.

We are satisfied with the conclusions of the Circuit decree, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

McIVER, A. J., concurred: HASKELL, A. J., dissented.

(Case No. 660.)

THE STATE v. F. L. CARDOZA.

[1. Criminal Law ⟸911, 1156, 1159.]

This court cannot set aside the verdict of a jury on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence, or unsupported by it: such right belongs exclusively to the Circuit Court. The decision of that court is final and conclusive, unless it has committed some error of law.

A conspiracy on the part of a public officer, and others conspiring with him, with intent to cheat and defraud the state, through the forms of his own office, is a conspiracy to injure the public, imports a crime under the law of this state independently of the means used for that purpose, and is indictable at common law.

Before Townsend, J., at Richland, October Term, 1877.

This was an indictment against Richard H. Gleaves, Samuel J. Lee, Josephus Woodruff, A. O. Jones and Francis L. Cardoza, for conspiracy.

At a special term of the Court of General Sessions for Richland county, duly convened, which was begun to be holden in Columbia on August 27th, 1877, Judge J. B. Kershaw presiding, the grand jury being in attendance, but no petit jurors having been drawn or summoned or being in attendance, a true bill was found against the parties above named, for a conspiracy to cheat and defraud the State of South Carolina out of $4000, by means of a false warrant or legislative pay-certificate, drawn in favor of C. L. Frankfort, a fictitious person.

*That at the times hereinafter mentioned, and before and afterwards, Richard H. Gleaves was president of the Senate of the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina, Samuel J. Lee was speaker of the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the said state, Josephus Woodruff was clerk of the said Senate of the said state, A. O. Jones was clerk of the said House of Representatives of the said state, and Francis L. Cardoza was treasurer of the said state.

That the said Richard H. Gleaves, Samuel J. Lee, Josephus Woodruff, and A. O. Jones, and Francis L. Cardoza, late of the county and state aforesaid, on the tenth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four, with force and arms, at Columbia, in the county and state aforesaid, unlawfully, falsely, fraudulently and corruptly, did conspire, combine, confederate and agree together, by divers false pretences, to cheat and defraud the said State of South Carolina of a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of four thousand dollars, by means of a certain false and fraudulent paper, in the form of and purporting to be a warrant on the state treasurer, commonly called and known as a pay certificate, drawn by the said Richard H. Gleaves, president of the senate as aforesaid, and the said Samuel J. Lee, speaker of the house of representatives as aforesaid, on the treasurer of the State of South Carolina aforesaid, and attested by the said Josephus Woodruff, as clerk of said senate, and said A. O. Jones, as clerk of said house of representatives, in favor of one C. L. Frankfort, for the said sum of four thousand dollars for account of legislative expenses, they, the said Richard H. Gleaves, Samuel J. Lee, Josephus Woodruff, A. O. Jones, and Francis L. Cardoza, then and there falsely pretending and asserting that the said warrant was lawfully drawn by the said Richard H. Gleaves and Samuel J. Lee in favor of the said C. L. Frankfort for an amount due to the said C. L. Frankfort by the said State of South Carolina, whereas in truth and in fact, the said warrant was not lawfully drawn by the said Richard H. Gleaves and Samuel J. Lee; and whereas, in truth and in fact, the said warrant was not for an amount due the said C. L. Frankfort by the said state, there being no such person as the said C. *L. Frankfort, the said name being the name of a fictitious person, and the said warrant being false and fraudulent, as they, the said Richard H. Gleaves, Samuel J. Lee, Josephus Woodruff, A. O. Jones and Francis L. Cardoza, each of them, then and there well knew; and that in pursuance of the said conspiracy, combination, confederacy and agreement so had amongst themselves, the said Richard H. Gleaves, as president of the senate as aforesaid, and the said Samuel J. Lee, as speaker of the house of representatives as aforesaid, on the tenth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four, at Columbia, in the county and state aforesaid, with the knowledge and consent of the said Josephus Woodruff, A. O. Jones and Francis L. Cardoza, did draw and sign the warrant aforesaid, and thereupon the said Josephus Woodruff, as clerk of the senate as aforesaid, and the said A. O. Jones, as clerk of the house of representatives as aforesaid, did, with the knowledge and consent of the said Richard H. Gleaves and Samuel J. Lee and Francis L. Cardoza, then and there attest the warrant aforesaid, and the said Francis L. Cardoza, with the knowledge and consent of the said Richard H. Gleaves, Samuel J. Lee, Josephus Woodruff and A. O. Jones, did then and there, in payment of the said warrant, give, deliver and issue and divide between them, the said Richard H. Gleaves, Samuel J. Lee, Josephus Woodruff, A. O. Jones and himself, the said Francis L. Cardoza, certain evidences of indebtedness of the State of South Carolina, commonly called and known as certificates of indebtedness, to the amount of four thousand dollars, and of the value of four thousand dollars, the money and property of the said State of South Carolina, they, the said Richard H. Gleaves, Samuel J. Lee, Josephus Woodruff, A. O. Jones and Francis L. Cardoza, and each of them, then and there well knowing that the said warrant so drawn, used and paid as aforesaid, was not a legal and valid warrant, but was false and fraudulent, to the great damage of the said State of South Carolina, to the evil example of all others in like cases offending, and against the peace and dignity of the state.

same as the first, *except that it charged that the pay-certificate was paid in money, instead of in certificates of indebtedness, as is charged in the first count. The third count differs from the two preceding, in that it omits to allege any payment at all of the pay-certificate.

The fourth count read as follows:

And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present: That Richard H. Gleaves, Samuel J. Lee, Josephus Woodruff, A. O. Jones and Francis L. Cardoza, late of the county and state aforesaid, on the tenth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four, with force and arms, at Columbia, in the county and state aforesaid, unlawfully, falsely, fraudulently and corruptly did conspire, combine, confederate and agree together, by divers false pretences and indirect means, to cheat and defraud the said State of South Carolina of a large sum of money, to wit, of the sum of four thousand dollars, to the great damage of the said State of South Carolina, to the evil example of all others in like case offending, and against the peace and dignity of the state.

John R. Abney, Solicitor Fifth Circuit.

At general term of the Court of General Sessions for the county of Richland, begun to be holden at Columbia on the 22d day of October, 1877, there were present the Honorable C. P. Townsend, presiding judge, the grand jury, and thirty-one petit jurors, who were drawn and summoned in the manner prescribed by law. There being a deficiency of five, the court ordered a venire to issue for five additional jurors. A majority of the jury commissioners drew from a separate apartment in the jury box, into which had been placed the names of persons resident within five miles of the court-house, long after a proper and legal list of jurors had been prepared for this county for the year 1877, and from such separate apartment returned five names. Two of the jurors drawn on the original panel were then excused, leaving thereby a deficiency of two upon the panel, to fill which deficiency the court ordered a venire to issue for two additional petit jurors. A majority of the jury commissioners drew from a *separate apartment in the jury box, prepared as hereinbefore set forth, and returned the names of H. P. Green and John Crowley. The said additional jurors were duly summoned and appeared. The petit jurors were then organized by drawing twelve names, including those of Green and Crowley, to constitute jury No. 1, twelve other names to constitute jury No. 2, and the remaining twelve names were put on the list of supernumeraries.

On November 1st the case was called for trial. A nolle prosequi was entered by the attorney-general‡‡ as to the defendants, Samuel J. Lee, Josephus Woodruff and A. O. Jones. Richard H. Gleaves not having been arrested, the trial proceeded against Francis L. Cardoza alone.

Jury No. 1 was called; whereupon the state peremptorily challenged two jurors, and two others were then drawn from the supernumerary list to fill their places. The defendant then challenged these two. The court ruled that the defendant did not have the right to challenge jurors who were drawn to fill the vacancies on the panel—to which ruling the defendant excepted. The defendant objected to jurors H. P. Green and John Crowley, on the ground that they had not been drawn in accordance with law—their names having been drawn from the separate apartment in the jury box prepared as aforesaid. The court overruled the objection, and the defendant excepted. Defendant then challenged five jurors peremptorily, all of whom were on the jury as first organized, and including Green and Crowley. During the progress of the trial several questions upon the admissibility of evidence were raised, which are noticed in defendant's exceptions.

Counsel for the defendant submitted instructions for the jury, upon which the court charged as follows: [Those not brought to the attention of this court being omitted.]

5. "That the fourth count of the indictment is fatally defective in this, that it does not contain a statement of the means by which the alleged conspiracy was effected and consummated; and that upon the said count the defendant should be acquitted."

The court said: "I think, on the authorities, that this count can be sustained."

*7. "That the facts and circumstances relied on for corroboration must be such as are altogether independent of the accomplice, and taken independently lead to the inference, not only that the offence as charged has been committed, but that the prisoner is implicated in it; that the entries in the book produced by the witness, Woodruff, and the entries in the books of the Republican printing company, do not constitute evidence in corroboration of the evidence of the accomplices, Woodruff and Jones, as against the defendant now on trial, being nothing as against him beyond the mere declarations of the accomplices themselves."

The court said: "This has been charged in part, and in part it has not.

"This evidence has already been admitted by the court for this reason, that when those entries were made in the note book of Josephus Woodruff the conspiracy had not been consummated, and therefore they were the declarations of Woodruff and Jones in furtherance of the conspiracy. The court adheres to that ruling, and they are proper matters for your consideration.

"The same objection was made in the progress of the trial on questions of evidence, and I have already charged you on the first point of this instruction; that is, that those circumstances in corroboration of the accomplices must be independent of the accomplices. That instruction is, therefore, given you again. The latter part of the instruction the court does not feel inclined to give; that is, that the entries in the book produced by the witness Woodruff, and the entries in the books of the Republican printing company, are nothing but the declarations of those accomplices. I charged you that where an accomplice is simply corroborated by declarations made anterior to the date of the transactions, that evidence does not go in corroboration. But these entries were made contemporaneously with the transaction, and they are not unsupported corroboration, but they are facts noted down at the time of the transaction, and, therefore, may go in corroboration of the accomplices."

‡‡ Hon. James Connor.

8. "That the defendant should be acquitted upon the second count in the indictment, unless the jury should conclude from the evidence that the conspiracy alleged to have been consummated was effected by means of a false token or counterfeit letter within *the meaning of the statute, and by a payment of money, the property of the state, to the co-conspirators, as therein stated and charged, and, moreover, that such payment was made in pursuance and in furtherance of such conspiracy."

The court said: "This I decline to charge."

9. "That the declarations and admissions of a co-conspirator, made after the plot of a conspiracy is consummated, and not in furtherance thereof, do not constitute competent evidence of the fact of the conspiracy as against others, co-conspirators, and that, therefore, the entries upon the books of the Republican printing company, made after the alleged conspiracy was consummated, and relating only to the distributing of the plunder, should not be considered by the jury as against the defendant."

The court said: "This instruction is refused."

10. "That it being the duty and office of the treasurer of the state to pay joint certificates drawn by the president of the senate and the speaker of the house of representatives of the general assembly of the state, and attested by the clerk of each house, respectively, the fact that the joint certificate referred to in the indictment was paid by the defendant, as such treasurer, ought not to be considered as in confirmation of the evidence of the accomplices in the case."

11. "That deception is a necessary element of the offence of cheating; that to the commission of this offence against the state, it is necessary that the means employed should be calculated to deceive, and should actually deceive the state; that in respect of this offence, the state can be deceived only by deceiving the officer or officers of the state with whom the transaction is alleged to have occurred; that where such officer is not deceived, and, within the technical meaning of the term, cannot be cheated; that an officer cannot be convicted of conspiracy to cheat the state where the means employed are not such as, if the conspiracy be consummated, would be sufficient to convict him of the offence of cheating the state; and that upon the charge of conspiracy to cheat the state, as averred in the indictment herein, by means which were not calculated to deceive the defendant, the said defendant cannot be convicted."

*The court said: "On this, I charge you I do not think it has anything to do with the case."

12. "That in determining the verdict in this case, evidence in reference to other and distinct offences alleged to have been committed by the defendant at times either before or after the transactions alleged in the indictment, must be deemed incompetent, and, therefore, is not entitled to any weight whatever, and should not be considered by the jury."

The court said: "I still charge you on this point, and it is in reference to the 'Merriam' certificate and other fraudulent transactions which the state pretends this defendant had with other parties; the substantive defence is, that this defendant, as an official, was incorruptible. I admitted this testimony in regard to the 'Merriam' certificate in reply to that defence, and, therefore, I charge you now that I still think the testimony is competent as a matter of testimony, and you can take it into consideration."

The case was then given to the jury, who returned a verdict of guilty.

The defendant thereupon submitted a motion for a new trial upon the following grounds: [Omitting such as were not brought before this court for review.]

3. Because the court admitted the evidence of the declarations of R. H. Gleaves as a co-conspirator, not made in the presence of this defendant, before evidence other than that of an accomplice had been introduced to establish the conspiracy, and before evidence of any character had been introduced to connect A. O. Jones with the conspiracy, as charged in the indictment.

4. Because the witness, Josephus Woodruff, was allowed to refresh his memory by reference to a book, purporting to be a diary written in phonographic characters peculiar to the witness, and such as could not be verified in court; and because the said book was received in evidence as against this defendant, and matters said by the witness to be therein contained were translated and read by him to the jury.

5. Because the books of a partnership, known as the Republican printing company, to which the defendant was a stranger, were received in evidence, and entries therein read to the jury; *although it appeared that such entries were made by one W. H. Jackson, who was not produced as a witness, and not proved to be dead or absent from the state.

6. Because the entries in the books of the said Republican printing company were received in evidence against this defendant, on the ground that in one instance an entry of $800 to the credit of Josephus Woodruff, should be regarded as a declaration of the said Woodruff, and in another instance an entry of a like sum to the credit of A. O. Jones, as a declaration of the said Jones; although the said entries were made by the said Jackson, without evidence of the knowledge or assent of the said Woodruff and

Jones, and although they contained nothing to establish the privity of this defendant.

7. Because the said entries on the books of the Republican printing company were received in evidence as declarations in corroboration of the evidence of the said Woodruff and Jones as accomplices, before such evidence had been confirmed by the introduction of any independent fact; although the said entries were nothing more, in any point of view, than the mere evidence of the accomplices themselves, and could not be treated as independent facts and circumstances; and although they were declarations, if at all, made after the consummation of the conspiracy, not in furtherance thereof, and with reference solely to a division of the plunder.

8. Because an entry in the ledger of the said Republican printing company, of $9750, "paid to Sunday-school fund, C. L. F.," was received in evidence against this defendant, although the said entry was made by the said W. H. Jackson, an employee of the said company, and was not contained in a book of original entry, and although the witness, Woodruff proved that it did not refer so far as he knew, to the subject matter of the conspiracy in question, but to other and wholly different transactions by the said company with this defendant.

9. Because evidence was admitted in reference to a pay certificate, alleged to have been issued to one F. L. Christopher, which, if connected with this defendant, was irrelevant to the issues herein, and tended to establish a distinct substantive offence, wholly unconnected with the offence charged in this *indictment; but which, according to the evidence, was issued and paid without the knowledge or consent of this defendant, in the regular order of business and to a reputable banking-house in the city of Columbia.

10. Because the court, during the cross-examination of the defendant as a witness, ruled as competent for the purposes of contradiction, questions in reference to facts and circumstances irrelevant and not pertaining to any of the issues of the case; and for the declared purpose of contradiction, admitted evidence in reply wholly immaterial to the issues, and tending solely to establish against the defendant other and distinct offences, and thereby prejudice the minds of the jury against him.

11. Because evidence was admitted in reply ostensibly for the purpose of contradicting the evidence of the defendant, as a witness, in reference to facts and circumstances wholly irrelevant and immaterial to the issue, as to which the defendant had not been interrogated, and which tended, not to contradict the witness, but solely to establish against the defendant other and distinct offences, and thereby prejudice the minds of the jury against him; and because, for such purpose, entries in phonographic characters in the diary of the witness, Woodruff, were translated by him and read to the jury.

12. Because evidence was admitted in reply which did not tend to establish any fact inconsistent with the defence, but which was cumulative in its whole character, and if competent at any stage of the trial, could only have been introduced as evidence in chief.

14. Because the witness, Hardy Solomon, was permitted to testify, as evidence in reply, to facts and circumstances wholly irrelevant to the material issues of the case, not in reply to evidence introduced by the defence, and with reference to which the witness for the defence had not been interrogated; and upon the admission of this witness that he had testified to the same subject matter before a legislative committee, the printed report of which, in the volume of legislative reports, he presumed was correct, the defence was not permitted to show by reference to the printed report, a material variance in his evidence in this, that whilst the witness testified on the trial that he had paid to

*Moses $7000, and to Gleaves and Lee, each, $5000, and to the defendant either $3000 or $4000, he testified before the legislative committee that the total amount of his payments on this account was $15,000 or $17,000.

15. Because evidence was admitted to show that a statement in writing was delivered some time early in 1874 to the witness, A. O. Jones, of the assets of the Republican printing company, in the handwriting of Le Grand Benedict, the business manager, containing reference to a certificate of "C. L. Frankfort, $2400," and the entries upon such statement were received in evidence, although it was not proved that Benedict was dead or absent from the state, or that the settlement was true, or that any other fact existed to connect it with the material issues of this case.

16. Because the verdict in the case is contrary to and against the weight of the evidence.†

The motion for new trial was refused; whereupon the counsel for the defence excepted.

A motion in arrest of judgment was then made upon the following grounds:

1. That the jury rendering the verdict herein was not a legal and competent jury, and was not drawn, summoned, and empaneled according to law: In this, that to fill the deficiency in the number of jurors required by law, the names of five persons were drawn from an apartment of the jury box separate from the apartment containing the legal and proper list of jurors prepared at the time and in the manner prescribed by statute; that the jury commissioners of the said county were not authorized by law to place the names of jurors in such separate apartment, and to draw therefrom "the jurors to supply the deficiencies" in the regular panel; and that the persons so drawn were not in law competent to act as jurors. And in this, that the defendant was denied the right of peremptory challenge of jurors called to *take the place of other jurors removed from the panel by challenge.

2. That the indictment in each and every count thereof is fatally defective, in that the statement of the offence charged does not contain an averment of a conspiracy to cheat by means of "a false token or a counterfeit letter in another man's name."

3. That the indictment is fatally defective, in that the averment of the purpose and object of the conspiracy charged does not import a crime under the laws of this state.

4. That the indictment is fatally defective, in that the certificate therein referred to as the means by which the offence is charged to have been done and consummated, is not averred to be, and is not in law, either "a false token or a counterfeit letter in another man's name."

5. That the indictment is fatally defective, in that the acts charged against the defendant are repugnant and contradictory; and in that the defendant is charged with having conspired to cheat the state by means which were not calculated to deceive, and did not deceive, the state, because not calculated to deceive, and not such as could deceive, the defendant as the officer of the state charged with the performance of the act necessary to the consummation of the offence.

6. That the indictment is fatally defective, in that the offence therein charged is not set forth and stated with sufficient clearness and certainty; that the means by which, as it is alleged therein, the offence was intended to be, and was, consummated, are not set out either in substance or according to the tenor thereof; that the warrant or pay-certificate, described as the said means, is not set out with sufficient precision and certainty, and by such special and specific description as to number, date, and other peculiar and distinguishing marks as to identify the charge, and fully, fairly, substantially, and formally to describe to the defendant the crime for which he is held to answer.

7. That the special session of the Court of General Sessions, at which, as it appears, the indictment herein was found by the grand jury, was not a legally constituted court for such purpose; in this, that petit jurors were not drawn and summoned, and in attendance, upon the said session of court.

*The motion in arrest of judgment was denied. In denying the motion for new trial and in arrest of judgment, the court entered the following decision:

The third ground alleges error in the court in admitting the declarations of R. H. Gleaves, as a co-conspirator, before evidence had been introduced to establish the conspiracy, and before evidence of any character had been introduced to connect A. O. Jones with the conspiracy charged. The court in its ruling distinctly stated the rule of evidence to be, "that when there was prima facie proof of a conspiracy, then the declarations of co-conspirators distinctly relating to and in furtherance of the conspiracy were admissible." There was proof sufficient to establish prima facie the fact of the existence of the conspiracy, and on this ground it was ruled that the declarations of R. H. Gleaves were competent evidence. It was ruled by the court that it was not necessary to the conviction of the defendant to prove a conspiracy on the part of all of the parties mentioned in the indictment, but only in reference to any two or more of them. In the judgment of the court, it was not considered necessary for the state to connect A. O. Jones with the conspiracy, as a prerequisite to the admission of the declarations of Gleaves.

The fourth ground objects to the ruling of the court, in allowing the witness, Woodruff, to refresh his memory, in regard to the conspiracy charged, by reference to a private book containing contemporaneous entries of the transaction. It was ruled by the court, that the witness should be entitled to refer to this book to refresh his memory as to the transaction. The testimony of Woodruff was, that he had made the entries at the time in the book, and he was only allowed to refer to them for the purpose of refreshing his memory. The book was not introduced in evidence.

In regard to the fifth ground, it is only necessary to state that the testimony of Woodruff showed that W. H. Jackson, the party who had made the entries in the books referred to, was absent, and it was not known, nor could it be ascertained, where he was. His handwriting was proved. The books were admitted upon two grounds: 1st, a book containing original entries relating to *transactions connected with and in furtherance of the alleged conspiracy; 2d, as containing declarations of co-conspirators relating to and in furtherance of the conspiracy.

The sixth ground is akin to the fifth. Woodruff and Jones were the partners constituting the Republican printing company. The books introduced were the books of the concern. Knowledge of their contents may have been presumed on the part of the two partners. Besides, there was evidence to show that both Woodruff and Jones had full knowledge of the two entries referred to in this ground.

The seventh ground assails the admissibility of the books of the Republican printing company, because they contained declarations of the co-conspirators made after the consummation of the conspiracy, and not in furtherance thereof, and were not independent facts and circumstances of such a character as to render them admissible in corroboration of the accomplices. The entries in the books were not admitted solely for the purpose of corroboration. Even if they had been, having been made contemporaneously with transactions to which they related, they were in the nature of independent facts, because of the impossibility of their fabrication for the purpose, and might have gone in confirmation of the evidence of the accomplices. That they were not made until after the consummation of the conspiracy, and could not have been in furtherance of it, does not appear from the testimony relating thereto, until the entries were made and proper credits for the amounts received by each in the division of the fruits of the conspiracy had been given, it had not been entirely consummated. But the fact, that the books were not admitted to furnish corroboration solely to the accomplices, disposes of this ground.

The eighth ground assails the correctness of the ruling of the court in reference to an entry in the books of the Republican printing company, of $9750, when it was made by one W. H. Jackson, an employee of this company, and Woodruff testified that it did not relate, so far as he knew, to the conspiracy in question. The entry in the book was accompanied with the letters S. S. F. and C. L. F. As the alleged means of consummating the conspiracy charged was a pay-certificate, payable to *C. L. Frankfort, and the initials of the payee occurred in connection with the entry, the court ruled that the entry in the books, with the accompanying letters and testimony of Woodruff, should go to the jury, and if they found it related to the conspiracy in question, then they might consider it as competent testimony. It was not admitted as evidence by the court, only to this extent.

The ninth ground alleges error in the ruling of the court, that the pay-certificate issued to one F. L. Christopher was allowed to be introduced by the state. The main defence of the defendant was that he had been a faithful and incorruptible officer. To establish this fact, while Woodruff was on the stand, and in his cross-examination, he was interrogated in reference to a pay-certificate issued to one Merriam, and the paper was produced and introduced in evidence. It was shown by Woodruff that this was a fraudulent claim, and had been presented to the defendant by him, who, instead of accepting it, required Woodruff to mark it cancelled and unused. To meet this general defence, set up while the state was developing its case, this pay-certificate, and others of a like character, issued at the same time with the Merriam certificate, were admitted in evidence.

In the tenth ground, there is error alleged on the part of the court in allowing questions upon the defendant for the purpose of his contradiction in regard to facts and circumstances irrelevant and not pertaining to the issues of the case. It was ruled by the court that the matters about which the defendant was interrogated, for the purpose of laying the foundation for a contradiction, had been rendered material and relevant by the testimony extracted by the defendant's counsel from the witness of the state, as well as that delivered by the defendant himself. A reference to the evidence will disclose the materiality of these matters to the issues of this case.

The eleventh ground contains a general complaint against the admissibility of the evidence in reply for the state. No witness in the reply contradicted the defendant as to any matters except those in relation to which the defendant was specially interrogated. Woodruff, in the reply, did not read to the jury from a *book introduced in evidence as such, but referred to it for the purpose of refreshing his memory.

The twelfth ground is general. A review of the testimony admitted in the reply will not sustain the allegation that it was cumulative and incompetent.

The fourteenth ground alleges error, first in admitting the testimony of Hardy Solomon to contradict the defendant in regard to matters not relevant and pertinent to the issues of the case; and second, that according to the report of the testimony of Hardy Solomon before a legislative committee, there was a variance between his testimony then and on this trial, and there was no contradiction in fact. The court ruled that it was competent to contradict the defendant by the testimony of Solomon, because the foundation to do so had been properly laid when the defendant was on the stand, and the matters about which he was interrogated were material, and had been made so by the testimony of the defendant, to the issues of the case. In regard to the proof of the testimony delivered by Hardy Solomon before the legislative committee, the counsel is clearly mistaken. The report of the committee containing the evidence was offered and ruled to be incompetent. But the court distinctly ruled that the witness, Solomon, could be interrogated in reference thereto, and the report might be read in order to refresh his memory.

The fifteenth ground raises an objection to the admissibility of evidence after the trial. When it was introduced, there was no objection made, and it is now too late to assail its competency.

After a careful review of all the testimony, and a consideration of the objections suggested to the rulings of the court on questions of law, I am satisfied that the motion for a new trial should be denied, and it is so ordered and adjudged.

The motion in arrest of judgment is likewise based upon various grounds. These will now be considered.

* * * * * * * *

The motion in arrest of judgment is refused, and it is so adjudged.

November 22d, 1877.

*The sentence was then pronounced upon the defendant as follows: "The sentence of the court is, that the defendant, Francis L. Cardoza, be confined in the county jail for two years, and do pay a fine of four thousand dollars; and in default of the payment of the fine that he be confined in the county jail for one year, to commence after the expiration of the two years imprisonment imposed as a part of this sentence."

(Signed) C. P. Townsend,

November 26th, 1877. Presiding Judge.

The defendant gave notice of appeal.

The grounds of appeal cover the same grounds that are taken in the motions of new trial and in arrest of judgment, and in the exceptions to the judge's rulings and charges.

Messrs. Melton & Wingate, for appellants.

Hon. L. F. Youmans, Attorney-General, Hon. James Connor, late Attorney-General, and Mr. C. R. Miles, for respondent.

Mr. Samuel W. Melton, for appellants.

It is admitted that a motion for a new trial upon the ground of insufficient evidence, is not well made, unless it appear that the preponderance of evidence is so strong against the verdict as to induce the impression that the jury were actuated by motives outside of the case, as made by the evidence; that "negligence, caprice, partiality, corruption, misunderstanding or other such cause, has been disturbing the just exercise of their judgments." 15 Rich. 219.

The learned counsel then reviewed the testimony, and deduced the conclusion that "the judgment is without one jot or tittle of evidence to support it."

The motion in arrest of judgment presents three leading points: 1. That the jurors summoned to complete the panel were not drawn according to law; 2. That the right of challenge to jurors was denied to the defendant; 3. That the indictment is fatally defective in the particulars set forth in the motion in arrest of judgment.

First. Petit jurors for the term had been regularly drawn and *summoned from the jury box, properly prepared in January. Gen. Stat. 518. To complete the panel venires were issued for five, and, afterwards, for two more, additional jurors. These additional jurors were drawn from a separate apartment in the jury box, prepared in the manner indicated in Section 4 of act of June 8th, 1877. 16 Stat. 260. But nothing in this act applies to counties, for that year, where proper lists had been legally prepared in January. Under section 23, Chapter CXI. of General Statutes, additional jurors were drawn "from the bystanders or from the county at large, to complete the panel." Section 24 of this act was amended November 19th, 1873, (15 Stat. 485,) and in such amendment the proper mode was indicated of summoning jurors from the bystanders; but the provision relating to the selection of jurors from the "county at large" remained without amendment; and it was the established practice for the officers, when additional jurors were needed, to draw them from the jury box. The act of June 8th, 1877, in its first section, applies only to counties where there had been a failure to prepare a proper list for the year 1877. The second section repeals all laws which provide for the summoning of jurors from the bystanders, and directs that additional jurors shall be drawn, "such jurors to reside within five miles of the court-house." The fourth section provides for a separate apartment in the jury box to be filled when the jury lists are prepared for the year, with the names of those living within five miles, &c. The fourth section can only apply to the preparation of the jury list for each year—that is, in January.

Whilst the second section repealed the law as to bystanders, it did not affect the statute providing for selection from the "county at large." This continued in force, and the second section was intended to qualify it by restricting the selection to such jurors drawn from the box as were resident within five miles of the court-house.

The objection here taken is not to a mere irregularity. It appears upon the record and goes to the substance. The accused was entitled to trial by a jury drawn, summoned and impaneled according to law.

The law is familiar and the cases are abundant where courts *have interfered thus to protect the integrity of the jury box with an uncommon strictness. 2 N. & McC. 29; 15 Rich. 47; 5 Ired. 58; 1 Gr. & Wat. 171. The cases in this state make such ground good in arrest. 2 Sp. 216; 1 Rich. 189; 15 Rich. 47, supra; 15 Rich. 42.

In those cases which treat lightly certain irregularities, as they are termed, in the impaneling of juries, the irregularities were such as could not by any possibility affect the verdict; and the cases go off rather on the principle that the objection came too late after verdict. 2 McC. 12.

Second. The right to challenge peremptorily two jurors was denied.

At common law, the right of challenge was carefully guarded, and for good reasons. 4

Bla. Com. *353; 12 Whart. 480; 1 Bish. on Crim. Pro., § 935. And the courts are compelled to allow it. 1 Chit. on Crim. Law 534; 1 Denio 310. The court below was possibly misled by hasty reference to decisions under the act of 1841. 11 Stat. 168, and Gen. Stat. 522. The decisions upon this statute are 2 Sp. 418 and 2 Rich. 191, both civil cases. But the wording of the act, as applied to civil and criminal cases, is very different. But this act is repealed under the operation of the act of 1871. 15 Stat. 690, §§ 37, 38; Gen. Stat. 830. So much of act of 1841 as relates to civil cases, is re-enacted in General Statutes, § 26, p. 523. As to criminal cases, it was not re-enacted; but act of 1871 is, and right to challenge to the extent of five is given in cases like this. p. 747.

It is clear that such right in cases of misdemeanor was to be exercised in the same mode as in cases of felony, where it has always been without restriction, except as to number.

Third. There are several defects in the indictment.

1. In indictments for conspiracy, it is necessary, generally, that either the object or the means be criminal. 1 Bish. on Crim. Law, § 174; Whart. on Am. Crim. Law, §§ 2, 291, and note d; Rosc. Crim. Ev. 381. Wharton classifies conspiracies—1. To commit indictable offences; 2. To effect an object by indictable means; 3. To affect the community injuriously. 2 Prec. Ind., ch. 11. The third class is elaborately discussed in 2

Whart. *Prec. Ind., bottom, p. 97, et seq. It has been also recognized in this state. 2 Hill 282.

Outside of this third class the definition of a conspiracy is easy. 9 Cow. 571; 1 Cush. 223; Whart. on Am. Crim. Law, §§ 2297 or to 2305.

2. A combination to cheat is not criminal, unless the means intended to be employed are criminal; and to be criminal, they must come within the definition and meaning of "a false token or counterfeit letter in another man's name."

This offense is not and could not be included in the third class. It is confessedly referable to the second class, and will be found in 2 Whart. Prec., No. 614, following the sanction of Rex v. Gomperty, 9 Ad. & El. 823. See 2 B. & Ald. 204. But there was no statute of false pretences in South Carolina in 1874, and hence these cases have no application. 2 Whart. Prec. Ind. 93–103. 2 Hill 282, supra, was a case of the third class, and wholly out of this line.

In this state cheating is confined, as at common law, to a fraud accomplished through a false symbol or token, of a nature against which common prudence cannot guard, and which may affect the public, (1 Bish. on Crim. Law, § 571; Dud. 275;) or by statute "by color and means of a false token or counterfeit letter in any other man's name." Gen. Stat. 717. The terms cheat or cheat and defraud, do not, of themselves, import a crime; the object and the means must unite to constitute the offence.

3. An indictment for conspiracy to cheat is, therefore, fatally defective, unless it contain the averment of a combination to effect the object by means of "a false token or counterfeit letter in any other man's name;" and of means which, in law, come within the definition of these devices. 2 Hale P. C. 169; 1 Chit. on Crim. Law 168; 2 Bail. 69; Archb. Crim. Pr. 41; 4 Rich. 194; 3 McC. 190; 1 Bish. on Crim. Proc., §§ 508–530; 5 Barr 60; 49 Ind. 186. The argument is well put in 1 Cush. 189; and see 4 Metc. 111; 7 Cush. 514. The paper in this case may be fraudulent, but in the technical sense of the word cheat, it is not false. 2 Bish. on Crim. Law, §§ 145, 146; 1 Rich. 247; Dud. 275.

4. The indictment is fatally defective, because the offence, de*pending upon the character of the means employed, is not set forth with clearness, precision and certainty; and because the means constituting the essential element of the offence charged, are not set out, either in substance or according to the tenor, and by special and specific description as to numbers, dates and other peculiar and distinguishing marks, sufficient to identify the same, and fully, fairly, plainly, substantially and formally to describe the crime for which the defendant is held to answer. Const., Art. I., § 13; Bish. on Crim. Proc., ch. 28; Whart. on Crim. Law, §§ 285–304; 3 McC. 190; 3 Hill 63; 1 Bish. on Crim. Proc., §§ 515–520; Whart. on Crim. Law, §§ 285, 306, 307, 606–608, 1468, 2068, 2598, et seq.; 2 McC. 248.

5. The indictment is fatally defective for repugnancy. The state could have been cheated only by deceiving Cardoza, its agent, who is alleged to have had knowledge. 1 Cush. 33; 7 Car. & P. 352; 4 Barb. 151; 14 Ward. 546; 1 Rich. 244, 247; 2 Mill 135; 2 Bish. on Crim. Law, §§ 144–146.

Errors were committed in the admission of evidence.

Entries of a partnership were introduced without any proof of the death or absence from the state of the clerks who made them; and entries in a book were read by a witness, made by himself in phonographic characters, capable of being translated only by himself.

See remarks of Marshall, C. J., in 7 Cranch 290, 295. Entries may be proven only when made in ordinary course of business. 2 Brev. 156; 4 McC. 76; 2 McM. 306; 1 Strob. 135; 2 N. & McC. 436; 2 Speers 284; 1 Rich. 223; 2 Hill 584; 1 Bay 33; 2 Hill 677; 4 Strob. 193; 2 Phil. on Ev. (C. & H.'s notes) 754. These entries must be established by the oath of the party making them. 2 McC. 157. Nothing but death can excuse the absence of the clerk who made the entry. 4 McC. 257; Hill & Cow. notes to 2 Phil. on Ev. 694. This privilege of proving entries cannot be extended to strangers to the entry; and as a charge against one, it must be brought home to his knowledge. 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. (6 Am. ed.) *392, *394; 1 N. & McC. 131; 2 Id. 19; 2 Wheat. 117, and note; 1 Phil. on Ev. 320; 2 Id. 674-679, note 489 to p. 265; and note 432 to p. 558. A witness may be permitted to refresh his memory by *memoranda, but the memoranda themselves are not evidence. 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 437; 2 Phil. on Ev. 421, 528; 1 Whart. on Ev., §§ 516-526; Ros. Crim. Ev. 134; 2 C. & P. 603; 3 T. R. 749; State v. Rawls, 2 N. & McC. 331; 1 Rich. 234. As to the kind of memoranda which may be used, see 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. *402; 1 Mill 336; 5 Wend. 301; 1 Barb. 535. But it must be the original, not a copy. 1 Rich. 234, supra; 2 C. & P. 196; 2 Whart. on Ev. § 578; 2 Phil. on Ev. 756. A translation is no better than a copy; the courts will never extend the rule. Moreover, the memoranda refer to matters subsequent to the conspiracy, and are, therefore, inadmissible. Whart. on Ev. § 1206.

Evidence was admitted of distinct matters wholly irrelevant to and disconnected with the issues of the case. 2 Russ., by Graves, 772. A witness may not be questioned concerning an irrelevant fact, with a view to discredit or contradict. 1 Phil. on Ev. 210; 7 East. 108; 2 McC. 230.

Entries made in the Republican printing company's books were admitted as declarations of Jones and Woodruff. Facts which are regarded as confirmation of an accomplice, should be wholly independent of his testimony. 2 Stark. on Ev. 233, et seq.; 1 Bish. on Crim. Proc., § 1081, and notes; 2 Archb. *662; 3 Phil. on Ev. 1504.

The court refused the eighth instruction to the jury, asked for by defendant. It should have been charged in whole or in part. 1 Bish. on Crim. Proc., § 980.

Mr. C. R. Miles, contra.

Motion in Arrest of Judgment.—Of the seven grounds taken on this motion, the first and seventh relate to the jury, and the other five to the indictment.

The Jury.—1. The jury were drawn in conformity with the law as declared by act of June 8th, 1877—16 Stat. 259. See §§ 2, 4. The fifth section repeals all acts and parts of acts which are inconsistent with this. Before that, supernumeraries were drawn under Section 19 of act of 1871 (Gen. Stat. 522, § 23), but the act of 1877 declared that no jurors should be summoned from the bystanders: so that they could be drawn in this case only under act of 1877.

*1(a). The defendant objects that he was not allowed to challenge peremptorily the jurors called to take the place of the other jurors challenged by the state.

The jury act of 1871 (14 Stat. 692; Gen. Stat. 522) does not apply to the impaneling of juries in criminal cases: that must be according to the established practice. Sec. 19, Act of 1871. Under this act the defendant was entitled to five challenges, and the state to two. Previous to 1856, the established practice in making up a jury for the trial of one entitled to challenges, was to call the names of jury No. 1, beginning with the foreman, next jury No. 2, in the same way, and then the names of supernumeraries were drawn from a box. 3 Strob. 508, recognized in 10 Rich. 412. Then followed the rule of court (No. 97) for drawing in cases of felony (10 Rich. 549), which was sustained in 10 Rich. 351, 407, and 11 Rich. 581. The same rule was adopted in 1870, as Rule 26. This indictment not being for felony, the rule of court does not apply.

The right of challenge to jurors was extended to misdemeanors and civil causes by act of 1841. 11 Stat. 154. This act has been construed in civil cases. 2 Speer 418; 2 Rich. 191. The course pursued in this case was thus conformable to principle and practice.

The 7th ground in arrest of judgment is based on matter not appearing on the record, and came too late after verdict; the objection should have been taken by plea, before the grand jury at the trial term had been discharged, in analogy to the plea of misnomer, so that if sustained a new indictment might have been given out. But the objection is disposed of by statute—see Sec. 28, Gen. Stat. 570—showing that special sessions may be held for special cases; and Sec. 10, Gen. Stat. 520, showing that there may be special sessions not requiring a jury.

The indictment.—The five other grounds for the motion in arrest of judgment allege defects in the indictment. We take issue with appellant on each and every of these propositions, and submit—

1. That this indictment does sufficiently charge a conspiracy to cheat by a false token or counterfeit letter.

*2. That an indictment lies in this state for cheating by means other than a false token or counterfeit letter.

3. That indictment lies for a conspiracy to do an illegal act which is not indictable.

4. That the deception in this case consisted in the false and fraudulent official representation that the state was indebted to C. L. Frankfort, and drawing a certificate therefor in the form of a public certificate or voucher, as prescribed by law, which was calculated to deceive the public, and did actually deceive the officer of the treasury who paid it.

5. That the means are fully and sufficiently alleged in the indictment; but that it is not necessary to set forth the means.

1. Even if it was necessary to charge the conspiracy to cheat to have been by means which would sustain an indictment to cheat by a false token or counterfeit letter in another man's name, this indictment would be sufficient. The legislative pay-certificate was "a false public token," and the fictitious endorsement of C. L. Frankfort constituted "a counterfeit letter." 2 East P. C. 383, 832, 833; 1 Bish. on Crim. Law, § 571; 2 Id., § 543; 1 Rich. 244; 4 East 164. If the indictment shows the instrument to be a false token, it is not necessary to aver it. Cro. Car. 564; 3 Chit. on Crim. Law 199; 2 East P. C. 838; 2 Archb. C. P. & P. 1421.

2. An indictment lies in this state for cheating by means other than a false token, &c. See act of 1791—5 Stat. 177, and Gen. Stat. 719. 5 Strob. 159; 1 Bay 353; Dud. 275; 2 Mill 138.

3. An indictment lies to do an act which is not indictable. A conspiracy is a confederacy of two or more persons to accomplish some unlawful purpose, or a lawful purpose by unlawful means. 2 Bish. on Crim. Law, §§ 171, 175, and note, and 180; L. R. C. C. 274; 5 Har. & J. 317.

4. In an indictment for conspiracy to cheat, it is not necessary to allege or prove an actual deception, but only that the means used were calculated to deceive.

Although the defendant was not deceived, he was not the state, and the state was actually defrauded. 2 Arch. C. P. & P. *[618], note; 5 Har. & J. 317; 2 Bish. on Crim. Law, § 175, note.

5. The indictment is drawn in conformity with the precedents of highest authority.

1 Chit. on Crim. Law, 1145, 1185; 2 Whart. Prec., ch. 11, p. 606; 2 Archb. C. P. & P. [618.] The indictment was drawn in accordance with the advice of Wharton. 2 Whart. on Am. Crim. Law, § 2297, (a); Whart. Prec. (1st ed.) 339, 340. An indictment merely averring that "defendants conspired by divers false pretences and indirect means to cheat and defraud" is sufficient. It is not necessary to insert overt acts—the conspiring is the offence, and the overt acts are merely matter of evidence to prove the charge. 1 Leach 274; 2 B. & Ad. 204, the leading case; 7 Ad. & El. (N. S.) 721; 9 Id. 824. For the history and discussion of the decisions, English and American, see 2 Archb. C. P. & P. [616], and notes; 3 Whart. on Am. Crim. Law, §§ 2299–2305, 2335; 2 Bish. on Crim. Law, ch. XI., § 199–201; 4 Wend. 232; 5 Har. & J. 317; Whart. Prec. of Ind. 33. The only cases of conspiracy in the South Carolina reports are 2 Hill 282; 4 Strob. 266; 8 Rich. 72; 7 S. C. 283.

The judge did not err in refusing defendant's second request to charge. 3 Whart. on Am. Crim. Law, § 2339; 2 Bish. on Crim. Law, § 188.

Motion for New Trial.—1. The evidence of the declarations of Gleaves and Jones was not admitted until after proof of the conspiracy. There is no rule which requires the conspiracy to be first proved by evidence other than that of an accomplice. 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 111.

2. The diary of Woodruff was used only to refresh his own memory, and it mattered not that it was in language or characters which the court or jury could not read. 1 Greenl. on Ev. 437.

3. Entries in the Republican printing company's books were independent facts, which corroborated the evidence of Lee and Woodruff, that the conspiracy was to be carried out by exchanging the Frankfort certificate with Cardoza for certificates of indebtedness of the Republican printing company, and evidence of *them was therefore admissible. 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 120; 2 Whart. on Ev. 1206.

4. The report of Woodruff's evidence is inaccurate. The judge submitted it to the jury to say whether the initials and other circumstances showed that this entry related to the conspiracy.

5. The statement made up by the business manager from the books of the company was a fact in corroboration, and admissible. Besides, no objection was made to the production of the paper.

6. The Christopher and other certificates were properly admitted in contradiction of the defence attempted to be set up upon the subject of the Merriam certificate. 1 Whart. on Crim. Law, § 649; 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 53; 1 Whart. on Am. Crim. Law, § 631; 2 Tread. 776; 1 Bail. 300; 3 Whart. on Am. Crim. Law, § 2358. And it was not objected to.

7, 8, 9, 10 and 11 are sufficiently answered by the rulings of the judge. We submit that the rulings of the judge upon all material points were correct.

13. The judge charged this instruction as asked.

The instructions prayed all relate to the testimony of accomplices and its corroboration. Upon this subject see 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 379, et seq; 1 Archb. C. P. & P. 154; 3 Strob. 517; Id. note; Joy on Ev. Accom. 98, cited 1 Greenl., § 381, note; 2 Russ. on Cr. 330; 3 Strob. 519–21, 526.

November 29th, 1878. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. It has been so often held that this court cannot set aside the verdict of a jury in a case in the nature of an action at law or in a criminal case, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence, or unsupported by it, that it is not necessary to consider that portion of the appeal that makes such a demand, farther than to say that it is not competent for this court to say, on appeal in such a case, that a discrepancy between the evidence and the verdict based upon it, is so great as to warrant the inference that the jury were influenced by improper consideration. The proper place to examine questions of that nature is at the Circuit, and the decision of the Circuit Court, *so long as no error of law is committed by it, is final and conclusive.

The first point to be considered relates to the regularity of the drawing and impaneling of the petit jury. Section two of the act of June 8th, 1877, (16 Stat. 259), provides that "when, by reason of challenge or otherwise, there is a deficiency in the number of grand or petit jurors duly drawn and summoned at any term of the court in any county of the state, the judge of the Circuit Court shall order the board of jury commissioners, or a majority thereof, forthwith to attend in court and to draw, in the presence and under the direction of the court, such number of jurors as the court shall deem necessary to fill such deficiency; the jurors so drawn to reside within five miles of the court-house." It is conceded that such a case of deficiency arose in the present case, and that a majority of the jury commissioners, under the direction and in the presence of the court, drew from among the names of such persons as the law contemplated for that purpose, the number required to supply such deficiency. It is not alleged that the names from which such drawing was made included any that did not properly belong there, or excluded any that should have been subjected to such drawing.

The objection is that the names drawn were contained in a compartment of the box separate from that which contained the names of the jurors from the county at large, and that such names were not selected and placed in such compartment by the authority of law. It must be assumed, though not distinctly stated, that the selection of the names from those of the jurors at large was made by the jury commissioners, and such names placed by them in the compartment of the box from which the drawing was made, inasmuch as to allow that selection and interference with the jury box by an unauthorized person, would be a breach of official duty on the part of the jury commissioners that cannot be presumed. It is not stated when the names of such jurors were placed in the partition from which the drawing was made, the only statement of irregularity being that it was done "long after a proper and legal list of jurors had been prepared for this county for the year 1877." We are at liberty to assume that such selection and transfer to the separate compartment was made *by the jury commissioners in the presence of the court for the purposes of such drawing. The proposition on which the appellant relies is, that there was no authority of law for the selection and removal of the names of the jurors residing within five miles of the court-house from the other names of jurors into a separate compartment of the box and making the drawing therefrom. It is contended that the only authority for such an act is that contained in the fourth section of the act of June 8th, 1877, which contains as follows: "When the jury lists are prepared by the jury commissioners for each year, they shall place in a separate apartment in the jury box the names of fifty persons, qualified by law to serve as jurors, who reside within five miles of the court-house, from which shall be drawn the jurors to supply the deficiencies provided for in the second section of this act." By this section the number to be so placed for the county of Richland is fixed at one hundred. It is also contended that as the jury lists in question were prepared prior to the passage of the act of June 8th, 1877, no opportunity ever existed for the exercise of the power conferred by section four. No question is made here as it regards the number of names placed in the separate compartment. It is not stated that such number was in excess of one hundred, the number provided for in section four, nor that it was less than that number. Had the whole number of names of persons liable to jury duty residing within five miles of the court-house exceeded one hundred, and had the jury commissioners, at the time of drawing, confined the drawing to a less number than that of the whole number of persons having the qualifications indicated by the statute, a question might have been presented here, whether such a rejection from the drawing of the names in excess of one hundred could be made at any other time or in any other manner than that pointed out by the law. But as it neither appears that names of jurors residing within five miles of the court-house were excluded, nor the number of one hundred exceeded, no such question arises for consideration.

We cannot assent to the proposition that the action of the jury commissioners had no other sanction than that of section four of the act mentioned. Assuming that the jury commissioners, when called upon to draw from the persons residing within five miles *of the court-house the names of a certain number to supply deficiencies, found that no such discrimination among the names in the box had been made, as it was essential to the discharge of the duty imperatively imposed upon them by section two of the act, that such a discrimination should be made, they had clear implied authority to make it. Whether they selected in the first instance from the whole number of the names in the box those subject to the drawing to supply deficiencies, and from among such made the drawing, or drew from the box at large, rejecting such as were not subject to such drawing as their names were drawn, is entirely immaterial. The difference between the two modes of procedure is formal and not substantial, and, as in case of a drawing at such time and place, form is not made material by the statute, we can only look to the substance of the act. State v. Jennings, 15 Rich. 42, for this reason, does not apply to the case in hand. It is matter of indifference whether a previous opportunity for making such selection had been afforded by the law and neglected, or had not been afforded, the duty of selection was equally inoperative. The jury commissioners were not performing an act for their own benefit, permitted to them on conditions, but an act essential to the administration of justice, and every intendment must be made in favor of the sufficiency of their authority.

There was not, in any legal sense, an irregularity, as affecting the legal results of the drawing, and therefore it is not necessary to examine the authorities cited by the appellant bearing on the question of what irregularities in the drawing and impaneling of juries are fatal. The exception to the drawing and impaneling of the jury was not well taken.

The next exception to be considered affirms that, upon the trial, the court denied the accused the right of peremptory challenge as allowed by law. The defendant was entitled to five peremptory challenges. Gen. Stat. 747, § 3. He claimed the right to challenge four of the persons drawn and returned as petit jurors. His challenge was allowed as to two of the jurors and disallowed as to the other two. The consequence was that the jury by whom he was tried included two to whom he had peremptorily objected, notwithstanding the whole number of chal*lenges allowed by law had not been exhausted at the time of the attempted challenge.

The ground on which such exclusion is defended is that the two persons who were permitted to sit as jurors, notwithstanding such peremptory challenge, had been drawn from the supernumerary list to supply the places of two others who belonged to jury No. 1 who had been excluded by challenges. This virtually confines the right of challenge in criminal cases so as to affect only the persons placed in one of the juries organized for the trial of civil causes. It assumes that other persons drawn and impaneled are not to be excluded, whatever objection may exist in the mind of the accused, to their occupying that relation to him.

It is too clear to admit of doubt that the right of the accused to challenge any five of the persons drawn and returned as jurors could not be affected by the peculiar constitution of the regular juries and the supernumerary list for the trial of civil causes. In the first place, there must be a new jury impaneled in each criminal case. Gen. Stat. 747, § 8. The direct and intended effect of this section is to make the selection of jurors in criminal cases depend wholly on the results of a drawing in open court, in the presence of the accused, from the whole number of persons serving as jurors. The occasions of its adoption were that a different rule prevailed in civil causes. In the last-named case parties were required to take a standing panel, deficiencies arising to be supplied from the list of supernumeraries.

Accordingly in presenting to the accused in the present case jury No. 1, only competent for the trial of civil causes, for his peremptory challenges, it was assumed that the jury thus constituted was competent to try the case. Such was not the fact independently of the assent thereto of the accused. It is true that the appeal does not present to us any objection to the mode in which the jury was impaneled other than that of the disallowance of the challenges, and therefore we are not called upon to say that there was error in constituting the jury otherwise than by a new drawing; but upon the question of the right of peremptory challenge, this consideration cannot be decisive. It may well be that the accused was content to waive a new draw*ing, but he has evinced no intention to waive the right of peremptory challenge and its proper incidents. The right of peremptory challenge is not a formal right merely, but substantial and vital to the proper administration of criminal justice. The fact that the accused was willing to waive any advantages that might arise from an impartial drawing in his presence is no ground to assume that he intended to waive objection to the sitting of persons whom he considered unfit, for reasons satisfactory to himself, to sit as jurors in a matter affecting him. The state could not well insist that one concession should embrace the other, because they were not necessarily connected or dependent on each other.

If the state and the accused should agree together that the jury should be impaneled in alphabetical order, or in any other way that might mutually suit them, while it is not for the court to deny them that right, still we cannot travel beyond the terms of their concession and make out a new law for the case, composed in part of rules governing civil procedure and in part of the rules applicable to criminal proceedings.

On the contrary, the right of challenge being a distinct and substantive one, must be deemed unaffected by such concession, and must be administered in the mode prescribed by the law applicable to the case. Charleston v. Kleinback, 2 Speers 418. The method of drawing jurors in civil cases is stated and distinguished from the mode of drawing in criminal cases in this case. It was material that such distinction should be pointed out, as it was a qui tam action and had to be referred to either the one class or the other. It was held to appertain to the class of civil causes.

The principal question in the case appears to have been whether the plaintiff could challenge peremptorily unless that right was fully exercised before the defendant was called upon to make his peremptory challenges. It was held that where in civil causes it was necessary to have recourse to supernumeraries they were considered as talesmen, and that if either party desired to exercise the right of challenge there should be a new drawing among such persons. This undoubtedly implies that the right of peremptory challenge might be exercised against persons on the *supernumerary list. The object of redrawing was to prevent the party intending to challenge peremptorily from virtually selecting a jury by means of his challenges, as he might to some extent do if the supernumeraries were called in their order on the list, that order being known to the party intending to challenge. Whatever may be considered the ruling of this case, it is in terms confined in its application to civil causes.

Durant v. Ashmore, 2 Rich. 184. In this case O'Neall, J., says: "After jurors have been challenged and others have been drawn in their places, neither party can, under the act of the legislature, challenge the jurors so drawn." State v. Kleinback, 2 Speers 418. It is to be presumed from the error in this citation that it was made from general recollection.

The report of the case of Charleston v. Kleinback, which it is presumed is the case to which reference was here intended, does not appear to go to the extent or even in the direction claimed for it. However this may be, both were civil causes, and the rule laid down must be confined to such causes. Although the distinction is not clearly drawn in Durant v. Ashmore, independently of the nature of the case itself, yet what is there said is so said on the authority of Charleston v. Kleinback, and the latter case pointedly enforces such distinction. It is not necessary to consider the rule stated in Durant v. Ashmore in its application to civil causes, but clearly it has no application to criminal causes. Whatever may have been the proper construction of the act of 1841, (11 Stat. 154,) that act is inapplicable to criminal cases at the present time, the right of peremptory challenge being governed at the present time by the General Statutes, § 3, p. 747. By the terms of the present law no limitation, except as to number, is imposed upon challenges in criminal cases.

As it regards the crimes of murder, manslaughter, burglary, arson, rape and grand larceny, reference is made to pre-existing laws in the following words: "In the manner prescribed by law;" but these words are not used in the subsequent part of the section that relates to the right of peremptory challenge in all other criminal cases.

It must be concluded, therefore, that the right as conferred by the General Statutes in cases other than those specifically enumer*ated above, was intended to be complete as thus quoted without dependence on any preceding statute of limitation, and to be interpreted only in the light of the rules of law applicable to the subject. It must be concluded that the challenges were improperly refused.

The appellant alleges that the indictment is defective, "in that the statement of the offence charged does not contain an averment of a conspiracy to cheat by means of false tokens or a counterfeit letter in another man's name."

This is connected with the next objection, to the effect "that the averment of the purpose and object of the conspiracy charged does not import a crime under the laws of this state." If the latter proposition is unfounded, the first stated is immaterial. The precise question, then, is whether a charge of conspiracy against a public officer and others conspiring with him, with intent to cheat and defraud the state, as it regards matters appertaining to the duties of such public officer, imports a crime by the laws of this state independent of an averment of the employment for that purpose of a "false token or a counterfeit letter in another man's name." This is a much narrower question than that discussed at bar, but includes all that need be considered in the present connection. In considering what may or may not be regarded as an indictable conspiracy, the question must be asked whether the object of the conspiracy was to injure the public or private individual. If it was to injure the public, then the public has a direct interest, either residing in the community at large or in the state as a corporate body; if to injure an individual, then the public has an indirect interest only, as concerned in the maintenance of order, the administration of justice, and the like. As an indictment is, in its nature, one of the modes of redressing public wrongs, it is material to inquire whether the wrong alleged in its direct and primary intent tended to the public injury, or became such only through the intervention of statutes and rules of law, defining what private injuries should be regarded as detrimental to the public.

A conspiracy to injure or defraud the public is indictable as such, independent of the special character of the means employed for that purpose.

*This will be found abundantly supported by the authorities. The authorities are uniform that a conspiracy to injure or defraud the public is indictable at common law. Johnston, J., in State v. De Witt, 2 Hill 282 [27 Am. Dec. 371], correctly says: "All agree that a combination to do a public mischief is indictable." He instances the cases of injuries to health, vending unwholesome food, manufacturing base articles for public sale, imitating good ones, and to defraud the revenue.

All the counts of the indictment charge a conspiracy of the defendant, as state treasurer, with divers persons, to cheat and defraud the state out of a large sum of money. If, therefore, the charge is sufficiently full and clear, there can be no doubt but that it sets forth an indictable offence. It is contended, however, that, independently of a statement that such conspiracy to defraud was intended to be carried out by the use of a "false token or counterfeit letter in another man's name," the facts charged do not constitute a crime. This argument ignores the important distinction between acts tending directly to the public injury and acts primarily affecting individuals, made criminal only as they affect the administration of justice, or as they are to be accomplished by means of false tokens and pretences. The causes illustrating this distinction are numerous. State v. De Witt, 2 Hill 282 [27 Am. Dec. 371], and State v. Shooter, 8 Rich. 72, are cases of this class. In the first-named case the act in question was the destruction of a deed, while the latter case was one of the attempt to fabricate evidence by procuring a deed through false pretences. In both the injury intended primarily affected individuals alone, but became indictable through the fact that the creature of false testimony and the destruction of true testimony, tended to injure and impair the administration of justice.

In Lambert v. People, 9 Cow. 578, Senator Spencer, who delivered the leading opinion, holds that an indictment will not lie for a conspiracy to produce a private injury, "which is not a crime in itself, and does not affect the public or obstruct further justice." If the question is as to the character of the conspiracy, as judged by the nature of its object, this statement is free from objection. The mere fact of intending to cheat or defraud an individual is not, in itself, criminal, whether on the part of one *or many. When it becomes criminal it is through the means intended to produce such effect. A false token and counterfeit letter are means of that character. A false token and counterfeit letter are things that may affect others than the immediate object of the cheat; they may be capable, to some extent, of maintaining a credit with the public. A forged note or bill, receipt or letter, attired so that it may become detrimental to the community at large, is a clearly recognized injury to the public. It is not distinguishable from the case of spurious goods offered for public sale, in principle. State v. Rickey, 9 N. J. 293. This subject is fully discussed and the authorities reviewed at large in this case. It is conceded that when the injury is against the public the conspiracy is indictable; but that when the injury is intended to an individual only, it is not indictable, unless the means employed are criminal.

The objection of appellant, that the certificate referred to in the indictment is not in law "a false token or a counterfeit letter in another man's name," is disposed of by what has already been said.

It is alleged that the indictment is defective, for the reason that the acts charged against the defendant are repugnant and contradictory. This is connected with the further statement that the defendant is charged with having conspired to cheat the state by means which were not calculated to deceive, and not such as could deceive the defendant, as the officer of the state charged with the performance of the act necessary to the consummation of the offence.

The first, second and third counts of the indictment allege the means by which it was intended that the state should be defrauded, namely, by a forged pay-certificate, representing that a fictitious person was entitled to payment on account of an appropriation to pay legislative expenses, attested by the officers of the legislative bodies authorized by law to attest demands of that nature. If there had been such person as C. L. Frankfort, and the state had been indebted in the manner stated in that certificate, then it would have been the duty of the defendant, as state treasurer, to have paid such certificate in such manner as might be provided by law. On such payment being made, in the due *course of his duty at that time, such certificate would have been retained in the treasury as a voucher for such payment, and on its production it would have appeared that such payment had been properly made.

The substance of the appellant's objection is, that a false voucher by a disbursing officer, in order to cover the unlawful abstraction of funds in his hands, is not so to be regarded as a means of deception. Possibly it may be that it does not come up to the conception of a false token as essential for the foundation of a criminal charge in the case of an attempt to cheat a private person, when it was not intended, or of a nature to be so placed that the community at large might be affected by it as a means of obtaining credit; but as to this we are not called upon to decide. That such a means of covering a delinquency is not repugnant or contradictory to the idea of deception, is too clear to admit of argument. To manufacture a false voucher for the payment of money is of the very essence of deception.

The next objection to be considered is,

"that the indictment is fatally defective in that the offence charged is not set forth and stated with sufficient clearness and certainty; that the means by which it is alleged therein the offence was intended to be and was consummated, are not set out either in substance or according to the tenor thereof; that the warrant or pay-certificate described as the said means, is not set out with sufficient precision and certainty, and by such special and specific description as to numbers, date and other peculiar and distinguishing marks, as to identify the charge, and fully, fairly, substantially and formally to describe to the defendant the crime for which he is held to answer." It will be considered with reference to the fourth count whether a specification of the means intended for the consummation of the fraud alleged is essential to an indictment of this character. As it regards the first, second and third counts, the state has assumed to set out such means, and assuming such a statement to be necessary, it is clear that even the stringent rule claimed for the appellant has been complied with. The character of "the pay-certificate" is described as a warrant on the state treasurer for a sum certain on account of legislative expenses; the name of the fictitious person to be employed is stated; the persons to sign and *attest the certificate are stated. The crime was consummated when the parties to the transaction agreed together as to the purpose of defrauding the state, although the intended injury remained to be consummated. If the conspiracy had related to an instrument existing prior to the time of such conspiracy, there might be a propriety in pointing out the instrument intended by indubitable marks. Had this been the case, the identification afforded by the description in the indictment would still have to be regarded as complete. There would be no reason to assume that more than one such certificate as that described in the indictment existed rendering further specification necessary to identification. But as the conspiracy had for its object the production of such a certificate, all that could be averred with propriety was what the conspirators may have agreed concerning it. If numbers, names and marks subsequently put on the paper were not then in contemplation of the parties as material features of the certificate, they could not properly be alleged as comprehended in the direct objects and intents of the conspiracy. Looking at these three counts in the light of the charges in the indictment alone, this court cannot say that more nor less than is stated was comprehended in the terms and intention of the agreement of conspiracy.

The objection here is to the indictment and not to the character and sufficiency of the proof under it, and, looking at the indictment alone, we cannot affirm that anything is wanting that we have a right to assume as existing and forming part of the scheme of conspiracy. The crime charged is fairly, substantially and formally described, so that no possible doubt could exist in the mind of the defendant as to the nature of that for which he was held to answer. As it regards the fourth count, the objection assumes a different character.

This count charges that the persons indicted, on a certain day unlawfully, falsely, fraudulently and corruptly did conspire, combine, confederate and agree together, by divers false pretences and indirect means, to cheat and defraud the State of South Carolina of a large sum of money, to wit, "the sum of four thousand dollars, to the great damage," &c.

This count affirms two things. First. An unlawful conspiracy *to defraud the state out of a certain sum of money. Second. That the means of accomplishing it was to be by false pretences and indirect means.

Now, assuming that this was all that was agreed upon among the conspirators, an assumption that we are bound to make for the purpose of considering this count, did such act amount to an indictable offence?

That such an act of conspiracy is indictable, the authorities afford abundant means of establishing; but there are not wanting sufficient reasons why the common law, that seeks to afford a public remedy for every public wrong, should furnish the means of punishing such a conspiracy. To illustrate the principle involved, suppose that a conspiracy had been formed to rob on the highways, but no person had been designated as the special subject of such robbery, and no definite place or means of overpowering the victims of the plot formed part of the agreement of conspiracy. Money and arms are collected to carry out the conspiracy, the band is divided, distributed and posted, some for purposes of direct attack, others to watch against surprise, and others to reinforce a weak party. No action has yet appeared to put in exercise the formidable combination of force and skill. At this stage of the operation the parties are arrested and charged with a conspiracy to rob. Must the charge fail because the terms of the conspiracy did not embrace circumstances of time, place and person, as it regarded the accomplishment of its purpose? If so, then it would not be possible, even after the plan had been carried out, to punish the conspiracy, for, in the first place, the crime was consummated, if at all, at the moment the agreement was made, and if conviction in any such case could not take place prior to the actual commission of the intended crime, it was because no crime had been committed, nor could the character of the conspiracy in that respect undergo any change after it was consummated by an unlawful agreement. In the second place, the moment the right to punish the conspiracy arose it would be destroyed by merger in the offence of higher grade flowing from it. It would be a just reproach to the common law if it afforded no means of dissipating combinations threatening the destruction of legal security, however formidable *they might be, because the objects were general and threatened the community indefinitely, and were not aimed at some particular member of the community, or to some other limited and defined sphere. On the contrary, as we have seen, one of the great objects of this jurisdiction is to protect the community at large; and the protection of the individual is subordinate to that end.

The principle just illustrated applies with equal force but under altered circumstances in the case under consideration. Here the protection demanded is for the public property of the state, and those who confessedly violate the law by conspiracy to obtain unlawful possession of such property ought not to be permitted to shield themselves by saying that the object of their conspiracy was to lay hold of any property of the state they could reach by any means, and not to appropriate any designated piece of property by predetermined means. Yet this is the position the defendant must assume in order to ask that the fourth count may be adjudged bad. The question must be brought to the test of the authorities which will now be considered.

King v. Ecles, 3 Doug. 336. This was an indictment for a conspiracy to impoverish "H. B." and to deprive and hinder him from following and exercising his aforesaid business of a tailor. It was moved in arrest that the charge was general. It was held that it was not necessary to state the means, as the end was well stated. It is clear that the court regarded the conspiracy as indictable in respect of its object alone, and therefore a statement of the means was not essential to the description of the offence. It is not necessary to examine the assumption on which the conclusion rested, as the conclusion itself is clear that it is not essential in order that a conspiracy should be indictable that the means should be predetermined. Rex v. Gill, 2 B. & Ald. 204. This case is to the same effect, and the remarks made in regard to King v. Ecles are applicable to it. King v. Turner, 13 East 123. Lord Ellenborough, in this case, says of King v. Ecles, that it "was considered as a conspiracy in restraint of trade, and so far as a conspiracy to do an unlawful act affecting the public." He distinguishes the case in hand as an indictment *for a conspiracy "to commit a civil trespass," and as such not criminal.

Considering King v. Ecles in the light of this case, it must be regarded as holding broadly that a conspiracy to do an injury to the public is indictable independent of any agreement as to the precise means by which it is to be carried out. Lambert v. People, 9 Cow. 578. The indictment here was for conspiracy to cheat a company. The statement of the means was general, as that the defendant agreed, by "indirect and unlawful means," to cheat and defraud such company. It was held that the indictment was bad, but solely on the ground that the act of wrong was against a private person, and in such case an allegation of a false token was indispensable. The reasons assigned for the judgment rest on the idea that a statement of the means is not essential when the act intended to be performed is a crime or an injury to the public. Commonwealth v. Prius, 9 Gray 127. The question in this case is identical in principle with Lambert v. People and received the same solution. State v. Rickey, 9 N. J. 293. The conspiracy in this case was to defraud a bank. It was held that the bank was to be regarded as a private person, and that the indictment did not charge a crime. The same concession is made in this case as in Lambert v. People, that a conspiracy to cheat the public is indictable as such without regard to the nature of the means intended for that purpose. State v. Mayberry, 48 Maine 218. The conspiracy was to obtain possession of securities by false pretences from private persons. It was held that such a conspiracy was not indictable independently of the means by which it was intended that it should be consummated. Rice, J., says: "When the act to be accomplished is itself criminal or unlawful, it is not necessary to set out in the indictment the means by which it is to be accomplished." This is a clear recognition of the rule in question although it does not allude to that feature of the rule that places attempts to defraud the public as within the class indictable in themselves. The case did not suggest so full a statement of the cases to which the rule applied, but holding it as principle it must be regarded as a clear authority, as it regards all the consequences resulting from the application of the rule.

*Commonwealth v. Shedd, 7 Cush. 514. Dewey, J., holds "that a general allegation that two or more persons conspired to effect an object criminal in itself, or to commit a misdemeanor, or a felony, is quite sufficient, although the indictment omits all charges of the particular means used."

It is clear on the authorities as in reason that charging a conspiracy to defraud the state, as it regards its property or revenue, is indictable as such, although no agreement as to the definite means to be employed for that purpose is alleged. The appellant's exceptions, based on the supposed insufficiency of the indictment, should be overruled. The appellant's exception, alleging that the Court of General Sessions, at which the indictment was found, was not duly and legally convened, because no petit jury was summoned or in attendance, is bad. To hold that would be equivalent to holding that if for any reason the venire for petit jurors or its return to the court fails, the court is without legal power to proceed with its business, a proposition so obviously unfounded that it does not need particular consideration.

The grounds of appeal urged for a new trial will next be considered. The first is that the court erred in admitting evidence of the declarations of R. H. Gleaves and A. O. Jones, as conspirators, not made in the presence of the defendant before evidence other than that of an accomplice had been introduced to connect A. O. Jones with the conspiracy, as charged in the indictment. Counsel for appellant has not pointed out in his argument one exception on which this ground of appeal rests, and none has been found resting on the precise ground advanced. Even on the assumption that corroborating evidence was necessary, and that evidence of acts done and declarations made by the conspirators in pursuance of the conspiracy, had been offered and duly objected to on the ground that the testimony corroborating the evidence of the defendant's accomplice had not been offered and it had been admitted, that would not constitute an error.

It would involve a question of the order of proofs under the control of the court. When proof of an independent fact is requisite to entitle a party to the introduction of certain evidence, the admission of such evidence, without demanding such proof, is erroneous. That is not a question of the order of proof merely, *but of the right to make the proof at all. The object of corroboration is to strengthen proofs already adduced, and not, primarily to introduce new and independent facts, and as the evidence offered by way of corroboration must go to the jury with the evidence of acts performed and declarations made by the conspirators in pursuance of the conspiracy, the order in which they were introduced cannot be so material to the defendant as to be ground for exception.

The next ground is that the court allowed the witness, Woodruff, "to refresh his memory by reference to a book purporting to be a diary, written in phonographic characters peculiar to the witness, and such as could not be verified by the court, and to admitting the said book in evidence as against this defendant, and allowing entries, said by the witness to be there contained, to be translated and read by the witness to the jury." The case shows that the book in question was referred to solely for the purpose of refreshing the recollection of the witness. The witness, it is true, read from the book, but that is not inconsistent with the use of the book for refreshing his memory; it was, at most, only anticipating what would probably have taken place under cross-examination at the defendant's request had it not been called for by the counsel for the state. Nothing is found warranting the conclusion that the court and jury regarded the book as resorted to for any purpose other than that of refreshing the memory of the witness. To hold the doctrine contended for by the defendant would be to give immunity to witnesses locking up the contents of their memory in entries contrived to be intelligible to themselves only, to which they could always refer for their own advantage, but to which the court would have no access, however important that might be to the ends of justice.

Such a proposition cannot be tolerated unless established by authority that cannot be shaken.

The counsel for appellant produces no case holding that in order to have resort to such memoranda for the purpose of refreshing the memory of a witness, it must appear that such memorandum is made in characters intelligible to the court and jury without the aid of testimony. It must be presumed that no such case can be found, for it would be inconsistent with the *principle of the rule allowing the memory to be refreshed by memoranda made at the time of the transaction to which the inquiry relates. The memorandum must be the act of the witness and contemporaneously with the event noted, otherwise it would not necessarily be associated with the state of mind that existed when the impression on the memory was made, but, independently of this, it is of no importance, so far as it regards its capability of refreshing the mind of the witness, whether it was written in characters intelligible to the whole community, or in such as were capable of being translated only by the party himself.

The witness could, doubtless, have given the key to the translation of the memorandum and showed how his method of phonography agreed with and differed from each of the systems commonly practiced, and counsel might have required such information on cross-examination. Had he done so the statement of the witness would have gone to the jury, so as to enable them to judge whether the entry was what the witness represented it to be. This is all defendant could properly ask. It is unnecessary to notice in this connection the discussion drawn from the rule of hearsay evidence and the rule governing the introduction of merchants' books as against third parties, as these rules have no application to the present case. It is contended the strength of testimony as refreshed is the clearness and certainty of the recollection of the facts recorded, after having examined the memorandum, and independently of the memorandum itself, and it was the right of the defendant to test this by cross-examination. The only way to get before the jury such legal considerations as should have weight in determining the force of the testimony, was through the charge of the court, which might have been directed to such considerations. This ground of appeal should be overruled.

The next objection to the verdict relates to the admission of entries made in the books of the Republican printing company. It was proved that Woodruff and Jones, two of the conspirators, constituted the Republican printing company. It appears that the books were the business records of Woodruff and Jones. It was claimed that these books contained memoranda of various *transactions that belonged to the acts done by the conspirators in furtherance of the conspiracy. Among other entries $800 was passed to the credit of Woodruff and the same amount to Jones on February 5th, 1874, the day on which the certificate in question was paid as claimed. It was also claimed that the amount thus paid to Jones and Woodruff corresponded with the amount to which they were entitled under the terms of the arrangement between the conspirators. It was clearly competent that such an entry in the books of Woodruff and Jones should go to the jury as evidence tending to strengthen the testimony connecting them with the conspiracy. The presumption was that the entry was made under their direction, and the way of disproving that presumption lay in one asserting the contrary. The admissibility of the evidence there did not depend on its competency as a declaration of a conspirator to affect his co-conspirator. It was enough to render the testimony competent that it was admissible for any legitimate purpose. This objection is not well taken.

The fourth objection on the motion for a new trial referred to the circumstance that the attention of Woodruff was called to an entry in the books already referred to, and inquiry made as to whether it related to the transactions in question, and which appears to have been negatively answered. The appellant's counsel moved to strike out the evidence, which was refused, but no exception appears to be noted. At all events the counsel for the state had the right to call the attention of the witness to any particular memorandum and inquire if it related to the transaction in question, and it was not competent to strike out what was said in reply thereto. It is no ground to strike out evidence that it fails to amount to proof of what was intended by the party introducing it. It does not appear that the memorandum was claimed or read as affording evidence of the matters noted, but was noticed for the purpose of attracting the attention of the witness to the matters referred to in it. This objection is groundless.

The fifth objection, relating to the admissibility of testimony, is based on a ruling of the court admitting in evidence an account from the books of Woodruff and Jones. Although the court placed its decision admitting such entry on the broad ground *that as a declaration of a co-conspirator, written by a party beyond the jurisdiction of the court, it was admissible, yet it does not appear that the question submitted involved any such question or consideration. The real question appears from the case to have been identical with the exceptions already disposed of, and the conclusion of the court appears to be correct, whatever view may be taken of the proposition submitted in deciding it.

There does not appear on the record any exception to sustain the appellant's sixth objection, as it regards the admission of evidence relating to the Christopher certificate, and therefore that matter cannot be considered.

The seventh objection relates to questions propounded to the defendant by way of cross-examination, alleging that irrelevant matter was gone into, and that cumulative matter material to the issue was offered in reply to the testimony elicited by such cross-examination.

The only exception that appears in the course of the cross-examination of the defendant is to certain evidence called for by the state, and to which the defendant's counsel made objection. The memorandum, as to the decision of the court, is as follows: "The court held the testimony competent, being rendered so by the introduction of the Merriam certificate."

The objection is not to any particular matter of evidence sought to be introduced, but as it is expressed, "to this line of questions." The counsel for the state had called the attention of the defendant, who was undergoing cross-examination, to a class of payments made in certificates for legislative expenses, among which was the certificate called the Merriam certificate. This Merriam certificate was first introduced to notice by the counsel for the defendant upon the cross-examination of the witness, Woodruff. The fact with regard to it, as testified to by Woodruff, was that it was drawn as part of a series of certificates to fictitious persons, intended as the means of drawing money from the treasurer for the personal benefit of different state officers, and that the Merriam certificate was for the share of the defendant, Cardoza. Woodruff, in response to the inquiries of the counsel for the defendant, testified that on the presentation of *this certificate of the defendant, he, the defendant, caused it to be torn in pieces. Subsequently, when the defendant was examined in chief by his counsel, this certificate was produced, marked "canceled," but not torn, as stated by Woodruff; such evidence being intended to destroy the credibility of the testimony of Woodruff, not confined, however, to the statement of the destruction of the certificate, which appears to have arisen as an incidental circumstance merely. On the cross-examination of the defendant the counsel for the state recurred to this subject, and endeavored to show that certificates of the same class with the Merriam certificate had in fact been paid by the defendant under circumstances that tended to charge him with guilty knowledge of the objects with which they were drawn. It must be fairly considered that the whole subject was opened by the counsel for the defendant by the introduction of the Merriam certificate. It would naturally be concluded, from the conduct of the defendant in the case of the certificate drawn for his own benefit, that he was a party to the frauds of which that formed a part, and thus Woodruff's testimony, as a whole, would be shaken by proof of such part obtained from that witness himself. It must be assumed that this formed part of the object of the counsel for defendant in opening that subject. Such being the case the question of relevancy cannot be considered on the part of the defendant's counsel, who first opened it. The only inquiry is, whether the evidence elicited followed in the line of that introduced by the counsel for the defendant, so that the whole can be considered as a single subject, and it appears very clear that it did. In fact the defendant's counsel limited his objection to the line of proofs, thus drawing attention away from the particular matters involved to the general bearing and tendency of the questions. After having entered upon that line of proof he was not in a position to object to its continuance in the same direction by the opposite side, so long as a new subject was not entered upon. This involves a very different proposition from the one familiarly understood, that the introduction of irrelevant testimony by one party does not justify the introduction of irrelevant testimony by the other side. It is enough to say that the counsel for the defendant introduced the subject, and he has no right *to complain of its continued consideration. This view disposes of all the matters embraced in the seventh objection to the verdict.

The eighth objection is to testimony given by Solomon and Woodruff in reply. No exception appears to any part of this testimony, so far as it regards that of Woodruff. The only exception that appears to the testimony of Solomon was to his stating a conversation with Governor Moses, but it does not appear that any such conversation as the objection contemplated was actually produced in evidence. The exception must be regarded as limited by the character of the testimony received under it. The other matters alleged to have been gone into, stated by the defendant as prejudicial to his case, cannot be considered for the want of an exception to cover them. What has just been said disposes of the matter of the ninth, tenth and eleventh objections.

The remaining objections relate to the charge of the court. Many objections to the charge are stated in the grounds of appeal, some of which are not noticed in the points and argument, and as all matters intended for consideration are required by the rules of this court to be noticed in the points submitted, we must assume that the matters not so presented are intentionally abandoned by the appellant and they will not be considered. The various points made by the appellant will be considered in the order stated in the points and argument.

The sixth objection is that the court instructed the jury that the fourth count of the indictment could be sustained. This ruling is in accord with what has already been said.

The seventh objection states that the court instructed the jury that the entries in the books of the Republican printing company were made before the conspiracy had been consummated, and contemporaneously with the transactions, and were entitled to be considered in the corroboration of the accomplices. This statement does not exactly conform to the statements of the record. A request to charge was made on this point by which it was sought to exclude the entries in the diary of Woodruff and the books of the Republican printing company from operating as corroborating evidence.

The record states that this had been charged in part and in *part had not, but as the charge, as given, is not set forth, we cannot infer what that charge was, unless such is the necessary inference from what follows on the record.

The court said: "This evidence has already been admitted by the court for this reason, that when these entries were made in the note-book of Josephus Woodruff the conspiracy had not been consummated, and, therefore, that they were declarations of Woodruff and Jones in furtherance of the conspiracy." This statement appears to relate wholly to the note-book of Woodruff, with which it does not appear that Jones had anything to do, and yet the statement follows, "and therefore that they are the declarations of Woodruff and Jones in furtherance of the conspiracy."

There is evidently something omitted from this statement that it is probable might be supplied if the whole charge was produced. Subsequently the court states: "But these entries were made contemporaneously with the transactions, and they are not unsupported corroboration, but are facts noted down at the time of the transaction, and, therefore, may go in corroboration of the accomplices." It is very evident that corroboration was here meant in its general sense as something tending to produce conviction of the truth of previous testimony. There was no technical question before the jury as to whether corroborating evidence existed in the case sufficient to warrant the jury in finding according to their conviction, as to the truth or falsehood of the oral testimony given. They must have understood the court as charging that as it regards the degree of credibility to be ascribed to the testimony of the parties where memoranda were produced, it was in support of their credit that they made such memoranda contemporaneously with the transactions to which the testimony related.

There was other corroborating testimony than that afforded by these memoranda; such, for instance, as the undisputed fact that the defendant paid the certificate drawn to a fictitious person, without inquiry as to the truth of the endorsements thereon. No question could arise as to whether the state was at fault for want of evidence to corroborate the testimony of co-conspirators. Whether necessary or unnecessary, such corroboration had been *submitted, and its force alone was to be determined by the jury. Nor did the actual issue before the jury depend on acts and declarations of co-conspirators done and made in pursuance of the conspiracy. Such acts and declarations are of importance where the terms of the conspiracy have to be made out presumptively from the nature of the transactions following such conspiracy, and where the fact of such conspiracy is established. In the present case the terms of the conspiracy were the subject of direct proof, and the only real issue was the credibility of the co-conspirators. So the question was really narrowed down to that of the credibility of the witnesses, Woodruff, Jones and Lee; and, as bearing on the credibility of the parties who made or authorized the memoranda, the entries were proper to be considered by the jury, so that if made when and for the purpose they imported, they should be considered as circumstances giving support to such oral testimony.

This objection is not well taken. State v. Brown, 3 Strob. 508.

The eighth objection, as to the necessity of proof of a false token, has already been disposed of.

The ninth objection relates to the ninth request to charge, which was refused. This instruction was properly refused, as it involved the charge of the judge as to matters of fact.

The tenth objection is based on the refusal of the judge to charge that the payment of the check in the ordinary course of business in the office of the state treasurer, was not to be considered as confirmation of the evidences of the accomplices in the case. It cannot be considered that payment of a certificate or draft by the state treasurer, without any attempt to verify the identity of the person claiming to be entitled to payment, is in the due and ordinary course of business. It was clearly an act for which the defendant must be presumed responsible, and it was competent for the jury to weigh the circumstances as bearing on the question of guilty knowledge on the part of the defendant as to the character of such paper. This would lead to the conclusion that a charge excluding the jury from such examination, such as was requested by defendant, would not have been proper.

*The matter of the eleventh objection has already been considered, and the conclusion reached that the means employed were of a nature to cheat and defraud the state.

There was no error in the charge made upon the twelfth request. The whole matter was left for the consideration of the jury with remarks on the part of the court that have already been explained. It is not possible that the jury could have drawn any conclusion from these remarks prejudicial to the defendant. The court stated its former ruling in regard to the Merriam certificate, and its adherence to the ground on which that decision was made, but gave no instruction as to the legal effect of such testimony. It would have been manifestly improper to charge that such evidence was entitled to no weight, as it might have a bearing on questions of credibility as affecting the testimony of the witness, Woodruff, and defendant.

The majority of the court having overruled all the exceptions, the appeal must be dismissed.

We concur in the judgment herein announced, but cannot concur in the reasonings on the question of peremptory challenge, on which point we have filed our separate opinions, differing between ourselves in the reasons but agreeing in the results.

HENRY McIVER, A. J.
A. C. HASKELL, A. J.

Separate Opinion by McIVER, A. J. I concur fully in the conclusions reached by the Chief Justice except that in reference to peremptory challenges of jurors claimed by the defendant and disallowed by the Circuit judge. As to that matter I am entirely satisfied that the ruling of the Circuit judge, in refusing to allow the defendant to challenge peremptorily the two jurors, Wiley and Fields, was correct, whatever differences of opinion may exist as to the reason given for such ruling.

In my judgment the act of 1871—re-enacted in General Statutes, Chapter CXI.—was designed to effect, and did effect, a radical change in the mode previously established of organizing a jury for the trial of a misdemeanor. The purpose was to establish marked differences in the mode of obtaining a jury for *the trial of any criminal case, whether capital or not, from that prescribed for civil cases.

In Section 19 of that chapter, (being Section 16 of the original act,) the mode of obtaining juries for the trial of civil cases is distinctly pointed out, and the distinguishing features of this mode are:

1. That the persons summoned as jurors shall be arranged in alphabetical order, the first twelve constituting the first jury and the next twelve the second jury.

2. That this arrangement shall be made "on the day when the jurors are summoned to attend;" that is, the first day of the term.

The effect of this mode of organizing the juries is that it is distinctly known from the beginning of the term who are the persons that will compose the two juries for the trial of civil causes during the whole of that term. But in Section 22 of that chapter, (being Section 19 of the original act,) it is declared that "nothing contained in the preceding section shall apply to the impaneling of juries in criminal cases, but the jurors shall be called, sworn and impaneled anew for the trial of each case, according to the established practice," &c. This, to my mind, evinces an intention that the juries for the trial of all criminal cases shall not be organized in the mode prescribed for civil causes; that is, shall not be arranged in alphabetical order, and shall not be organized on the first day of the term, but that they shall be organized "anew for the trial of each case," according to the established practice, viz., by lot, and not in alphabetical order. So that for the trial of any criminal case, whether capital or otherwise, the law requires: 1. That the persons who are to compose the jury shall be selected by lot; and, 2. That they shall not be so selected on the first day of the term, but such selection must be made "anew for the trial of each case." These two requirements are not formal, but material in their character.

It certainly is not necessary to show this in regard to the first, and it seems to me that it is equally unnecessary to enter into any argument to prove that the second is material; for it manifestly is very material for the accused to know beforehand who are the persons to be presented to him for challenge, and the *order in which they will be presented; for that was one of the main reasons why the ninety-seventh rule of court was so rigorously assailed in the case of State v. Price, 10 Rich. 351, and in State v. Boatwright, 10 Rich. 407.

Section 22 of this chapter, (being Section 19 of the original act,) having thus declared that in criminal cases the selection of jurors should be made by lot, and should be made anew for the trial of each case, and not on the first day of the term, proceeds to declare how the lot shall be conducted, viz.: "According to established practice." This, it seems to me, is tantamount to declaring that the lot shall be conducted in the manner pointed out by the ninety-seventh rule of the former court, re-adopted by the present court in practically the same language as the twenty-sixth rule of practice in the Circuit Courts. For, prior to the adoption of the act of 1871, incorporated in the General Statutes, the "established practice" in obtaining a jury for the trial of criminal cases was different in misdemeanors from that in capital cases. In the former the juries were organized on the first day of the term by lot, and, as so organized, they constituted the juries for the trial of all cases of misdemeanor which might come up for trial during that term, subject only, just as in civil cases, to such changes as might be occasioned by challenges either peremptorily or for cause, while in capital cases the jury was organized anew for the trial of each case in the mode prescribed by the ninety-seventh rule of court.

To which practice, then, do the words "according to the established practice," as used in the section under consideration, refer? They cannot refer to the practice previously prevailing in cases of misdemeanor, because, according to my understanding of that practice, the juries were not organized anew for the trial of each case, but were organized on the first day of the term for the trial of all cases of misdemeanor which may be presented for trial during the term, and this mode of proceeding is distinctly forbidden by the previous part of the section.

These words, therefore, must necessarily refer to the practice in capital cases, as every one will admit that, under that practice, the jury was organized "anew for the trial of each case." This being so, it follows that the Circuit Court erred in the mode *which it adopted in presenting the jurors for acceptance or rejection, but as no exception was taken upon this ground, possibly for the reason that it operated in favor of the defendant, as it informed him beforehand who were the first twelve persons to be presented, such error can furnish no ground in this court for granting a new trial.

If, then, I am right in concluding that the proper mode of presenting the jurors in this case was not adopted, and that they should have been drawn anew and presented according to the established practice in capital cases, it follows necessarily that there was no error in refusing to allow the defendant to challenge peremptorily the two jurors above named. For, according to that practice, it was necessary for him to dispose of each juror as he was presented, either by accepting or rejecting him, before he could proceed to challenge any juror subsequently drawn; and if, as in this case, twelve jurors instead of one be presented at once, it would have been equally necessary for him to dispose of the twelve so presented, or of the ten which remained after the challenges on the part of the state had been allowed, before he could reach the two. Wiley and Fields, who were drawn subsequently to the drawing of the original twelve. If he had accepted the remaining ten and they had been sworn, as would have been proper under the established practice, then unquestionably he would have had the right to challenge peremptorily the two jurors above named as well as the three next who might have been drawn. But in this case, before he could, under the established practice, reach these two jurors, he had exhausted his right of peremptory challenge by challenging five of the original ten. His real ground of complaint, therefore, is, not that he was denied the right of challenge—for as the record shows he actually did exercise such right to the full extent allowed by law, by challenging five of the jurors who were originally drawn and presented—but that he was denied the right of selections, which, as is said in State v. Wise, 7 Rich., at page 416, upon the authority of United States v. Marchant, 12 Wheat. 480 [6 L. Ed. 700], is an altogether mistaken view of the right of challenge, which is a mere right of exclusion and not a right of selection, and the right *of exclusion will not be allowed to be exercised in such a way as to draw after it the right of selection.

The judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.††

Separate Opinion by HASKELL, A. J. I concur in the conclusions arrived at by the Chief Justice on each point submitted for consideration, except his conclusion upon that which relates to the exercise of the right of peremptory challenge. From that conclusion I am compelled to dissent, and will state my reasons briefly, first tracing an outline of the law and established practice on which those reasons depend. When the act of 1841, "to extend the right of challenge to jurors," was passed, the law on the subject of impanelment of jurors was as follows: "The jurymen attending, under the venire being called, their names are put in a hat and juries Nos. 1 and 2 are formed by alternately putting down the names as they are drawn, and when the number of each is completed it is usual for the clerk to have a list of the supernumerary jurors made out as their names are drawn for the ordinary business of the court, where vacancies are filled up under the order of the court and in capital cases." City Council of Charleston v. Kleinback, 2 Speers 418.

These juries, one and two, were organized and sworn at the commencement of the term and were ready for the trial of civil causes and misdemeanors, the only difference being that in misdemeanors the jurors were sworn anew in each case to try the traverse. In cases of felony the rule was different. The juries Nos. 1 and 2 were not presented in their entirety as ready for the trial of a capital case, but in such cases it was "the practice to present to the prisoner the jurors for challenge, beginning with the foreman of jury No. 1 and running through the petit and plea jurors Nos. 1 and 2 impaneled and sworn, and then to present successively the supernumeraries as drawn on Monday." State v. Brown, 3 Strob. 508. The act of 1841 made no change in the manner of organizing the juries. It enacted "that hereafter in all civil cases in which a jury shall be impaneled, before they shall be charged with the trial of any issue, each party shall have the right to challenge, without cause shown, two of the jury so *impaneled, and in all criminal cases in the Courts of General Sessions wherein challenge without cause is not allowed by law, the defendant shall have the right to challenge, without cause shown, two of the jury before they are sworn to try the traverse; and the places of the jurors so challenged shall be supplied as now provided by law for completing a panel." Stat. at Large, Vol. XI., p. 154.

The last clause providing for the completion of the panel of necessity applied to both the preceding portions, and embraced alike civil cases and misdemeanors.

In the first place, it would be impossible in a misdemeanor case to complete the panel by the mode pursued in a capital case, as appears without argument upon comparison of the two systems of practice. And, in the next place, there was, at the time the act was passed, a settled practice, applicable alike to civil cases and cases of misdemeanor, (this is not disputed,) which regulated the filling of vacancies in the jury occasioned by removal for cause shown, or by absence or otherwise. The circumstances are precisely analogous where a juror is removed by peremptory challenge, for another juror must be supplied to complete the panel; and there can be no doubt that the mode already of force in the case of a juror removed for cause, is the mode referred to in the act of 1841 by the words "as now provided by law." What was the practice as then provided by law? The ordinary practice was to fill the place by taking the name next in order on the supernumerary list, but it was held to be "entirely competent for the court to order any supernumerary juror in attendance to take the vacant place. This will be done in all instances where there is no objection made by one of the parties. Where there is any just reason to believe that a seat has been vacated by one juryman to enable a party to supply his place with another, or where such vacancy has been procured by one of the parties, it would be proper to require, and either party in such case might always require, the names of the jurymen referred to to be subjected to another drawing." Council v. Kleinback, supra. That was the practice prior to the act of 1841, and it is not questioned that the practice was the same in civil cases and misdemeanors up to that time, except that in misdemeanors the juries were *sworn anew to try the traverse. The latter rule of practice above indicated seems to have been deemed necessarily the proper course where, by the exercise of peremptory challenge, it was put in the power of parties to "procure" a vacancy, and the court proceeds to say: "It is necessary, as it respects challenges under the act of 1841, that a somewhat different practice should prevail, and that a more uniform rule should be laid down. Under that act the parties themselves are actors, and they should not be permitted to make their challenges with any view to looking to any particular juror on the supernumerary list as a substitute for the one that may have been withdrawn by challenge. In this respect the challenge should be made as though it were founded in some positive objection to one or two of the panel, and with no view of acquiring undue advantages by having certain others substituted in their place, which might frequently be the case were the list from which they were to make their selection to remain unchanged—that is to allow the jurymen to be called as their names had been previously set down. To obviate all objections of this kind, and to remove all temptation on the part of juries and parties from entering into a criminal understanding, we would lay down this as an uniform rule of practice, that whenever either party on the record claims the right of challenge the names of the jurors not impaneled, if they have been previously drawn and set down, shall be subjected to lot again, and the parties, unless they can show cause, must take them as they stand thus drawn." Id. The principle which is contained in the law as thus announced was afterwards extended to capital cases by the ninety-seventh rule of court, adopted in 1856, (10 Rich. Eq. 549,) and sustained in State v. Price, Rich. 351, and State v. Boatwright, Id. 407. In the case just cited (Council v. Kleinback) the court laid down what it understood to be the manner "as now provided by law for completing a panel," and applied that manner to fit the act of 1841, and thus established the practice which has never been changed, unless by the act of 1871, which will hereinafter be considered. The only subsequent case directly in point is that of Durant v. Ashmore, 2 Rich. 184, also a civil case. In that case "the plaintiff's counsel then challenged, under the act, the foreman, and he came off. The *counsel for the defendants challenged, on their part, another juryman, which made two vacancies. The names of the supernumerary jurors were put in a hat and two were drawn, when the plaintiff's counsel claimed the right to challenge one of them, when, an objection being made, his Honor overruled the right to challenge except for cause made." The ruling was by Butler, J., who had delivered the opinion of the court in City Council, &c., v. Kleinback. In the Court of Appeals, (opinion by O'Neall, J.,) it was held that "after jurors have been challenged and others have been drawn in their places, neither party can, under the act of the legislature, challenge the jurors so drawn." State v. Kleinback, 2 Speers 418; Durant v. Ashmore, 2 Rich. 184.

It is contended, first, that this case fixes the rule only as to civil cases; and, second, that the principles it sustains admit of question, because they are founded upon a misapprehension of what really was decided in City Council v. Kleinback. It is enough, on this point, to say that the probability is strongly against any such mistake as that which must be presumed to sustain such a proposition. The act of 1841 was recent, its constitutionality was in doubt, and was afterwards decided in Cregier v. Bunton, 2 Strob. 487, by a majority of the court, O'Neall, J., and three other members of the court dissenting. Thus it is apparent that the act had been subjected to jealous scrutiny from its inception. Further, the same eminent judge who had delivered the opinion in Council, &c., v. Kleinback, and had there undertaken to expound the whole jury system as it stood, and to apply thereto the act of 1841, was the judge who ruled on Circuit in the case of Durant v. Ashmore. All the probabilities are against the supposition that he was governed by any misapprehension as to what had been announced as law by him in Council v. Kleinback, and his ruling was affirmed by the Court of Appeals. Not only, therefore, are the principles sustained in Durant v. Ashmore, but the decision in that case was final upon the point, and has never been overruled. Butler, J., lays down the rule in the language above cited. "and the parties, unless they can show cause, must take them as they are thus drawn." There can be only two constructions to this sentence.

One is, that the *parties must submit to such mode of drawing unless they can show cause against it. The other is, that they must accept as jurors the parties thus drawn, unless they can "show cause" against them as jurors, such as legal disability, partiality or the like. The latter seems to me to be the construction fully sustained by the context, and to be the most reasonable.

The real question, therefore, is not about what is the rule established in Council v. Kleinback and Durant v. Ashmore, but whether that rule applies to the whole act of 1841, and therefore embraces misdemeanors, which are described in the act as "criminal cases in the Courts of General Sessions, wherein challenge without cause is not allowed by law." It has been already said and cannot be questioned, that when the act of 1841 was passed the law was exactly the same in civil cases and misdemeanors with regard to the formation of a jury and the manner of completing the panel in the event of a vacancy occurring. The only difference being, as already said, that in a misdemeanor, after the panel was completed, the jurors had to be sworn anew. The rule, as above stated, was the law in civil cases, not because it was so announced, but because it was made law by the act. The rule therein announced was the law for the completion of a panel as the law stood at the time the act was adopted, and by the act the same was made law for the completion of the panel when a vacancy occurred under the act. The same was the pre-existing law in misdemeanor cases; the same was the provision for vacancies occurring by reason of the act in misdemeanor cases, and the conclusion is unavoidable, that the rule, as laid down by the court, must be applied in a misdemeanor case exactly as it was applied by the court in a civil case. Besides, if the rule of challenge and completing the panel, in misdemeanor, is not the same as in civil cases, there can be no other rule than that which prevails in capital cases; and, as already shown, the application of the practice in capital cases to a jury organized to try a misdemeanor, was, as the law then stood, a practical impossibility. This is forcibly illustrated by examining the forms and details of practice contained in Miller's Compilation, pp. 140, 149, Nos. 24, 28, 59, &c. In case of misdemeanor: "Of jury No. 1, E. D. is excused from sitting. E. L. being a kinsman of defend*ant, is challenged for cause on the part of the state, and G. T. and T. L., supernumeraries, substituted. E. P. and M. J. are peremptorily challenged by the defendant, and A. R. and S. B. drawn from the supernumeraries in their room, the jury then consisting of," &c. Miller 149. The authority of the forms in Miller is unquestionable. Many of the rules of practice which had descended from hand to hand for many generations would have been lost during the years of revolution recently passed, had they not, by the unselfish industry of one of the best-versed and most accurate members of the former bench, been collected and perpetuated in this invaluable little volume of practice and forms. By comparison it will be seen that the ruling of the Circuit judge in the case before us, and the entire proceeding with regard to the jury, was mutatis mutandis, in exact conformity to the old practice under the act of 1841, and the law as it stood at that time. The question, therefore, to be considered is, whether the law, in such respect as affects the point in question, has been changed since 1841.

The act of 1871, p. 690, "An act to regulate the manner of drawing juries," repeals the jury act of 1868–9, "and all other acts and parts of acts in any way conflicting with the provisions of this act." This act is re-enacted in the revised statutes, and is of the same force and effect as when it was passed, notwithstanding the repeal of the pre-existing jury acts by the act which established the revised statutes. We must endeavor to ascertain to what extent the law, as it stood in 1841, after the passage of the act, is in conflict with the act of 1871. Rev. Stat., § 19, 522. It is patent that an important change is effected by the act of 1871, with regard to the formation of juries for civil causes, and that the right of peremptory challenge in misdemeanor cases is enlarged to two on the part of the state and five on the part of the defendant. But the question is whether the manner of forming a jury or of exercising the right of challenge is changed as to misdemeanor cases by the act of 1871. Section 19 of the act (Rev. Stat., § 22, 522,) is as follows: "Nothing contained in the preceding sections shall apply to the impaneling of juries in criminal cases, but the juries shall be called, sworn and impaneled anew for the trial of each case, according to the established *practice, and their foreman shall be appointed by the court or by the jury when they retire to consider their verdict." All the preceding sections relate to the drawing and summoning of jurors or to the formation of juries for the trial of civil causes. It is well to note that they contain no provision for the formation of juries for the trial of criminal cases, either misdemeanor or felony. It cannot be said that the provisions for the formation of juries for civil causes extend to misdemeanors, for the words are imperative: "Nothing contained in the preceding sections shall apply to the impaneling of juries in criminal cases." The succeeding sections relate to other subjects. We are, therefore, forced to conclude that juries for the trial of cases both of felony and misdemeanors must be formed out of the jurors summoned in the manner provided by law prior to the passage of the act of 1871, subject only to the change as to the right of peremptory challenge, (Section 37 of the act, and Rev. Stat. 748, § 3,) and to any change or modification that may be contained in Section 19, which is above cited in full. As regards that section it is argued that the words "called, sworn and impaneled anew for the trial of each case" limit the meaning of the words "according to the established practice" to cases of felony; because, as it is said, under the former practice the jury was not "called, sworn and impaneled anew" in each case of misdemeanor, but was so "called, sworn and impaneled anew" in each case of felony.

There are two answers to this. First. I admit that the nineteenth section embraces all criminal cases, for although the two classes are more properly designated by the terms "crime" and "misdemeanor," yet, in common language, both are described by the word "crimes," as in the act of 1841 that the word is used to express misdemeanors alone. It will not be disputed that there were, prior to the act of 1871, and subsequent, if not affected by that act, two distinct, established modes for the organization of juries—one for the jury in misdemeanor cases; the other for the jury in cases of felony. If it had been the intention to abolish one of these two modes, and subject both classes of cases to the other mode, it would have been easy to have expressed it definitely, as by saying, in this instance, "according to the estab*lished practice in capital cases." It is against all rule to construe by implication the repeal of an important law, if it can be reasonably avoided. If the words "called, sworn and impaneled anew" can be shown to apply in part to each class of cases, so as, when taken in the light of a general act, it makes provision for each, and such construction is not repugnant to the context, and will prevent the repeal of laws which are not expressly repealed, we are bound to adopt it and give to the law its full force and effect. To illustrate: No one will deny that, under the law as it was, in each misdemeanor case the jurors who had been previously generally sworn were sworn anew to try the traverse. Now, suppose that in a capital case the jury was only called and impaneled anew, and a general act was passed, as in the present case, not repealing distinctive acts relating to the two classes of cases, but containing words thus descriptive of each class. I contend that these words "called, sworn and impaneled" would be descriptive of the separate classes in their distinct character, and would not of necessity reduce them to one class, and thereby by implication repeal the distinguishing or conflicting statutes—one class being designated by the descriptive word "sworn," the other by the words "called" and "impaneled."

But secondly: I go much further, and think that under the then established practice the jury was "called, sworn and impaneled anew for the trial of each case" of misdemeanor, as well as each case of felony. Any one who is at all familiar with the practice is aware that the term "call" is entirely distinct from the "drawing" of jurors. In every case the jury is "called" by the clerk of the court to ascertain who of the jurors are present, and whether the jury is ready for the trial of the cause. The word has absolutely no other significance. The order of the court is familiar, "Mr. Clerk, call over the jury," and incident to every trial, and can properly only be done after the jurors have been drawn and the jury organized. Under the practice prior to the rule of court adopted in 1856, Rule 97, which is Rule 26, adopted in 1870, the following was, in a capital case, the form at the trial: "Clerk—Having a list of all the jurors in attendance arranged in order, ([State v. Sims] 2 Bail. 32,) to wit: First, jury No. 1; second, jury No. 2; third, supernumeraries, *as they were originally drawn, * * * and having called all over to ascertain which are in attendance, addresses the prisoner in the dock," &c. Miller, p. 155. That expresses the whole meaning and purpose of the "call" of the jury, even in a case of felony. This was not changed by the Rule 97 or Rule 26, for before the jurors' names could be put in the hat or box to be drawn it had to be ascertained who were in attendance, and the clerk had to go through the call of jury No. 1, jury No. 2, and the supernumerary list, which had to be previously organized under the law, for the rule of court could not dispense with the previous formation of the respective juries and the supernumerary list. The conclusion, therefore, is plain that the requirement that the jury should be "called" anew for the trial of each case, does not of necessity mean that a misdemeanor case shall be governed by the rules of practice regulating the formation of juries in cases of felony.

The second requirement, "sworn anew," does not demand argument. It is the recognized law that in every case of misdemeanor the jury has to be sworn to try the traverse before it can be charged with the case. It is equally well known that under the jury law then in force, (and still of force, if the views here expressed be correct,) the jurors had been previously sworn to organize juries No. 1 and No. 2, and, consequently, that by administering the second oath the jury is as well sworn anew in a misdemeanor case as in a capital case.

On the third point, that the jury shall be "impaneled anew for the trial of each case," there appears to be nothing inconsistent with the proposition that it is met by the practice in misdemeanor as well as in capital cases. The jury was originally formed by the selection of twelve men by the sheriff, their names were written on a schedule and the jury was then said to be "impaneled," and that of "twelve men" was to try the case. Therefore a jury, in the strict sense of the word, is said to be "impaneled" when it is ready to be charged with the case. 1 Whart. on Am. Crim. Law, § 590. The right of challenge subsequently arose and additional jurors had to be summoned to complete the panel, in the event that any members of the jury first impaneled and ready to try the cause should be removed by *challenge or otherwise. Thus the panel of a jury can be formed or "impaneled," and the panel can be broken and be re-formed or impaneled anew, according to the rules or requirements in every case. And again in a capital case, prior to Rule 97 or Rule 26 of 1870, if neither the state nor the prisoner challenged a juror —although the panel had not been broken, and the case would be tried by the entire panel as it was first organized—it was nevertheless considered to be "impaneled anew," because it had been organized anew by the ceremony of presenting the jurors to the prisoner and swearing each juror anew. There is no difference in principle between that case and the practice in misdemeanor, where the jury is presented in a body or as a whole, instead of one by one, and subjected to a challenge, and then, and not until then, sworn anew to try the traverse and ready to be charged. It may be admitted that this is so, yet that the case does not apply, because, under the rule of court, the jury No. 1 or No. 2 could not be accepted as a whole, for the names are put together and drawn by lot. The answer to that is, that the rule of court is not a part of the statutory law and is distinct therefrom. The rule could be repealed at any time, and then the proposition could not be disputed. It is certain that the legislature did not contemplate the rule of court as affecting a statute, and certainly it would be very extraordinary for the court to recognize it in any such light.

My conclusion, therefore, is, that the jury having been "impaneled" when jury No. 1 and jury No. 2 were organized, and being then presented for objection to the prisoner and to the state, and having to be re-sworn before it can be charged with the trial, it is, of necessity, impaneled anew for the trial of each case, whether it be felony or misdemeanor, independently of Section 19 of the act of 1871.

I am, for these reasons, unable to perceive any force in the argument that the eighteenth section of necessity brought misdemeanor cases within the rules applicable to the formation of juries in capital cases. Nor do I perceive any such effect from the thirty-seventh section of the act of 1871, re-enacted in Revised Statutes, p. 748. The only argument is that the number of challenges is increased and the right extended to the state, and *that the act of 1841 is repealed by the act of 1872. Rev. Stat. 830. The act of 1841 was not repealed by the act of 1871, according to my opinion, and the provision contained in the Revised Statutes 748 was the Section 37 of the act of 1871. The act of 1871 not having repealed the act of 1841, was governed by its provisions where not in conflict with its own, and the act of 1871 was not repealed by the act adopting the Revised Statutes, and is, therefore, still of full force and effect, and its construction must be principally governed by what was manifestly its meaning at the time when it was adopted. The right of challenge, as given in the act of 1871, was unquestionably to be governed by the provisions contained in the said act and by the law as it then stood, not repealed by or in conflict with said act. But apart from this, if all the acts with regard to jurors prior to the act of 1871 be repealed in form by the Revised Statutes act, they are all brought into force in criminal cases of both clauses by the words of Section 19, "according to established practice," and to that practice we must look for our rule, and in each case where there is no statute now of force be governed by the "established practice." I am, therefore, for the reasons thus briefly and too crudely stated, led to the unavoidable conclusion that there was no error in the ruling of the Circuit judge on the point submitted, and therefore that the appeal should be dismissed and motion refused.

But suppose that my construction as to the jury law is erroneous, and that the opinion which I understand to be entertained by the Chief Justice and the other Associate Justice on that subject is correct, viz.: That by the act of 1871, Section 19, the jury law is made the same in cases of misdemeanor as in cases of felony. Then, such being the premises, I fully concur in the conclusion deduced therefrom by the other Associate Justice, for, in my opinion, it rests upon principle. In the organization of a jury in a case of felony the principle which governs the exercise of peremptory challenge is, as I understand it, as follows: That the state and the prisoner must dispose of each juror in the order presented before the right of peremptory challenge can be exercised with respect to any other juror. Now, whether by law or by irregularity (no objection being taken at the time and the *irregularity not affecting any substantial right), several jurors be presented at once, or the whole twelve being presented at once, the same principle must govern, and the state and the accused must accept or object to and in effect dispose of the entire number thus presented, and those not objected to be sworn before either party can challenge peremptorily any other juror. In this case the whole twelve were presented together, and when the defendant attempted to challenge two supernumerary jurors who had been drawn to fill two vacancies occasioned by peremptory challenge on the part of the state, he, the defendant, had not accepted or objected to any of the remaining ten of the twelve originally presented, and, therefore, the twelve had not been disposed of, although presented. The defendant then proceeded to dispose of the remaining ten, and did not after disposing of them renew his objection to the first two drawn to fill the vacancies. The ruling of the judge was, therefore, right at the time when the objection was made, and whether he stated a wrong reason is immaterial; the defendant was bound to make his objection at the proper time. But the defendant could not renew his objection because he had exhausted his right of peremptory challenge by having challenged peremptorily five of the jurors originally presented. He, therefore, by his own action, waived his exception to the ruling and has no ground in either view on which to rest his appeal.

The irregularity in the presenting of the jurors, (for it certainly was irregular if the practice in capital cases was to govern,) so far from affecting a substantial right, was in favor of the defendant, for it was directly in face of Rule 97 adopted in 1856 and Rule 26 adopted by the court in 1870, and informed the defendant in advance of the order in which twelve jurors would be presented, and made the right of peremptory challenge an instrument for the selection of, instead of objection to, jurors which the rule of court was meant to prevent. So again the irregularity in the order in which the two supernumeraries were drawn, (if it was an irregularity,) did not affect a substantial right of the defendant, but was favorable to him, and as is indicated in State v. Brown, 3 Strob. 508, was really an advantage to the defendant, for he thereby knew in advance who would be the *first two presented to him after the ten who were then before him had been disposed of, and to that extent gave him the means of selection in addition to his right to object. This, of course, is said upon the presumption that the practice in capital cases is to govern, in which I cannot agree. But upon either of the legal premises submitted the appeal should be dismissed and the judgment of the Circuit Judge affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

Before Townsend, J., at Richland, October Term, 1877.

This was an indictment for bribery, committed by defendant, as a state senator, in December, 1872. True bill was found by the grand jury at October Term, 1877, of the Court of General Sessions for Richland county. The indictment contained five counts. The first count charged that the defendant did, on December 18th, 1872, "corruptly accept from Josephus Woodruff a gift and gratuity and a promise to make a gift and do an act beneficial to him," a state senator, "under an agreement and with an understanding that the vote, opinion and judgment" of defendant should be given in favor of a joint resolution appropriating money for public printing—"a question which was and might be by law brought before" said defendant, as a state senator. The second count varied from the first in the charge that the defendant did "corruptly accept from J. W. a promise to make a gift and to do an act beneficial to him, the said Robert Smalls, to wit, a promise to give him, the said R. S., a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of five thousand dollars, under an agreement," &c. The third count varied from the second only in the use of the words "with an understanding," instead of "under an agreement." The fourth count changed the phraseology to "corruptly did accept a promise from J. W., to make a gift of five thousand dollars to him, the said Robert Smalls, with an understanding," &c.; and the joint resolution was charged to have been "then introduced and pending in the general assembly of the said state, and was to be brought before him, the said R. S., in his official capacity," &c. The fifth count was for corruptly accepting a gratuity in payment for a vote already given, and is laid at common law. The first four counts are brought under act of 1869, Section 2. 14 Stat. 308; Gen. Stat.

*725, § 10. In the first four counts the joint resolution is set out only by its title, to wit: "Joint resolution to make appropriation for expenses of printing ordered by the general assembly during the regular sessions of 1870–1, and 1871–2." In December, 1872, Robert Smalls was senator from Beaufort county, and chairman of committee on printing. Josephus Woodruff was clerk of the senate, and a member of the Republican printing company, by whom the public printing was done.

The case being called for trial on November 7th, 1877, defendant submitted the following petition:

To the Honorable the Court of General Sessions for the County of Richland, in the said State:

The defendant in this cause, Robert Smalls, humbly petitioning, shows unto your honorable court that he has been indicted by the grand jury of this county, and is now held under bail to answer in this court to indictment for the alleged crime of receiving a bribe in his official capacity, to influence his acts in the office of state senator of South Carolina, on or about the eighteenth day of December, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and seventy-two, as is more fully set forth in the said indictment; that of all and each of said crimes and offenses set forth in said indictment, this defendant, upon his oath, solemnly declares he is not guilty, and is only desirous to have the trial thereof before an unprejudiced, fair and impartial court and jury that this defendant is a person of color, and was formerly a slave and was afterwards a captain and pilot in the service of the United States; that the offence charged in the said indictment, relating to his action as such state senator, has been the subject of much comment, both in private conversation among the citizens of the county and in several of the public newspapers published and largely circulated in the said county, from the residents of which the jury have been summoned for this trial; that by the laws of the United States of America, as well as the constitution and laws of the State of South Carolina, he is entitled by right to trial by a fair and impartial jury, who shall pass upon the offense charged between him and the state without bias or prejudice; that he is informed and believes that great prejudice *exists against him on account of his race, color and previous condition of servitude, so that he cannot have a fair and impartial trial in this honorable court, by reason of political excitement, and by reason of the prejudice excited against him by articles published in the newspapers; that at the general election held in this state, on the seventh day of November, eighteen hundred and seventy-six, this defendant was elected a representative of the fifth district of the State of South Carolina in the house of representatives of the United States, to hold his seat as such in the forty-fifth congress of the United States, and that he has been admitted to said seat by the said house of representatives of the said congress, but a contest for his said seat is being prosecuted, and now exists, by one George D. Tillman, who claims to have been elected representative of the United States from said district to said congress. And your petitioner verily believes that the said prosecution on the indictment above set forth is incited against him by a conspiracy to prevent him, by intimidation, from holding an office under the United States, and from discharging the duties thereof; and, by the same, to injure him in his property, and to molest, interrupt, hinder and impede him in the discharge of his official duties; and that said indictment is prosecuted with intention to deprive him of his rights, privileges and immunities secured by the constitution and laws of the United States, to which, as a citizen of the United States, he is entitled. And, further, your petitioner verily believes that by reason of the said contest for his said seat as a representative as aforesaid, there is an intense prejudice against this defendant in the minds of a large number of the residents of the said county, who differ in political associations with this defendant.

And your petitioner further shows that he verily believes that he cannot have a fair and impartial trial of the said cause before the Honorable C. P. Townsend, Circuit judge, now presiding in the said court; that he believes that the mind of the said judge is prejudiced against him by reason of his race, color and previous condition of servitude; that his belief is founded in the rulings and charge of the said judge, in a certain cause

race and color of this de*fendant, was tried on indictment for a conspiracy to cheat the State of South Carolina, at this term of the said court.

And your petitioner further shows that for the reasons above stated, and for other reasons more at large, to be shown in proper court, he is denied and cannot enforce in the judicial tribunals of the part of the state where the said prosecution is pending, the rights secured to him by the laws providing for the equal civil rights, as citizens of the United States, of all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States; that the said cause on indictment aforesaid against this defendant has not been tried or finally heard by this court.

Wherefore, the said defendant, Robert Smalls, files this petition in this honorable court, before the trial or final hearing of the cause, verified by his oath, and prays that the cause here pending be removed to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina for trial, and that all proceedings in this honorable court shall cease, and shall not be resumed unless he, the said Robert Smalls, shall be denied copies of said process against him, and all depositions, indictment, pleadings and other testimony in the case, so that he cannot file them in said court on the first day of the session of the said Circuit Court of the United States, or shall fail to prove the refusal or neglect of said clerk of this court so to furnish said copies, and a certificate of such refusal or neglect, under the seal of said court, shall be given and produced in this honorable court.

And your petitioner, Robert Smalls, doth verify the facts by him stated, by his solemn oath appended hereto, administered by a proper officer for administering oaths for said State of South Carolina. And as in duty bound, your petitioner will ever pray, and so forth.

Robert Smalls.

[Signed and verified.]

The motion was refused, and defendant excepted.

On November 9th the case was again called for trial, when defendant submitted the following affidavit and prayer for discharge:

*Robert Smalls, the defendant above named, being duly sworn, says—That on the seventh day of November, eighteen hundred and seventy-six, at a general election held in the State of South Carolina, he was elected a representative to hold a seat in the house of representatives of the United States in the forty-fifth congress, from the fifth congressional district of South Carolina; that on the fifteenth day of October, eighteen hundred and seventy-seven, he was admitted to a seat in the said congress and was sworn in as such officer; and but for the proceedings and prosecution in the above-entitled case, would now be in Washington attending to his duties as such officer; and he is of right entitled to all the privileges and immunities given to him by the constitution and laws of the United States as such officer; that shortly before the session of the forty-fifth congress of the United States, which assembled in the city of Washington, D. C., on the fifteenth day of October, eighteen hundred and seventy-seven, he was arrested on the charge of accepting a bribe, which, under the laws of the State of South Carolina, is a misdemeanor other than a breach of the peace; and on the eighth day of October, eighteen hundred and seventy-seven, was required to enter into a recognizance to appear at the present session of this honorable court; that at the present term of this court an indictment has been preferred against this defendant upon the said charge, and he has been compelled, from day to day, to appear before this court, and now is before this court, under its process, in violation of the constitution and laws of the United States, to answer the charge of the said misdemeanor; and by reason of the said proceedings and prosecution, he is compelled to be absent from his seat in the said house of representatives of the United States.

Wherefore he prays that he be hence discharged.

(Signed) Robert Smalls.

Sworn to 9th day of November, 1877.

The court refused to discharge the defendant and he excepted.

The juries were organized for the term, as stated in State v. Cardoza, next preceding case, ante p. 195. Jury No. 2 was called to try the case. The state challenged one juror for cause and two per*emptorily. Martin and two others were then drawn from the supernumerary list. The defendant challenged Martin peremptorily. The court ruled that defendant did not have the right to challenge jurors drawn to fill vacancies on the panel; to which ruling defendant excepted. Defendant then challenged a juror of the original panel, and one from the supernumerary list was drawn in his stead.

Attorney-General Conner offered in evidence Journal of the Senate, 1872–3. Mr. Melton, counsel for defendant, objected, and, his objection being overruled, excepted.

Josephus Woodruff, witness for state, testified that in consideration of the vote and influence in the senate of the defendant, in favor of a joint resolution appropriating money to pay for public printing, witness agreed to pay defendant $5000. That in pursuance of such agreement, witness gave to defendant, on January 16th, 1873, a check worded thus:

584, No. 17. Columbia, S. C., Jan'y 19, 1873.

South Carolina Bank and Trust Company, of Columbia, pay to cash or bearer, five thousand dollars.

$5000. J. Woodruff.

That check was dated a few days ahead, and its written date fell on Sunday. It was paid by the bank and returned to witness at the end of the month with his other checks drawn during the month. Witness was allowed to refresh his memory by referring to a memorandum-book, written in phonographic characters; defendant objected, because the book was intelligible only to witness, and excepted. Witness said the senate kept no permanent journal; only the printed journal.

L. M. Zealy, assistant bookkeeper of the South Carolina Bank and Trust Company, was offered as a witness to trace the above check through the bank. Defendant objected to the books of the bank being used against defendant, and his objection being overruled, excepted. Witness said this check was charged to Woodruff January 18th, 1873. Same day $5000 is put to credit of defendant, and was checked out on 8th of February. No other check that day charged to Woodruff or credited to Smalls. Figures 584 on check were put there by witness, and refer to page *of ledger. On page 584 of ledger is the entry of this check paid on W.'s account. When deposits were made it was the custom of the bank to require deposit slips. Witness produced the following, found among the papers of the bank:

S. C. Bank & Trust Company,
Columbia, S. C., Jan. 18, 1873.

Deposited by Hon. Robert Smalls.

Gold	$
Currency	$
Check, W.	5000
Total

The deposit-slip is in handwriting of F. S. Jacobs, then cashier of the bank, who has been absent from the state since 1873. The letter W is in pencil, also his handwriting, and indicates the person who drew the check. Defendant objected to all the testimony relating to this deposit-slip.

The defendant was found guilty.

A motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment was made in the Circuit Court, and severally refused. Defendant was then sentenced to be confined in the state penitentiary, at hard labor, for the period of three years.

Defendant appealed upon the following grounds:

The defendant having appealed from the judgment of the court herein, will move before the honorable the Supreme Court of the said state, for an order reversing the decision of his Honor Judge Townsend refusing the motion in arrest of judgment herein; and for an order in arrest of judgment upon the grounds in the said motion specifically stated and set forth—that is to say:

1. That prior to the trial herein, a petition was filed in this court praying that this cause be removed from this court to the next Circuit Court of the United States, to be held in the district where this cause is pending, upon grounds and because of facts therein stated, and that, thereupon, by virtue of the statute of the congress of the United States in such case made and pro*vided, all further proceedings in this court should have ceased, and the jurisdiction and authority of this court to try this cause, ceased and determined.

2. That prior to the trial herein, on the ground set forth by affidavit filed in this case, that the defendant is a member of the house of representatives of the congress of the United States, then and now in session, and that therefore the trial herein is in breach of the privileges of the defendant as such member, this court is without jurisdiction and authority to pronounce judgment herein.

3. That the jury rendering the verdict herein was not a legal and competent jury, and was not drawn, summoned, and impaneled according to law; in this, that to fill the deficiency in the number of jurors required by law, the names of five persons were drawn from an apartment of the jury box separate from the apartment containing the legal and proper lists of jurors prepared at the time and in the manner prescribed by statute That the jury commissioners of the said county were not authorized by law to place the names of jurors in such separate apartment and to draw therefrom "the jurors to supply the deficiencies" in the regular panel, and therefore, the jurors so drawn from such separate apartment were not in law competent to act as jurors; and that the defendant was denied his right to peremptorily challenge jurors who had been called to take the place of other jurors removed from the panel by challenge, although the challenges provided for by law in his behalf had not been and were not exhausted.

4. That the first count of the indictment herein is fatally defective for duplicity; in this, that in the statement of the crime therein charged against this defendant, is included several offences separate, distinct, and different each from the other; and for repugnancy, in this, that the "question" is therein set forth in inconsistent terms as "a question which was and might be by law brought before the said defendant," and so forth.

5. That the second count of the indictment is fatally defective for repugnancy; in this, that the "question" is therein set forth in inconsistent terms as a "joint resolution which was and might be by law brought before him, the said defendant," and so forth.

6. That the third count of the indictment herein is fatally defective for repugnancy; in this, that the joint resolution is therein set forth as a "joint resolution which was and might be by law brought before him, the said defendant," and so forth.

7. That the fourth count of the indictment is fatally defective; in this, that the description of the joint resolution and the time when introduced and pending, and to be brought before him, the said defendant, and so forth, are not stated with sufficient precision, clearness, and certainty—being without averment of era or year, or of numbers in words as required by law.

8. That the fifth count of the indictment herein is fatally defective; in this, that it does not set forth and charge a crime under the laws of this state.

And failing herein, the defendant will move before the honorable the Supreme Court of this state, upon the grounds stated and specifically set forth in the motion for new trial made before his Honor Judge Townsend for an order reversing the decision of his Honor Judge Townsend refusing the said motion, and for an order setting aside the verdict of the jury, and reversing the judgment of the Circuit Court herein, and granting a new trial, upon the grounds set forth in the motion in arrest of judgment aforesaid, and upon other and further grounds—that is to say:

1. Because the court erred in denying to the defendant the right of peremptory challenge, as to a juror, William T. Martin, who had been drawn and placed upon the panel in the place of a juror removed by peremptory challenge on the part of the state, although the defendant's right of peremptory challenge had not been exhausted.

2. Because the court erred in permitting a witness, Josephus Woodruff, to refresh his memory by reference to a book purporting to be a diary written in phonographic characters, peculiar to the witness and of his own invention; and because the court erred in admitting in evidence the entries said to be contained in the said diary, and allowing them to be translated by the said witness and read to the jury.

*3. Because the court erred in admitting in evidence the contents of a printed book, purporting to be a copy of the journal of the senate for the session of the general assembly of this state for 1873–'74, and allowing extracts therefrom to be read to the jury as evidence competent to show the proceedings of the senate upon the question in reference to the passage of the joint resolution referred to in the indictment, and competent to prove the averment that the defendant had voted in favor of the passage of the said resolution, and had otherwise used his office and influence in that behalf.

4. Because the court erred in admitting in evidence a printed book, purporting to contain copies of the acts and joint resolutions of the general assembly of this state for the session of 1873–'74, as competent to prove the fact and date of the passage of the joint resolution as averred in the indictment.

5. Because the court erred in admitting in evidence the books of a private corporation, known as "The South Carolina Bank and Trust Company," and permitting entries therein in the handwriting of the assistant bookkeeper, to be read and shown to the jury as evidence competent to prove, as against this defendant, that payments were made by the said bank on account of the said Woodruff, and a deposit made to the credit of the defendant of like amount, and the precise dates of such transactions; although it was in evidence that such transactions were not had with the assistant bookkeeper or within his personal knowledge; and although nothing appeared to connect the transaction had with the said bank by Woodruff with the transaction had with the said bank by this defendant; although the person with whom the transactions are alleged to have occurred is alive, and the person who made the entries is alive, examined as a witness at the trial.

6. Because the court erred in admitting in evidence a slip of paper, said to be in the handwriting of one F. S. Jacobs, an officer of the said bank, containing a date, the name of the defendant, and the figures "5000," written in pencil, as evidence competent to prove that, at such date, this defendant did deposit the sum of $5000 in the said bank by way of check; although it was proved that the said F. S. Jacobs is alive, and nothing *was proved to connect this defendant with the said paper, or to refer the said paper to any transaction between this defendant and the said Woodruff.

Several of the points involved in this appeal are identical with questions involved in Cardoza's case, and the argument is the same. Upon other points the two cases differ.

Mr. S. W. Melton, for appellant.

The accused having filed his petition for removal of the cause, the jurisdiction to try the case thereby ceased and determined. Rev. Stat. of U. S., § 641. The rights of the accused are secured by the constitution of the United States, and by Sections 1980, 5510, 5518 of Revised Statutes. The state court could not construe the statute; that belongs to the United States courts. 1 Wheat. 304; 6 Wheat. 264; 6 Wall. 247.

This first count is double. 1 Bish. on Crim. Proc., §§ 432, 441; State v. Howe, 1 Rich. 260.

The second and third counts are bad for repugnancy. 1 Bish. on Crim. Proc., § 572.

The joint resolution is not set forth with sufficient precision and certainty. 1 Bish. on Crim. Proc., §§ 344, 346.

The printed senate journal was improperly received in evidence. 2 Whart. on Ev., §§ 290, 295.

Mr. C. R. Miles, contra.

The defendant does not state, but it is manifest that a removal of the cause is claimed under Section 641 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. This was a part of the legislation intended to apply only to states which failed to guarantee, by legislation, the civil rights conferred by the constitutional amendments and acts of congress. It cannot apply to South Carolina. 16 Wall. 36; 2 Otto 542; 13 Wall. 581. Moreover, he does not state facts which show that he is denied any rights in the state tribunal. Nor could the United States courts try him under this charge if the case was removed.

He claims a privilege as a member of congress. Const. U. S., Art. I., § 6. When arrested he was not in attendance on con*gress, going to it or returning from it. Bright. Dig. 3, note (c). His presence is not required, for the charge is a misdemeanor, and he is under bond. The privilege of members of congress is the same as members of parliament. See 1 Bla. Com. 166; Story on Const., § 865; Cush. L. & P. Leg. As., §§ 559–563.

The indictment is framed under Section 2 of act of 1869, (Gen. Stat. 725) and follows its words. 2 Strob. 474; 1 McM. 472; 3 Strob. 269; 1 Bish. on Crim. Law, § 785; 1 Whart. on Am. Crim. Law, § 295; 1 Bail. 144; 1 McM. 236.

The joint resolution being only a question brought before defendant in his official capacity, it is sufficiently described by its title, certainty to a common intent only being necessary. 2 Bail. 70; 3 Rich. 68; Id. 174.

The printed journals were admissible to prove the vote of the senator and the date and passage of the joint resolution. 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 482; 1 Archb. Crim. Prac. & Pl. [145], note 1; Const. of 1868, Art. XI., § 26; Cooley on Const. Lim. 135; Cush. L. & P. Leg. As., § 428; 4 S. C. 430; 2 S. C. 150.

Acts and joint resolutions require no proof. 1 Archb. Crim. Prac. & Pl. [141]; 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 479.

The evidence objected to was properly admitted in corroboration of Woodruff. 1 Greenl. on Ev., §§ 120, 379, et seq.; 3 Strob. 517; 32 E. C. L. R. 507.

Mr. J. D. Pope, in reply.

The defendant has been convicted and sentenced—(1) before a jury without title to his office; (2) by a jury illegally impaneled; (3) upon evidence that should have been excluded; (4) under an indictment defective in form and substance; and (5) by the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, who has confessed his own guilt and proved himself to be steeped in vice and crime.

Could the defendant be convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of the accomplice, Woodruff? It was so, once. Then, some corroboration was required of the circumstances of the case. Next, it was considered that there should be at least corroboration of the identification of some of the accused to convict others not identified; but the injustice of this was soon recognized by the rulings of the courts. Finally, it was agreed that a judge should *charge the jury that the accomplice should be corroborated, as to the material circumstances of the case, as to the personal identity of the accused, and, if more than one, of all—and as to the corpus delicti, the essence of the crime charged. † STATE v. WINGO.

[Cited in State v. Scott, 15 S. C. 437; State v. Prater, 26 S. C. 207, 2 S. E. 108; State v. Green, 48 S. C. 146, 26 S. E. 234, to the point that defendant was convicted of hog-stealing, on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice whose general character was bad. The report of the trial judge did not show his charges to the jury and the character of the defendant as an honest man was sustained by the evidence. Held, that a new trial should be granted.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1124; Dec. Dig. ⟸510.]

In 1867, Abel Wingo was convicted of hog-stealing in the Court of General Sessions, Spartanburg county, before Hon. Thomas W. Glover, presiding judge. An appeal was taken upon the ground that the conviction rested upon the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice.

The opinion of the Court of Appeals was delivered by DUNKIN, C. J. In Mr. Phillips' Treatise on Evidence, pp. 110–112, the rule is thus stated: after premising that the testimony of an accomplice should be received with great jealousy and caution, because, among other things, they stand contaminated with guilt by their own confession, and are sometimes entitled to a reward upon obtaining a conviction, Mr. Phillips says: "The doctrine of a conviction being legal upon the unsupported evidence of an accomplice has been greatly modified in practice, and it has long been considered as a general rule that the testimony of an accomplice ought to receive confirmation, and that, unless it be corroborated in some material part by unimpeachable evidence, the presiding judge ought to advise the jury to acquit the prisoner."

The report of the presiding judge does not state his instructions to the jury, nor was it necessary under the specific grounds of appeal. It cannot, therefore, be affirmed that the verdict was illegal, although unsustained by any evidence except that of an accomplice in the crime, and whose general character would seem to impair his credibility. On the other hand, the character of the defendant, both as an honest man and good neighbor, was sustained by the witnesses. It is true that to judge of all this was the proper province of the jury, upon which this court has neither the Juries are not judges of the sufficiency of evidence: whether evidence is corroborative at all is a question of law for the court. Can a judge say to a jury, "If the jury believe the evidence of the accomplice, that alone is sufficient to authorize a verdict of *guilty?" See 3 Strob. 508; Shars. Stark. Ev. 727; Phil. on Ev., part 2, notes, 1510, and part 1, notes, 16–22; 2 Russ. on Cr. 960–962. Test this instruction by following authorities. 1 Greenl. on Ev. 426; 2 Russ. on Cr. 961, 962; 8 C. & P. 157; 6 C. & P. 595; 6 C. & P. 388; 8 C. & P. 106; 7 C. & P. 272; 8 C. & P. 732.

There was no corroboration of Woodruff. What is corroboration? See 1 Greenl. on Ev. 533, § 381, note; 2 Rich. Eq. 6. The senate journal corroborates only to the extent of identifying defendant with the legislative action, but that is immaterial. Greenl. on Ev., supra. The cabalistic book was not corroboration of its own author, can add nothing to the testimony of the corrupt creature, who thus corruptly refreshed his corrupt mind by corrupt evidence, and did not corroborate the identity of the defendant as connected with the issue. It was not evidence, because a witness may refresh his mind from a written paper only when such paper is intelligible to some other person, and is open to be tested by a cross-examination upon the paper itself. 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 437, note.

In the check to "cash or bearer," there is no corroboration; it might have been handed to any one else just as well. Alderson, B., in 7 C. & P. 272, supra. Nor does the check presented corroborate the accomplice—it was paid on January 18th, a day before the check proved was in existence. But then the accomplice corroborates the check, and the mysterious book corroborates the corroborator.

There is no corroboration in the deposit-slip, for the defendant is not brought into connection with it. It is not signed by defendant or by Jacobs, and should not have been received in evidence. Jacobs living, no other person could testify to the paper. Shars. Stark. Ev. 418, 64, 65; 1 Sm. Lead. Cas. 503; 2 N. & McC. 331; 4 Rich. 52; 7 Rich. 66; Bail. Eq. 482; 2 Hill (N. Y.) 557; Salk. 285, et cet. This is different from entries in shop books. 2 McC. 157.

The entries in bank-book are no corroboration. The witness who made them says he knew nothing personally. Of themselves they prove nothing. 4 Seld. 170; 4 Denio 354.

But every fact proven may be admitted—that Woodruff was *clerk of the senate, and one of the Republican printing company; that defendant was a senator; mover of the joint resolution mentioned; that he voted for it; that Woodruff did give defendant a check for $5000, which was paid to defendant at the bank—and still there is no proof of bribery. That charge, the very essence of the offence, is proven by Woodruff alone, uncorroborated by a single person or a single fact.

WILLARD, C. J. In the case of State v. Cardoza, ante page 195, just decided, we have considered and disposed of all the propositions presented by the third ground of appeal from the decision refusing the motion in arrest, and in the first and second grounds for granting a new trial, and they need not be again considered. The remaining questions will be considered in the order in which they stand in the grounds of appeal.

The defendant was indicted for bribery as a member of the senate of this state. Before the commencement of the trial he presented to the Court of Common Pleas a petition for the removal of the cause to the Circuit Court of the United States. He alleges that he is a person of color, was formerly a slave, and was afterwards a captain and pilot in the service of the United States, and that for that reason great prejudice exists against him in the county of Richland, where the indictment was found. He alleges that prejudice exists against him on account of his race, color and previous condition of servitude, "so that he cannot have a fair, impartial trial in this honorable court, by reason of political excitement, and by reason of the prejudices excited against him by articles published in the newspapers. He further alleges that he had been elected a representative to the United States congress, and was then engaged in a contest of his seat with one claiming to have received such election, and that he believes that the said prosecution on the indictment above set forth is incited against him by a conspiracy to prevent him, by intimidation, from holding an office under the United States, and from discharging the duties thereof, and by the same to *injure him in his property, and to molest, interrupt, hinder and impede him in the discharge of his official duties, and that said indictment is presented with intention to deprive him of his rights, privileges and immunities secured by the constitution and laws of the United States, to which, as a citizen, he is entitled." He alleges the existence of great prejudice against him in said county, excited through such contest, and that he cannot enforce, in the judicial tribunals of the part of the state where the said right nor the disposition to encroach. But in the absence of distinct information as to the charge of the judge, the infirmity of the testimony adduced, and the grave consequences to the defendant of conviction of an infamous offence, the court have determined that neither the rules of law nor the purposes of justice would be impaired by submitting the case to another jury.

The motion for a new trial is granted.

prosecution is pending, the right secured to him by the laws providing for the equal civil rights, as citizens of the United States, of all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States.

The removal of the cause is claimed under Section 641 (page 114) of the Revised Statutes of the United States. This section provides that "when any civil suit or criminal prosecution is commenced against any person who is denied or cannot enforce, in the judicial tribunal of the state, or in the part of the state where such suit or prosecution is pending, any right secured to him by any law providing for the equal civil rights of citizens of the United States, or of all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States," such suit or prosecution may, upon the petition of such defendant, filed in the state court at any time before the trial or final hearing of the cause, stating the facts and verified by oath, be removed for trial into the next Circuit Court to be held in the district where it is pending. It further directs that "upon the filing of such petition all further proceedings in the state court shall cease, and shall not be resumed except as hereinafter provided." The section in question extends the right of removal to certain other cases not important to be specially considered at this time, as the construction of the section can be ascertained without particular reference to such omitted portions.

This court is charged with the enforcement of the constitution of the United States, and the acts of congress passed in conformity with it, in cases within its jurisdiction, as effectually as if it had been brought into existence under power created by that constitution. We must settle the construction of the constitution and laws of the United States, subject to revision by the Supreme Court of the United States, whenever a similar duty would be imposed, as it regards the constitution and laws of our own state. *The section in question must be regarded, so far as it concerns criminal prosecutions commenced in a state court for the redress of wrongs committed against the laws of the state, as, in substance, an interdict of such prosecution whenever, by the law governing the court, some right is denied that is secured to the defendant under the constitution and laws of the United States, where such provision is intended to secure equal civil rights among all citizens and persons residing in the United States, and where the deprivation of such right is material to his defence. In this respect there are but two views to be taken of the intended effect of the act of congress over proceedings in a criminal cause, after arresting its course in the state court; one is that the cause shall proceed to trial and judgment in the United States Circuit Court, and the other that it shall cease altogether, or until by some authority, not very clearly pointed out, jurisdiction to proceed shall be restored to the state court. The first-stated of these views is without reasonable support. It assumes that the Circuit Court of the United States can obtain jurisdiction of crimes committed against the laws of the states, and of the penalties imposed therefor by such laws. It would be singular, indeed, if such an extraordinary power should be found to have laid dormant through a century of our national existence, escaping the attention of the ablest jurist. The difficulty in the way of such a jurisdiction is fundamental. What character would such a criminal prosecution obtain on removal into the United States courts? It certainly would not then be a criminal case in the sense contemplated by the constitution and the acts of congress settling the criminal jurisdiction of the Circuit Court. A criminal case, as usually understood under the common law, is a proceeding by a sovereign of a realm in his own courts against one subjected to his authority for a violation of his laws. The United States is such a sovereign, and proceeds in such manner in the courts of the United States clothed with criminal jurisdiction.

The United States courts, as criminal courts, when proceeding by indictment, act only on such cases as are found by grand juries convened under the laws of the United States, and serving in the United States courts alone. Public officers of the United *States conduct and control such proceedings. Beyond doubt, the Circuit Court, as an incident to a civil action properly pending before it, can pronounce a judgment that derives its force wholly under the laws of a state, but that results from a direct grant of such jurisdiction in the constitution of the United States. The constitution confers on the courts of the United States jurisdiction of "controversies" between parties of a certain character. Const. U. S., Art. III. In no just sense can a criminal proceeding in the courts of the state be regarded as a controversy as that term is used in the constitution of the United States. So the court of a foreign state can enforce, as between parties subject to its jurisdiction, rights having their origin and sanction only under the laws of another state. No such attempt has ever been made to transplant criminal jurisdiction, and it is inconsistent with the nature of such proceedings. In the constitution of the criminal administration of all civilized states, the functions of justice and mercy are inseparably united. While the administration of justice is committed to one source of public authority, the power of pardon is usually placed in the hands of another. A subordinate authority to control and supersede such prosecutions is placed in some authority, either executive or judicial.

Will it be contended that the administration is carried to the courts of the United States, leaving the functions of ameliorating its severity in the hands of the state authorities, or that these attributes are carried over into the same jurisdiction, to be exercised in some manner never pointed out by any constitution, law or precedent? The acts of congress do not attempt to solve the numerous difficulties in the way of such a jurisdiction and we shall not attempt it. It is evident that if it had been the intention of congress to change radically the rules, forms and substantial incidents of the proceedings of the criminal courts of the United States, some evidence of such an intention would have appeared in the acts in question; whereas, nothing of that kind appears. We cannot presume such an intent. It must be concluded that a criminal proceeding, removed into the United States court, if it can proceed at all in those courts, must do so as a civil cause. Such a proposition carries absurdity on its face, and need not be considered. We are compelled, then, to conclude that the object *of the act was to terminate certain criminal proceedings, having their origin under the laws of a state and in the courts of a state, by removing them to a court having no authority to proceed in them. Although this conclusion leaves the relations of the courts of the states and of the United States in an anomalous and unfortunate condition, and may give rise to the inquiry whether any constitutional authority exists in the congress of the United States to interdict proceedings in state courts on grounds involving the integrity of state administration alone, especially when full authority has been granted for the correction of any errors that these courts may commit, on failures to give full force to the constitution and laws of the United States in a court having appellate jurisdiction over the state courts for that purpose, yet we are forced to conclude, by the terms of the act itself, that such was the intention of the body from which it emanated.

Under the view we take of the case, it will not become necessary to examine the authority of congress to reach such a result, as we do not regard the case in hand as coming within the act in question. Considering, then, that the object of the act of congress was to stop proceedings of a criminal character pending in a state court under certain circumstances, it becomes evident that it was only intended that such authority should be exercised when the law of the forum thus invaded does not admit of a defence that involves some ground of right, arising or secured under provisions of the constitution and laws of the United States intended to secure equal civil rights. Assuming, for the purposes of the argument, that congress possesses such powers in any degree, and a reasonable case for its exercise might be imagined when such courts had not the legal measure of power to enforce some right arising under or secured by the constitution and laws of the United States, provided there was no other or better remedy. Such a case might arise when one indicted in a state court, having full right of citizenship under the constitution and laws of the United States, is, by the law of a state, deprived of a standing in the court allowed to citizens at large. If the right of trial by jury, of being confronted by witnesses, or to any of the incidents of a regular and usual arraignment, trial, verdict and judgment allowed to other citizens, be denied such a person, *it may well be said that a tribunal, thus destitute of the means of administering justice in the case, is not entitled to be regarded, under the constitution and laws of the United States, as possessing any competency to act upon the rights of such persons. But even in this case a question would remain whether an adequate remedy is not afforded by the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, acting on the proceedings of the court of last resort in the state upon such case, inasmuch as in such an appeal the defendant could well say that he had been denied a right claimed under the constitution and laws of the United States; but that need not be considered. It may be observed that no such defect of authority is alleged or exists in the present case.

On what principle could legislation by congress be carried beyond the point? If such a power exists, it need not be confined to the cases enumerated in the act in question, but may extend to any case when either the prosecution or defence set up in a state court involves any right or modification of right originating under or secured by the constitution and laws of the United States. When, then, it is considered to what extent the laws of the United States enter in some degree into contracts and rights of action and defence, and how extensively they might be made to influence them through the various powers committed to congress by the constitution—notably, of those relating to excise and imports—some conception may be formed of the possible extent of such a jurisdiction. It may be said that it cannot be presumed that congress will stretch a prerogative to its utmost limit, and, therefore, in considering the nature of such a jurisdiction, we ought to have in mind only that idea of it which appears to be reasonable and consistent with the general objects of the constitution. This view, reasonable enough when applied only to the ordinary motives of a legislative body, has no application to cases involving the equilibrium between the different parts of a complex government established by fundamental laws. The constitution of the United States placed the security of the states against federal encroachment on no such low ground. Its principle is to circumscribe and limit the powers that may be detrimental to the rights of the states, and to trust *as little as possible to the assumed principle that rival governments, acting in the same realm or sphere, will be controlled by moderation towards each other. Those who framed that instrument were too well versed in the history of government to entertain such an optimistic idea. If, then, the constitution impresses the important truth that, in maintaining the equilibrium of this complex government, reliance must be had solely in limitations of public authority, the interpretation of that constitution, and of the law passed under it, must be largely influenced by it. If it be conceded that power exists under the act of congress, even to the limited extent already considered, there is still a jurisdiction of incalculable limits, and of sufficient potency to work out material changes in the structure of the government and the equilibrium of its parts. But if the plenary powers contended for by the defendant exist, the equilibrium between the states and the national government, sought so carefully by the constitution, is practically destroyed.

The appellant contends that prejudice, based on his being a person of color, and formerly a slave, in his political opinions and associations, and on the ground of services rendered during the late war to the United States, exist in the country where the indictment was found. Is this a case within the act of congress, assuming the facts to be as stated by him? If so, then the existence of local prejudice likely to affect the rights of a party prosecuting or defending in a state court is ground for inhibiting such court from exercising its jurisdiction, under the authority of an act of congress, where such prosecution or defense involves any direct or incidental right arising or secured under the constitution or laws of the United States. If the rights of equal citizenship are entitled to this protection, then all other rights of the same origin or sanction are entitled to equal protection. The fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the constitution, intended to secure equal civil rights in this respect, do not place such cases on higher ground than other rights secured under the constitution. Congress is authorized to enforce such provisions by "appropriate" legislation. By appropriate legislation is clearly meant such legislation as that sanctioned by the instrument at large. Unless, then, such legislation as we have under consideration *would be appropriate in the case of other rights secured under the constitution, it would not be embraced within the intention of those amendments. We are at liberty, therefore, to consider the subject, on general principles, applicable to the constitution at large.

There is no clause in the constitution of the United States that guarantees a just administration of the laws of the states within their proper sphere as affecting rights enjoyed under that constitution, except as that is implied in certain provisions conferring jurisdiction on the federal courts, both original and appellate. The power in question will not be claimed to arise under that claim of jurisdiction; from what source, then, can it arise? There is nothing in the constitution as originally framed, or in the amendments, that can by any process of reasoning be perverted into such a guaranty. The idea of stopping the administration of justice because it is imperfect, has no place among the principles of the law nor the practice of governments. You might as well arrest the action of the heart because the blood is impure. To stop it on the ground that the community surrounding the court, and possibly affecting the purity of its administration, is in a temper unfavorable to a litigant, without any provision for transferring the trial to another part of the same jurisdiction where circumstances of a more favorable character exist, is to acknowledge exhaustion of the capacity and means of government. The application of the views here presented to the case made by the appellant's petition, is so obvious that it needs no particular discussion.

This court held in Barker v. Bowen, 8 S. C. 400, that in order to remove a cause from the state court to the United States Circuit Court, it was necessary that sufficient cause for such removal should appear on the face of such petition. It is not necessary for the purposes of the present case to say whether the facts alleged are traversable in the state court; for the defect is one of law appearing on the face of the petition in the present case. The general statement of the petition that the defendant "is denied and cannot enforce in the judicial tribunals of the part of the state, where the said prosecution is pending, the rights secured to him by the laws providing for equal civil rights as *citizens of the United States of all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States," is insufficient in itself, independent of the ground of fact laid for such a statement. It assumes rather the character of an indictment or impeachment of the tribunal before which one is laboring under a charge of crime, proceeding from the alleged criminal against his sovereign sitting in judgment upon his conduct, than an exception to the right of the court to proceed in the case. If such an anomalous proceeding is to be tolerated as consistent with the practice of civilized communities, the indictment, at the least, ought to be specific and lay a foundation of fact within the act of congress. But where we look into the facts alleged they amount to nothing more than a charge of prejudice existing in the community. If a question of removing the cause for trial to another county had been raised, the court could have looked into the truth of the facts alleged, but this was not the defendant's demand. He selected his own forum, and he must stand by that selection. The prayer of the petition was properly denied.

The privilege of a member of congress was not available and was properly refused. An indictment for bribery is not arrested by such privilege.

There was no duplicity in charging in the indictment that the defendant corruptly accepted a gift and gratuity, and a promise to make a gift. The promise must be regarded as relating to a gift additional to that alleged to have been given and accepted. There is no inconsistency in taking a certain sum and the promise of a further sum, and the indictment must be read in that sense. The charge is not in any sense in the alternative, and is only cumulative as it regards the consideration of the bribe, a single act of corrupt taking being alleged.

The statement that the question of legislation to which the bribe related, "was and might be by law brought before," etc., is without fault. It was merely equivalent to saying that it was brought before him to act upon as a senator in conformity with law. It cannot be referred for explanation to a somewhat similar phrase in the statute constituting the crime, for the latter is in the disjunctive and intended to treat cumulatively the cases to which the crime should apply, while the indictment *alleged only a single case, and uses that language solely to characterize that case.

The joint resolution in regard to which the bribe was alleged to have been offered and received was sufficiently set forth by its title, that being the due and ordinary mode of designating the particular action of the legislature in a given case. The terms of the resolution did not in the least enter into the constitution of the offence. The essence of the crime was the acceptance of a gratuity, or the promise of one "under an agreement" that his vote should be given in a particular manner as to some "question, cause, or proceeding which is or may be by law brought before him in his official capacity." The identity of the "question" is complete with the statement of the title of the measure of legislation that was thus contemplated. The terms of that resolution, as it was finally passed, are immaterial, as they were subject to change after the agreement, for the bribe was complete without changing the identity of the "question" that was the subject of the agreement. This objection to the fourth count is disposed of by what has just been said.

The jury were charged that the fifth count was defective, and therefore the objections to that count need not be considered.

The ground urged for a new trial will next be considered. There was no error in admitting into evidence the printed records of the proceedings of the senate in proof of such proceedings. Article II., Section 26, of the constitution, requires each house to keep and publish a journal of its proceedings. The journals so published are competent evidence to show what matters were pending before the legislative bodies at any particular time, and as that was a matter at issue, it was proper to introduce the journals as the highest legal proof of the fact.

It is not necessary to consider the competency of such proof to establish the fact of an act done by the defendant, as an individual member of the senate, that constituted a material part of the crime charged, for no such question is raised. The evidence being competent for any purpose was properly admitted.

Nor was there error in admitting proof from the books and memoranda of the bank. The state sought to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice by a line of proof that embraced *certain facts, of which one was that a credit had been given to the defendant by the bank in which he kept his account, as upon a deposit of the check paid to him for the purpose of the bribe as alleged by such accomplice. It was competent to prove the fact of such credit being given by the books of the bank. The memorandum alleged to have been made in the ordinary course of business by the officer who received the deposit, and which was intended to show the nature and amount of the deposit, must be regarded as representing the original note or memorandum from which the books were made up, and as such was competent to explain the books. There was accordingly no error in its reception in evidence. As no exception brings before us the legal force of these proofs, that subject need not be considered.

The court having overruled all the exceptions the appeal must be dismissed.

McIVER, and HASKELL, A. J.'s, concurred.

Separate Opinion of McIVER, A. J. In this case I concur fully in all the conclusions reached by the CHIEF JUSTICE. I desire, however, simply to indicate the reasons why I think there was no error on the part of the Circuit judge in refusing to allow the defendant the right to challenge peremptorily the juror, William T. Martin. I have already presented these reasons in an opinion just filed in the case of State v. F. L. Cardoza, Ante page 195, and it is unnecessary to repeat them here, but only to refer to them as influencing my judgment in this case. The only difference between the two cases is that, in the case against Cardoza, the defendant, after having been refused the right to challenge peremptorily two of the jurors, who had been drawn after the twelve originally presented, actually did exercise the right of peremptory challenge to the full extent allowed by law, by challenging five of the original twelve, while, in the case now under consideration, the defendant did not offer to challenge peremptorily but two of the jurors presented, Stanley and Martin, one of which was allowed and the other disallowed. The peremptory challenge of Stanley was properly allowed, because he was one of the *twelve originally drawn and presented, while that of Martin was properly disallowed, inasmuch as he was drawn after the original twelve, and, until they had been disposed of, either by acceptance or rejection, the defendant could not reach Martin. Until they were sworn, they could not be regarded as accepted; and, certainly, in this case, it could not be said that they had been accepted by the defendant, for, as the record shows, after his challenge of Martin had been disallowed, he then peremptorily challenged Stanley, one of the original twelve, thereby demonstrating that he had not accepted all that remained of the original twelve. It is very clear, therefore, that at the time the defendant offered to challenge Martin, who had been subsequently drawn, he had no right to do so; and it does not appear that he attempted to exercise this right after those who had been originally drawn were disposed of.

HASKELL, A. J. I concur in the result. My reasons are stated in a separate opinion filed in the case of State v. F. L. Cardoza.

Appeal dismissed.

THE STATE, ex rel. ALICE BURTON, v. ALFRED WILLIAMS, Intendant, and JAMES COHEN, Marshall of the Town of Beaufort.

THE STATE, ex rel. JOHN H. PAGE, v. THE SAME.

[1. Municipal Corporations ⟸594.]

An ordinance to prevent the keeping of a bawdy-house is clearly within the scope of the powers conferred upon a municipal corporation, whose charter authorizes "by-laws, rules and regulations * * * for preserving peace, order and good government."

The intendant of a town, "vested with all the power and jurisdiction given to trial justices of this state," and authorized to "hold court for the trial of violations of town ordinances," and "to punish by fine or imprisonment, in his discretion, or both," has power to try all violations of the town *ordinances, although such violation may involve a common law offence. And it seems he may summon and impanel a jury, when demanded.

[This case is also cited and affirmed in Town Council of Beaufort v. Ohlandt, 24 S. C. 158.]

Before Wiggin, J., at Beaufort, July, 1877.

The opinion of the court states all matters necessary to a full understanding of the case. The writ of prohibition was refused by the Circuit judge, and the relators appealed.

Mr. W. J. Verdin and Mr. Thomas G. White, for appellants.

Mr. William Elliott, for respondents.

November 30th, 1878. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. The case first above stated was an application for a writ of prohibition, restraining the respondents "from any further proceedings" in a prosecution against the appellant for keeping a bawdy-house within the corporate limits of the town of Beaufort. It appears that the appellant was tried before the intendant of said town, upon a charge of keeping a bawdy-house, in violation of one of the ordinances of the town, and, upon conviction, was sentenced "to imprisonment for thirty days in the guard-house, or to pay a fine of twenty-five dollars and costs, or to work thirty days for the town, and that said relator thereupon paid said fine, subject to appeal to council." Whether any steps towards such appeal were taken does not appear; but the relator applied for a writ of prohibition, upon the ground that the intendant had no jurisdiction to try such a case; and this is the only question which we are called upon to consider.

*To determine this question it is only necessary to inquire whether the charter of the town conferred the authority to pass the ordinance under which the appellant was tried, whether the ordinance was passed by the town council, and whether the charter, or any other act of the legislature, conferred upon the intendant the right to try and punish persons who might violate such ordinance; for nothing can be plainer than that the legislature has the right to confer legislative power upon the various municipal corporations which have been or may be established for the purpose of enabling them to carry into effect the objects for which they are created. Heisembrittle ads. City Council, 2 McM. 233; City Council v. Ahrens, 4 Strob. 241; Heise v. Town Council, 6 Rich. 404.

It is very manifest that all these inquiries must be answered in the affirmative. The original charter of the town of Beaufort, granted in 1803, (8 Stat. 218,) expressly confers upon the town council the power "to make and establish such by-laws, rules and regulations * * * that shall appear to them requisite and necessary for the security, welfare and convenience of the said town, or for preserving peace, order and good government within the same." The act of 1872, (15 Stat. 136,) amending the charter of said town, confers the same powers, in much the same language, the limitation being that such by-laws and ordinances shall not be inconsistent with or repugnant to the laws of the state, and shall at all times be subject to revisal or repeal by the general assembly of the state.

Certainly every one will admit that an ordinance to prevent the keeping of a bawdy-house within the limits of the town is an ordinance tending to the preservation of "peace, order and good government" in said town, and, therefore, clearly within the scope of the powers conferred by the charter.

Finally, the act of 1874 (15 Stat. 647) declares in Section 2, "That the intendant or acting intendant of said town is hereby vested with all the power and jurisdiction given to trial justices of this state, and may hold court for the trial of violations of town ordinances, and may punish by fine or imprisonment, in his discretion, or both."

lature, it is very *clear that the legislature had conferred upon the town council the power to pass such an ordinance as the one under which the relator was tried and convicted, and that power had been vested in the intendant to try this, as well as all other violations of the ordinances of said town; and the fact that such ordinance was duly passed by the town council is not disputed, the same being set out in full in the "case."

It is argued, however, that as the offence of keeping a bawdy-house is indictable at common law, it cannot be indictable before a trial justice, but that the Court of General Sessions has exclusive jurisdiction under Article IV., Section 18, of the constitution. So much of that section as relates to this matter reads as follows: "The Court of General Sessions shall have exclusive jurisdiction over all criminal cases which shall not be otherwise provided for by law." Hence, in order to bring any case within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of Sessions, it will be necessary to show that the trial of such case has not been "otherwise provided for by law." But, as we have seen, the trial of the case under consideration has been "otherwise provided for by law," and hence it is not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of Sessions.

Again, it is argued that if the town authorities can take jurisdiction of a common law offence simply because they have adopted an ordinance prohibiting such offence under a specific penalty, then one of the two results must follow: either the municipal authorities have the power to change the common law, or a party may be subjected to being twice tried and punished for the same act. For if the trial and conviction under the ordinance operates as a bar to the trial under the common law, then the ordinance operates a change in the common law, by mere municipal authority; but if it does not operate as a bar, then the offender is liable to be twice punished for the same act—and either of these results, it is contended, is too monstrous to be for a moment contemplated. In reference to this argument it is only necessary to say that the case as presented here does not necessarily involve the consideration of any such questions. It may be as well, however, to say that if it should be held that the ordinance operated a change in the common law, such change *would not be effected by mere municipal authority; for every ordinance passed by a municipal corporation, under the powers conferred by its charter, derives its authority from the legislative power of the state, and not merely from the municipal authority passing it: and hence, unless it is passed in pursuance of authority granted by the law-making power of the state, it has no force or effect whatever; but when so passed, it does have the force and effect of a legislative act, within the limits prescribed for it. And of the other result—that of subjecting an offender to two punishments for the same act, not the same offence—it may be said that it is not so monstrous as might at first be supposed, inasmuch as we find that our own courts have decided that for the same act a man may be twice punished, because, by the one act, he has violated two distinct statutes of the state, committed two distinct offences, and is therefore liable to two distinct punishments. State v. Sonnerkalb, 2 N. & McC. 280; State v. Glasgow, Dud. 40; State v. Taylor, 2 Bail. 49. It is true that in the case of Schroder v. City Council, 3 Brev. 533, Nott, J., did say that an ordinance of the city council of Charleston, imposing a penalty for selling spirituous liquors without a license, could not stand, because the legislature had imposed a different penalty for the same offence. The question, however, does not seem to have been discussed in that case, and was not essential to the case made. This case does not seem to have been subsequently followed, and, on the contrary, the cases of Heisembrittle ads. City Council, and City Council v. Ahrens, supra, necessarily imply that such an objection to the ordinance would not then have been sustained. In Heise v. Town Council, supra, O'Neall, in his Circuit decision, uses this language: "That the by-laws of a corporation must be subordinate to, and not in conflict with, the statute law cannot be denied. I confess I don't perceive how an ordinance, imposing a fine for doing an act within the corporate limits, which the legislature have declared to be unlawful, can be said to conflict with such law. Both can very well stand together, and both may be enforced—one as against a corporator, and the other against him as a citizen. My great respect for any decision made by Judge Nott has made me hesitate much on this point. Unquestionably the case of Schro*der v. City Council, 3 Brev. 533, did rule that an ordinance imposing a fine for an offence which had been, by the legislature, subjected also to a fine, could not stand. On looking to that case, however, it appears that only three out of six judges heard the case, and two gave the judgment—the third dissenting. Under such circumstances, as my judgment is clear against the decision, I am not bound to follow it." As Heise's Case turned upon another point—the want of power in the town council to adjudge a forfeiture—the question with which we are concerned was not considered by the Court of Appeals. But as that court went beyond the case, and declared that the imposition by the town council of five fines for selling spirituous liquors contrary to one of the ordinances of the town, amounting in the aggregate to a sum beyond their jurisdiction, though each fine was within the amount of their jurisdiction, was not irregular simply because the fines were imposed at one sitting of the council, we must conclude that the court agreed with Judge O'Neall on the question we are considering. Otherwise, they would have declared the imposition of the fines void upon the ground taken by Judge Nott, especially as one of the grounds of appeal taken by the relator raised that very question. By reference to the following cases it will be seen that this question has been decided elsewhere in conformity with the view presented by Judge O'Neall in Heise's Case. McLaughlin v. Stephens, 2 Cranch C. C. R. 148 [Fed. Cas. No. 8,874]; United States v. Holly, 3 Cranch C. C. R. 656 [Fed. Cas. No. 15,381]; Hamilton v. State (Texas), 6 Reporter, 476. See also Cooley on Const. Lim. 198–9.

Again, it is urged that the relator was entitled to a trial by a jury, and that this she could not get on her trial before the intendant. It may be observed that there is no evidence whatever before us that the relator demanded a jury. But if she had made such demand there would have been no difficulty in obtaining a jury. The intendant, as we have seen, is invested with all the powers of a trial justice for the trial of violations of town ordinances, and as one of the powers of a trial justice is to summon a jury when demanded, and the mode of proceeding by which a jury may be obtained, is pointed out in Section 31 of Chapter XXV., General

Statutes, p. 200, it is difficult to see *how this objection can avail the appellant. It may be that the intendant erred in imposing the sentence, by requiring, as one of the alternatives, that the relator should "work thirty days for the town," but as the right of appeal from the sentence is expressly reserved to the defendant by Chapter XXV., Section 34, General Statutes, p. 201, such error, if any it be, might have been corrected in that way, and would not constitute ground for prohibition. Indeed, no such ground is taken in this case, and the matter is only adverted to for the purpose of showing that it would not have availed the relator even had it been properly taken.

The case of State, ex rel. John H. Page, v. Alfred Williams, Intendant, and James Cohen, Marshal of the town of Beaufort, 11 S. C. 288, depends upon the same facts and must be governed by the same legal principles.

The judgment of the Circuit judge, in both of the cases, is affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

[This case is also cited in Mason v. Johnson, 13 S. C. 21, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Northrop, J., at Union, June Term, 1876.

The plaintiffs are the only children of Rosannah P. Renwick, who was the wife of W. W. Renwick, and daughter of John Rogers—all of Union county. John Rogers died January 27th, 1847, leaving of force a last will and testament, bearing date March, 1842; and he left surviving him one son and three daughters. The son, James Rogers, was nominated executor, but he renounced the executorship, and also released all of his interest in the estate in favor of his sisters. Letters of administration cum testamento annexo, were granted March 20th, 1847, to W. W. Renwick and Clough S. Beard, jointly, both of whom had married daughters of testator, and James Rogers signed their administration bond as a surety. W. W. Renwick attended to almost all of the duties of the office.

Mrs. Renwick had no children at the date of her father's will and none at his death. Her first child was still-born between those dates. Her second was the plaintiff, John R., born November 2d, 1847, and her third and last, James E., was born December, 1849. She was married in 1841, and died January, 1850.

In August, 1851, W. W. Renwick, as administrator, filed his return in the Court of Ordinary, sworn to as stated in the opinion of the court, wherein he charged himself with all of his receipts on account of the estate, and credited himself with all of his payments, and with "net balance for distribution, $10.574.88;" next follows an account, wherein he credits himself with "distribution of above net balance, as per will," that is—

*To Jane E. Beard and R. P. Renwick, to make their advancements equal to S. M. Lyons'.....	$1504 50
To Jane E. Beard and husband....	3023 46
To R. P. Renwick and husband.....	3023 46

Then follows credit of $431.92 to each of four children of Mrs. Lyons (a daughter of testator, then deceased,) with no total added up. Next follows under head of "Dr." the very same items, together with $431.92 to each of the remaining three of Mrs. Lyons' children, and a total of $10,574.88. The return has no dates whatever to the items.

The personal property was sold March, 1847, on a credit of one year; the land was sold (under a power given in the will) in November, 1847, for $3700, on a credit of one and two years, and was purchased by W. W. Renwick. These two sale bills, together with cash on hand at testator's death, made up the entire estate, with the addition of only $96.37, collected by W. W. R. before 1850. The personal estate sold for $5966.72, of which Renwick purchased $2570.37, Beard $829.35, other parties $2567.

C. S. Beard died in 1871, W. W. Renwick in 1872, and James Rogers in 1873; and the defendants, J. W. N. Beard, G. D. Smith and R. B. Lyons, respectively, administered on their estates.

The action was commenced January 27th, 1875.

The complaint claimed that Rosannah P. Renwick was entitled only to a life estate in the property willed to her; that the plaintiffs, her sons and only children, were entitled to an absolute estate in remainder therein; that no part of the share of the said Rosannah P. had ever been delivered to her in her lifetime, or to the plaintiffs since her death; that there was due the plaintiffs the sum of $4527.96, with interest from January 31st, 1850, as appeared from returns of the said administrators of John Rogers, and that the administrators had wasted the assets of the estate.

And the complaint prayed judgment for the sum of $4527.96, with interest from January 31st, 1850, for an account for costs and for general relief.

The defendants answered, denied that the plaintiffs had such an estate as they claimed, and insisted that the said Rosannah *took an estate in fee simple absolute under the will. They also insisted that the estate of Rosannah went into the possession of her husband, and that his marital rights attached thereto. And they further claimed the protection of the statute of limitations, because the cause of action did not accrue to either of the plaintiffs within four years before the commencement of their action.

The clauses of the will construed by the court are as follows:

3. I give, devise and bequeath to my daughter, Rosannah P. Renwick, and her children, the following negroes: Rosy, Lucy, Jim, Elijah and Rosetta, her children, and Jesse and Ned, lately appraised, as aforesaid, at three thousand dollars, she accounting for interest from the first day of January, eighteen hundred and forty-two, till my death, and at that time she is to receive an equal part, with her other sisters, of my land and negroes above stated, including the Hagar family of negroes.

5. I reserve a life estate in all my other property, and at my death I wish my other negroes fairly appraised and given off to my children in families, as they can best agree among themselves; if not, sold and divided as above stated; the rest and residue of my other property to be sold and divided in four equal parts among my aforesaid children, and if any of my daughters should die without leaving children, their property hereby given to be divided in four equal parts, one part to be retained by their husbands, and the other three parts to come back to my other children.

By the fourth clause of the will, the only land of which testator died seized was directed to be sold; and counsel agreed that it was thereby converted into personalty.

The Circuit judge decided that John R. Renwick was barred by the statute of limitations; that James E. Renwick was not so barred; that, under the will, Rosannah P. Renwick took a life estate, with remainder in fee to her sons, the plaintiffs; that the marital rights of W. W. Renwick did not attach to her share. And the decree referred it to the clerk to take an account in conformity with such rulings.

From this decree John R. Renwick appealed, upon the ground that he is not barred by the statute. And all the defendants ap*pealed, upon the grounds that the statute of limitations barred James E. Renwick; that the said Rosannah P. took an absolute, indefeasible estate under the will; and that the marital rights of her husband, the said W. W. Renwick, attached to her share.

Mr. J. F. J. Caldwell, for plaintiffs.

An administrator or other fiduciary, and the sureties on his bond, cannot claim the benefit of the statute of limitations against the cestuis que trust. Aug. on Lim., § 166, et seq.; 2 Desaus. 54; 4 Strob. Eq. 207. The only qualification allowed of this rule is where some act is done by the fiduciary purporting to be a termination or disavowal of the trust. 4 Rich. Eq. 60; 4 Strob. Eq. 189; Bail. Eq. 195; 1 Strob. Eq. 79; 2 Strob. Eq. 334; 3 Strob. Eq. 39; 3 Rich. L. 438; 14 Rich. Eq. 176. But this case is like none of these. He states the balance due, but does not profess to have paid them. If the statute did bar, it would only bar an accounting, not a demand of balance admitted to be on hand.

II. The second question is whether Rosannah P. Renwick took a life estate under John Rogers' will, the remainder being in his sons, the plaintiffs, or whether she took an absolute estate.

It is indisputable—since Lampley v. Blower, 3 Atk. 396; Henry v. Archer, Bail. Eq. 535; Nix v. Ray, 5 Rich. L. 423—that a devise or bequest to one and his or her children or issue, with a limitation over, in case of the death of the first taker without having issue, operates to create a purchase, and not an inheritance, on the part of such children or issue, and thereby creates a life estate in the first taker and an estate in remainder in the children, after the death of the first taker. On the other hand, it is conceded that a bare bequest or devise to one, with a limitation over in case of that one dying without issue, will create a fee simple in the first taker, subject only to the condition of children being born to him or her, and that upon the happening of that event, the estate of the first taker becomes absolute.

The question here is, which of such two provisions did John Rogers really make? If the fifth clause of the will is taken by itself, it is not unreasonable to say that the later provision is intended. If the will is taken as a whole, it is submitted that the *former case is provided; for, by combining the third and the fifth clauses, we make devises and bequests to Rosannah Renwick and her children, and if she should die without leaving children, then over to her husband and her brothers and sisters, in equal shares. It is conceded that a simple conveyance or devise, without further description, confers an estate in fee simple absolute; that dubious provisions of a will shall be construed in favor of the heir-at-law; and that an absolute and certain gift of property shall not be thwarted by mere conjecture as to the grantor's intention. But the paramount rules in the construction of wills are, that the intention of the testator, unless in direct contravention of the established principles, shall be consulted and carried out; and that the whole will shall be construed together.

The following authorities declare the necessity of reading the whole will together, in order to arrive at the intention of the testator, and also to show that it is the intention of the testator that is to govern the case. 2 Ves., Jr., 329; 10 Bac. Ab. 533; 2 Paige 122; Bail. Eq. 517; 10 Bac. Ab. 534; 6 Ves., Jr., 129; 7 Ves. 403; 10 Ves. 595.

Words may be supplied in a will to render a sentence complete and intelligible, in aid of the apparent intent to be collected from the whole context. 10 Bac. Abr. 534; 6 East 486. As to supplying words in a will, see 1 Jarman on Wills 428, et seq.; Amb. 122; 13 Ves. 476; 1 Kee. 486; 2 Dowl. & R. 398; 2 Moo. & R. 490. And where words of description of an estate devised are postponed to the end of a clause, it has been held that they might apply to a devise in an earlier portion of it, although gifts are separately made to the devisee. 5 East 87; 10 Rich. Eq. 341; 1 Desaus. 354; 3 Barb. Ch. 488; 6 Gratt. 456; 4 McC. 418; 1 Jarman on Wills 500.

III. If her estate had been absolute, plaintiffs would still be entitled to two-thirds of it, for W. W. Renwick never reduced his wife's share into possession. The facts show that he did not. Spann v. Stewart, 1 Hill Ch. 326, does not apply, for in that case both husband and wife administered. Nor does Wallace v. Boozer, 1 Hill Ch. 393. See 2 Kent 138; Ex parte Elms, 3 Desaus. 155; Id. 135; note, 2 Hill Ch. 644; 1 Spears Eq. 142; Dud. Ch. 238; 4 Strob. L. 463; 2 N. & McC. 147; 12 Ves. 497; 2 Hill 644.

*Mr. R. W. Shand, for defendant, Lyons.

I. J. R. Renwick's claim is barred by statute of limitations.

The rule is to be found in Ang. on Lim., § 174, in Colburn v. Holland, 14 Rich. Eq. 234, and cases cited. A case like this may be found in 4 Rich. Eq. 92. Here the administrator stated his indebtedness and immediately below credited himself with the payment of it all, except to three persons, probably minors.

II. James E. Renwick is likewise barred. He is not entitled to nine months on account of the administrator's death. See argument of Chancellor Wardlaw in 7 Rich. Eq. 40. The limitations prescribed in the Code of Procedure do not apply, (Code, § 96,) because his right of action accrued before the code was passed; when he was still a baby. 3 Rich. 438.

III. Under the will of John Rogers, Mrs. Renwick took an absolute, indefeasible interest in all of the property thereby bequeathed to her.

(1.) It is admitted that this whole estate is personalty. Ad. Eq. *135 and notes; Fletcher v. Ashburton, 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. 563; 8 Rich. Eq. 291.

(2.) Under the first sentence of Section 3 of this will, the property given to Mrs. R. and her children, she having no children at the time, became an estate tail. Wild's case, 6 Co. 17; 6 Rich. Eq. 91. The property bequeathed in the fifth section became a fee conditional. 1 McC. Ch. *60; 9 Rich. Eq. 58. But words which, as to lands, would create a fee conditional, as to personalty give an absolute estate. 6 Term R. 307; 4 Rich. Eq. 378. And fees tail in South Carolina are construed to be fees conditional, and, therefore, as to personalty, fees tail and fees conditional are regarded as absolute estates. Bail Eq. *351.

(3.) These positions are conceded, but it is contended in reply that she, where it last occurs in Section 3, means she and her children; and that the third and fifth clauses must be construed together, and then governed by principle of Read v. Snell and Henry v. Archer.

a. The case in first Desaus. 355, relied on, is a good illustration of true rule as to first point: it must be a "palpable mistake." But see 4 McC. 418; 6 Munf. 114; 1 Brev. 414; 1 Jarman on Wills 432; Id. 745, Rule 19.

*b. The mistake on the second point arises from looking for his actual intent, whereas we can only ascertain his legal intent. O'Hara on Wills, ch. II., § 5.

(4.) All property is acquired by descent (which is by operation of law) or by purchase (which is by act of the parties.) Where they coincide, descent prevails. Where property is taken by descent, the heir takes only that which is left by the first taker.

A devisee takes by direct devise, or by implication, (and implications are necessary or not,) and in the construction of a will the legal intent must govern. Bail. Eq. 517.

(5.) But intention is ascertain by certain fixed rules. 2 Jarman on Wills 739; 2 McC. Ch. 70, et seq.; Doug. 78; 3 T. R. 85; 5 Id. 323; 2 M. & S. 455; 5 B. & Ad. 129; O'Hara on Wills 29, ch. II., p. 29; 1 Brev. 414.

(6.) What are these certain rules?

Rule 3, in Sm. on R. & P. Prop. 776, reads: "An express disposition, though probably involving an oversight or mistake by the testator, cannot be controlled by inference which is not necessary or indubitable." In 2 Jarman on Wills 740 are twenty-four rules of construction, of which—

"XI. That, in general, implication is admissible only in the absence of, and not to control an express disposition."

"V. That the heir is not to be disinherited without an express devise or necessary implication: such implication importing not natural necessity, but so strong a probability that an intention to the contrary cannot be supposed." 5 Pick. 536; 18 How. 385.

See, to same effect, 11 Rich. Eq. 198. The following authorities fully sustain and explain these rules: Right v. Sidebotham, Doug. 730; 8 T. R. 64; 14 Ves. 364; 1 Jarman on Wills 465, 477. These principles have been repeatedly recognized in the courts of South Carolina. 4 McC. 60; Bail. Eq. 298; 3 Rich. Eq. 559; 9 Rich. Eq. 58; Bail. Eq. 351; 2 McM. 472; 9 East 267. For definition of necessary implication, see 4 Bro. C. C. 534; Mer. 219.

(7.) Another rule of construction is, that every part of the will must stand by itself, if possible. Rule 15, in Sm. on R. & P. Prop. 776. Rule 22, 2 Jarman on Wills 745, and 2 Williams on Ex'rs 929. For authorities, see

4 B. & C. 667; 1 Salk. 239; *9 East. 272; 2 Ves., Sr., 216; 8 Rich. Eq. 259. The cases cited on the other side (5 East 87; 4 McC. 418; 10 Rich. Eq. 341; Bail. Eq. 40; 5 Rich. 423; 2 B. & C. 680,) do not militate against these positions.

(8.) Other rules may be referred to, particularly those in 2 Jarman on Wills 740, which are numbered 12 (sustained by 4 B. & C. 667, and 9 East 272), 16 (sustained by 3 Pick. 363), and 18 (sustained by 3 Myl. & Cr. 584.) A will almost exactly like John Rogers' will has been lately construed by the Supreme Court of Virginia, and our construction sustained. See Barksdale v. White, 3 L. & E. Rep. 444, No. 14, April 4th, 1877; and see Id. 190.

(9.) Apply these rules to the construction of John Rogers' will, and we will find a fee tail and an absolute estate in Section 3, and a fee conditional in Section 5; all of which, the property being personal, the law regards as absolute and indefeasible.

IV. W. W. Renwick's marital rights attached to his wife's share in her father's estate before her death in January, 1850.

In all of the cases relied upon to sustain the contrary, (16 Ves. 416; 3 Desaus. *155; Bail. Eq. 204; 2 Hill Ch. *644; Dud. Eq. 238; 1 N. & McC. *147; Spears Eq. *143; 4 Strob. L. 463;) the property was unreduced choses in action, unpartitioned chattels, or the husband had no right to receive the money, as in 2 Hill Ch. *644.

The decision in Baker v. Hall, 12 Ves. 497, evidently referred to that which remained after the part had been disposed of, and did not include the money realized from the sale of that part. This is the conclusion of Judge O'Neall. 1 Hill Ch. *333; and see 1 Williams on Ex'rs *734.

Chancellor Kent, in the sentence cited, (2 Kent. *138,) is speaking of "her property in action," as the context shows. But as to money received, the marital rights do attach to the extent of the wife's share. 1 Hill Ch. *333. In Wardlaw v. Gray, 2 Hill Ch. *653, the case of Spann v. Stewart, is approved, when the assets are wasted. What is wasting the assets? 2 Williams on Ex'rs *1765, and Ram on Assets *495.

The complaint charges a wasting of assets. The purchases by Renwick were paid at maturity. 6 S. C. 490; Dud. Eq. 30; *17 E. C. L. R. 343; 2 Williams on Ex'rs *1124, *1128. The presumption is that all the notes were paid at maturity, (2 Hill Ch. *146,) and paid to W. W. Renwick. 3 Rich. Eq. 341. The purchases by Renwick exceeded his wife's share.

January 27th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. This action is by the personal representatives of a devisee under the will of John Rogers, for an account against the administrators of W. W. Renwick and C. S. Beard, who took out letters of administration cum testamento annexo on the estate of the testator, John Rogers, the executor named in his will having renounced the executorship, and against the administrator of James Rogers.

The first question to be considered is whether the demand is barred by the statute of limitations. The Circuit decree holds that the plaintiff, James E. Renwick, is not barred, but that the plaintiff, J. R. Renwick, was so barred. The plaintiff, J. R., excepts to this decision, and the defendants to that holding that J. E. is not barred. The question is whether there was such a termination of the office and duty of the administrators that the plaintiffs were bound to bring action within the time limited by the statute after such termination. The only evidence of such a fact is the circumstance that an account was presented to the Ordinary, intended, no doubt, as a full and final account, to which is appended the following note:

"Court of Ordinary, 18th August, 1851.

"Personally appeared before me W. W. Renwick, administrator of John Renwick, with the will annexed, who proves their return by his own oath, but produces no vouchers. B. Johnston, O. U. D."

It does not appear that the plaintiffs were cited to an accounting, or that they had notice of the filing of the account, nor that the administrators cum testamento annexo ever filed their vouchers, or that the Ordinary passed upon the accounts or made any decree in the matter. It is clear that this was not a final discharge of the duties incident to administration. It was part of the duty

Filing an account is not in itself a compliance with the whole of this duty. It is at most furnishing the basis of the accounting, the object of the accounting being to verify or falsify its statements. To make that accounting final, it was necessary that the parties entitled to question the account filed should have an opportunity afforded them, by proper notice, to exercise that right, and that final action should be taken on the account by the Ordinary. This was not done; and the administrators cum testamento annexo, as represented by their administrators, must be considered as not having discharged themselves of the duty of accounting. Under this view, the statute of limitations cannot be regarded as having barred either of the plaintiffs, and the decree is, in that respect, erroneous.

The authorities bearing on the conclusions just presented will now be considered. Riddle v. Riddle, 5 Rich. Eq. 32. In this case, one of the questions was as to the commencement of the statute to run upon an administrator's accounting. Chancellor Dunkin says: "If an ex parte return to the Ordinary, in which an executor or administrator strikes a balance against the estate, should be regarded as a discharge of his trust, from which the statute would run, as against a bill to account, it would be an alarming disclosure, as well to creditors as to legatees and distributees of the deceased." It was held that the trust continuing, the statute was not a bar. Miller v. Alexander, 1 Hill Eq. 25. In this case it was held that even a decree of the Ordinary, taken ex parte, was not binding on the parties as an estoppel; that, to make it binding as an estoppel, it should appear that there was a proceeding either upon citation or the voluntary submission of the parties sought to be bound thereby. The result of this decision is to hold that the duty of accounting was not fully performed, even where there had been an actual accounting, and a decree based upon it, as affecting parties entitled to notice of such accounting, and who had not received such notice, or expressly waived their rights. That duty being still obligatory, administration was still existing, and the statute did not run. Long v. Cason, 4 Rich. Eq. 60. In this case the authority of Miller v. Alexander was recognized, but the question of the *statute of limitations then raised depended on the fact that the guardian had been removed and a new guardian appointed, so that the statute commenced to run in favor of the guardian removed, and against the new guardian at the time of removal. It was held that this was such a termination of the trust that the statute had then commenced to run. Crosby v. Crosby, 1 S. C. 337. The decision in this case is entirely consistent with the foregoing, although the question of the statute of limitations went off on the ground that the administrator, being also guardian of the infant plaintiff, he could not take advantage of the statute, when, in his character of guardian, he was chargeable with whatever delay had occurred.

The currency of the statute does not necessarily depend upon the fact of a full and final discharge of the duty of the administration. It commences to run when it appears that the administration has done some act, brought to the notice of the parties affected by it, equivalent to an abandonment of such office, although such act may be in itself wrongful. But the case before us presents no such state of things. The only question raised is whether the office and duty of the administrator ceased by a full discharge of all its duties at a certain time, and that question has already been disposed of.

The next question is, what estate did Rosannah P. Renwick take under the will of John Rogers? The question, as presented to us, assumes that the entire distributable estate is to be regarded as personalty, and the will will be considered in its bearing on personal property alone. The third paragraph of the will is a gift of personalty and realty to Rosannah P. Renwick "and her children." She had no child born alive prior to the death of the testator. The bequest imports an immediate gift to children, and as there was no child to take as purchaser at the death of the testator, children born after that event could only take by descent, as issue. Hence, as it regards realty, the devise imported a fee conditional. As it regards personalty, the condition attached to the fee, viz., that the estate should descend to the issue of the first taker, per formam doni, was impossible, as the law did not permit such a descent in the case of personalty, and as the condition was a condition subsequent, following the ordinary rule *as to conditions subsequent, the fee, unburdened of the condition, remained absolute. This would give Rosannah P. an absolute estate in the personalty. The foundation of the conclusion just stated is in the first resolution in Wild's case. 6 Coke's R. 17. The doctrine has been uniformly applied in this state. It will only be necessary to cite Shearman v. Angel, Bail. Eq. 351 [23 Am. Dec. 166], and Henry v. Archer, Bailey Eq. 535, with the observation that the exposition of the doctrine of the last-named case that appears in Hay v. Hay, 4 Rich. Eq. 384, is essential to a correct understanding of the true result of that case. Under the third paragraph standing alone there is no limitation over on the failure of issue, and therefore no mode of referring to the intricacies that are found in the cases growing out of the different views that have been taken of the effect of a limitation over both, upon the character of the first estate and the sense of the terms by which it is created. But it is contended that the last portion of the third paragraph be read as follows: "And at that time," meaning the death of the testator, "she and her children are to receive an equal part," &c. The proposition is that the words "and her children" should be interpolated after the word "she" as the words stand in the will, so as to read in the manner just recited. It is obvious that such an interpolation would not help the sense of that paragraph. The testator must be regarded as using these words immediately prior to his death, and as at that time there was no child of Rosannah in esse, and as he must be regarded as intending an immediate devise at his death to children, such disposition could not take effect except by taking children to mean issue, who could take by descent. It will not be necessary to follow the elaborate argument of counsel upon the grounds for correcting the expressions of a will by the underlying intent gathered from other parts of the will. But it will not be amiss to remark that much of the uncertainty that exists as to the application of the various authorities on the subject arises from overlooking the fact that the rules of interpreting technical words, used in a will, have been applied to phrases and connected expressions as importing some known mode of disposition. Technical words, even when employed in a will, are to be taken in the technical sense as their primary sense, and such sense must *be corrected, if at all, by finding the testator's glossary or controlling intention in the context. Certain forms of expression employed by testators have been placed upon the same ground as technical words in this respect, and in their primary sense, considered as formula, must be taken to have the meaning imputed to them by the adjudicated cases, and the correction of the apparent sense must be reached under the rules applicable to technical words already referred to.

It is also contended that certain words employed in the fifth paragraph of the will are to be read as qualifying the gift in the third paragraph, by limiting over the estate there given upon the condition of Rosannah dying without leaving children. The portion of the fifth paragraph in question reads as follows: "The rest and residue of my other property to be sold and divided in four equal parts among my aforesaid children; and if any of my daughters should die without leaving children, their property hereby given to be divided into four equal parts," etc. The will thus disposes of these parts. In the first place this purports to be a residuary clause, and the words "hereby given" must be regarded, in the first instance, as referring to that property which is directly disposed of under the residuary clause. That property is characterized by the word "other," which, when used in a residuary clause, naturally excludes all property the subject of prior express devises in the preceding parts of the will. Grammatical considerations must be of undoubted actual force to undo this sense; if at best they are conjectural, the primary sense of the terms remains. It will not be necessary to consider how the clause may be affected by its grammatical relation to its immediate antecedent as a conclusive argument, for allowing "other" to have its ordinary force is found in the character of the express dispositions. If the devises that precede the residuary clause are carefully examined, it will be found that they leave undisposed of an undivided one-fourth part of the entire estate, real and personal, after deducting specific devises and bequests, and to this undisposed-of interest the residuary clause must be regarded as intended to be applied. This construction finds a necessary office for such a residuary clause as this purports on its face to be, and thus affords the highest ground for the construction *already represented. It must be concluded that the limitation over contained in the fifth paragraph is inapplicable to the bequest contained in the third paragraph.

The remaining question arises upon the facts that the husband of Rosannah P. administered with the will annexed on the estate of the testator and converted the estate into cash, and that during his administration and during the life of his wife, he wasted the assets of the estate, and finally that he survived his wife. This fact of wasting the assets is set up in the seventh clause of the complaint, and its force is not destroyed by anything that is presented in the case. The plaintiffs can only claim as the distributees of their mother, as it regards the property of which she took an absolute estate, as already determined. Claiming through their mother, they can only claim what she could have claimed had she survived her husband. She could not have claimed compensation out of her husband's estate at large on the ground that he had wasted assets appertaining to her personal estate, which he had the right to reduce to possession. Spann v. Stewart, 1 Hill Ch. 326; Wardlaw v. Gray, 2 Hill Ch. 644. The cases in this state all hold that the right of a distributee, as against the administrator upon whom the title to the personalty devolves by law, is a mere chose in action, until perfected through the act of the administrator. Spann v. Stewart, supra; Sturgineger v. Hannah, 2 N. & McC. 147. The same rule is applied to a legatee and the executor, the legatee having a mere chose in action until assent to the legacy by the executor. Cannon v. Ulmer, Bail. Eq. 204.

As such, there must be a reduction to possession under the marital rights before such chose passes out of the estate of the wife. Where the husband, as administrator or executor, gets possession of the estate out of which his wife is entitled, as distributee or legatee, there is no reduction to possession as long as that estate remains specifically in the hands of such executor, or administrator, or in some form in which it can be identified as appertaining to the decedent's estate, and neither the payment of debts, nor assent, distribution or partition has been made. But no case holds that after the decedent's estate has gone out of the possession of the executor, either the wife or her representatives can hold the estate of her deceased husband *amenable to make good her interest in assets wasted, while the authority of the cases already cited for the purpose is directly to the contrary. It would be manifestly inconsistent to allege at the same time that the husband had not reduced her choses to possession, and that he had appropriated and wasted them.

It is clear that the plaintiffs are not entitled to an account for any portion of the estate derived from their mother, through the third paragraph of the will.

The decree must be reversed and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court for proceedings conformable herewith.

Decree reversed.

(Case No. 688.)

THE STATE, ex rel. DOUGLAS & JACKSON, v. P. C. GAILLARD, County Treasurer.

(November Term, 1878.)

An act of the legislature, approved December 24th, 1878, (16 Stat. 785), provided a mode by which alone should be determined the right of a taxpayer to discharge taxes due the state in funds, currency or bank-bills not authorized by the tax act to be received in payment of such taxes, and deprived the courts of the right to adjudicate the question under proceedings by mandamus: Held—

[1. Constitutional Law ⟸55.]

That the deprivation was not in conflict with Article IV, Section 4, of the state constitution; but that the legislature had the power to determine to what cases the judicial power conferred by this section of the constitution should extend. State v. County Treasurer, 4 S. C. 520, followed. McIver, A. J., assenting only because of the former adjudication: Haskell, A. J., concurring in the result, upon the ground that the act in question afforded an adequate remedy.

That taking away the remedy by mandamus did not impair the obligation of the contract made by the State of South Carolina with holders of the bills of the bank of the State of South Carolina.†

*This was an original application to the Supreme Court, by Douglass & Jackson, for a rule requiring P. C. Gaillard, county treasurer for Charleston county, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue to compel him, as county treasurer, to receive certain bills of the Bank of the State of South Carolina, tendered by them, in payment of their taxes. The respondent then moved to discharge such rule to show cause, for the reason that the right to issue a writ of mandamus in such cases had been taken away from the courts by the provisions of an act of the legislature of this state, approved December 24th, 1878, entitled "An act to facilitate the collection of taxes."

March 3d, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. A rule has been made requiring the respondent to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, compelling him, as county treasurer, to receive the bills of the bank of the state in payment of taxes due the state by the relators. The respondent now moves to discharge the rule to show cause, on the ground that, by a recent statute of this state, the right to resort to such a remedy in such cases has been taken away. The question is, then, whether the respondent shall be held to make return to such rule, or the rule be discharged. The grounds upon which the relator claims that the respondent should make return to the rule are:

1. That this court has a constitutional jurisdiction to issue the writ in all cases in which it was issuable at the adoption of the constitution in 1868, which cannot be taken away by any act of the legislature; and, 2d, that the rule seeks to enforce a contract between the State of South Carolina and the relators, by which the state bound itself to permit the relator to discharge its taxes, chargeable against them, by tender and payment in the bills of the bank of the state; and, therefore, that the act of legislature *attempting to take away the remedy, by mandamus for enforcing such duty specifically, is invalid, under the constitution of the United States, as tending to impair the obligation of a contract. It must be assumed, for the purposes of this preliminary motion, that the right of the relators rests upon a contract with the state; whether such is the actual fact cannot be determined until the respondent shall make return, and it is the object of this motion to ascertain whether he is bound to make such a return. The act in question (16 Stat. 785) contains the following provision: "And no writ of mandamus shall be granted or issued from any court directing or compelling the receipt for taxes of any funds, currency or bank-bills not authorized to be received for such taxes." It is conceded that the act under which the tax was levied did not authorize bills of the bank of the state to be received in discharge of taxes levied under it. The act containing the foregoing provision refusing the writ of mandamus in such cases, gives a remedy by action applicable to cases where taxes are improperly claimed, very greatly enlarging the common law remedy in such cases. If by law the relators were entitled to discharge the amount of their taxes by the payment of the bills of the bank of the state, then the only remedy they needed to enforce their contract was in their own hands, namely, a tender of such bills. Upon such tender the taxes became satisfied. If, after that, the state should attempt to enforce the same tax as a subsisting right, it would clearly be a case of trespass merely, not involving the contract except incidentally, and the statute remedy would apply to it.

The first question is whether the force and effect of the following language of the constitution, establishing the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court (Article IV., Section 4,) viz.: "The said court shall always have power to issue writs of injunction, mandamus, quo warranto, habeas corpus, and such other original and remedial writs as may be necessary to give it a general supervisory control over all other courts in this state," confers on this court power at all times to issue writs of mandamus in all cases in which they had been issued at and before the adoption of such constitutional enactment. If so, it was clearly beyond the com*petency of the legislature to take away such authority, and the act in question must be regarded as invalid.

This question has been substantially decided by this court in the case of State v. County Treasurer, 4 S. C. 520. In that case a construction was put upon similar language contained in Section 15 of the same article conferring jurisdiction on the Circuit Court. The legislature had declared that the writ of prohibition should not be issued to stay the collection of taxes, (14 Stat. 367), and it was contended that such enactment was in violation of the constitutional grant of jurisdiction to the Circuit Court, conveyed in these words: "They shall have power to issue writs of mandamus, prohibition, scire facias, and all other writs which may be necessary for carrying their powers fully into effect." This court then held that this was a grant of judicial power merely, and did not remove from the legal legislature the power of determining to what cases that judicial power should extend. It is clear that the language of the constitution, as it regards the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, does not essentially differ from that conferring jurisdiction on the Circuit Court, as it regards the present question. We see no ground to change this conclusion. It is clear that no such legislative restriction is expressed, nor is it in any proper sense a necessary implication, as the primary object of the clause, namely, a deposit of judicial authority in the Supreme Court adequate to reach to all the cases that may arise under the laws of the nature embraced in it, is accomplished without the aid of any such implication. No implication made out argumentatively on probable ground is authority for diminishing the full measure of authority imported by the gift of plenary legislative power to the general assembly in Article II., Section 1, of the constitution. We must conclude that the statute on which the respondent relies did not encroach on the constitutional powers of the court in the manner here contended.

The next question is, whether such statute tended to violate the obligations of the contract alleged between the State and the relators by taking away the remedy by mandamus. Under the view taken of the present question, it is not necessary to determine whether, under any circumstances, mandamus was to be considered a remedy for enforcing the alleged contract obligations, *on the idea that such contract would, from its nature, be self-executing through the legal effect of tender under it. The question will be discussed upon the assumption that it is to be regarded as such a remedy in the contract. All the authorities agree that mandamus is not a writ of right, but may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, be refused on the ground of public convenience. State, ex rel. Shiver, v. Comptroller-General, 4 S. C. 185. The limits of that discretion do not appear to be well defined; but it is clear that on general principles it is competent for the legislature to define the conditions on which it shall be granted or withheld consistently with the nature of the writ, as resting in sound discretion. As was said in McIver v. State, 2 S. C. 1, it is now regarded as an ordinary remedy for the relator, in the cases where properly issuable, modifying to some extent the view that was originally taken of it. The question still remains, is it a remedy to which the relators were absolutely entitled at the date of their alleged contract, or as it regards each case that may arise, conditional and dependent on the will of the legislature. If, in general, it belongs to the last-named class, then to make good the relator's position they would have to show, not only that the legislature bound themselves by the alleged contract to allow all existing remedies for its enforcement, according to their recognized nature and characteristics, but that they had actually changed the nature of the writ of mandamus so as, in effect, to make it a writ of right in the relator's special favor. Although mandamus to enforce a public duty in which an individual has an interest is, when allowable, regarded as a remedy permitted to such individual, yet it not only proceeds in the name of the state, but in the right of the state also. The principle on which the common law allowed remedies upon contracts was compensatory alone. Specific remedies on contracts were afforded by the courts of equity, in certain defined cases, on equitable principles alone.

The present remedy cannot be brought under the last-named class. Obligations imposed upon public officers for the benefit of individuals, were subject to the general rule of the common law, as to the nature of the proper remedies. If a public officer does any act of wrong to the damage of an individual, the in*jured party has his remedy by an action for damages. If such officer refuses to perform an act, which, by law, he ought to perform, and in which an individual has a special interest, and damage is sustained to such right, an action for such damage lies. In addition to these remedies, the state has an exclusive right to compel specifically the performance of public duties on the part of public officers, or persons exercising public powers, in the interest of good government. Formerly, the king exercised this right through mandamus. Considered as a prerogative writ, at present with us, the state stands in the relation in which the king formerly stood. The state thus having a clear judicial remedy in virtue of its sovereignty, and the individual having at common law a right to a compensating remedy merely, it has been the practice for the state to allow the relator to use its right as a means of more effectually enforcing his individual rights. To say that such practice has grown into an absolute and unqualified right in individuals, standing on the same footing as a writ of right, is to deny the principles on which mandamus is founded, and to contradict the authority of all the cases in which the nature of the writ has been carefully considered. As the individual cannot claim, in his own right, a specific remedy of this nature, and must depend upon a concession of the right to use a remedy that primarily belongs to the state alone, in virtue of its sovereignty, he is to take that remedy in subordination to the will of the state, which may grant or withhold it at pleasure. This result is not only necessary to satisfy the principles on which the remedy by mandamus is administered, but vital to the public welfare. Cases can be readily conceived where allowing the actual exercise of governmental powers to be controverted by an individual might be highly detrimental to the public interest, as, for instance, in times of public danger or disorder. If the specific enforcement of a public act is regarded by the legislature as detrimental to the public interests, there is no sound reason why the state should be compelled to lend its name and right of procedure to an individual in order to give him a better remedy than he is entitled to, on the principles of the common law. There is no authority that compels us to depart so far from the original nature of mandamus as to place it among the remedies to *which the relator has a strict right. The results indicated are in harmony with the conclusion of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Tennessee v. Snead, 96 U. S. 69 [24 L. Ed. 610], though the reasonings that lead to that conclusion in that case are derived from a different view of the question.

The rule should be discharged.

HASKELL, A. J. I concur in the opinion that the act of the legislature impairs no obligation, and that it affords an adequate remedy, and think that (apart from the section inhibiting mandamus) good reason why the extraordinary remedy should be refused. I concur in the result.

McIVER, A. J. I concur in the conclusion reached in this case, but desire to state very briefly my reasons. As to the first question discussed by the Chief Justice, viz., whether this court has been deprived of the power to issue a writ of mandamus in a case of this kind, by virtue of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to facilitate the collection of taxes," approved December 24th, 1878, if it were res integra, I should feel compelled to dissent, but as I regard the question settled by the case of State v. County Treasurer, 4 S. C. 520, I am bound to yield my opinion to this express adjudication, which, until it is reversed, is as binding upon me as if I agreed to every proposition which it announced.

As the question, however, is one of the gravest importance, involving the boundary line between two of the departments of the government—the legislative and the judiciary—it may not be amiss for me to state, in a very few words, the grounds of my dissatisfaction with the conclusion which this case compels us to adopt. There is no doubt but that, under Article I., Section 2, of the constitution, the legislative power of the state is vested in the general assembly, but there is as little doubt that this is not a grant of complete and absolute legislative power, but only of such as is not forbidden by the terms of the constitution of the United States, or of this state, either in express words or by necessary implication. Hence, when the inquiry arises whether any particular act of the general assembly is within the scope of *the powers granted to that body, the only question necessary to be considered is whether such act is forbidden, either in express terms or by necessary implication, by any provision of the constitution of the United States or this state; for if it is not so forbidden, then such act has the full force and effect of law; but if it is so forbidden, then it has no such force and effect, and must be declared to be unconstitutional, and therefore void. It will not be denied that where certain powers are, by the constitution of the state, vested in one of the departments of the government or any officer of such department, the general assembly is as effectually forbidden from taking away such powers from such department or such officer as if the constitution had in express words forbidden their doing so. Now, by Article IV., Section 4, of the constitution, it is provided, amongst other things that the Supreme Court "shall always have power to issue writs of injunction, mandamus," &c. Observe that the language is not, as in some other sections of the constitution, shall have jurisdiction in cases of mandamus, &c., which might imply, as is argued in State v. County Treasurer, supra, that this clause was only designed to give the court jurisdiction in this class of cases when they arise under the laws enacted by the general assembly, but do not perpetuate the writs there mentioned, or the power of the court to issue such writs, but the language is "shall always have power to issue writs of injunction, mandamus," &c. This language, it seems to me, confers special powers upon the court in express words, no one of which can be taken away or abridged by the general assembly any more than any other or all of the powers conferred upon the court. By the same section the Supreme Court is invested with appellate jurisdiction "in cases of chancery," and that expression has been held in Sullivan v. Thomas, 3 S. C. 531, to mean all such cases as were cognizable by the courts of equity of the state existing at the adoption of the constitution. For, as was said in that case, at page 546, "It must be premised that the jurisdiction of this court, so far as it was ascertained and fixed by the constitution, is unaffected by the provisions of the code of procedure or any other statute law. Again, the terms employed to mark out that

So it seems to me that when, in this same section, the Supreme Court is invested with the power to issue writs of mandamus, it must mean that it should have power to issue such writ in all such cases as it was the appropriate remedy at the time of the adoption of the constitution; and that the general assembly has no more authority to deny to the court the right to issue such writ in any case in which it was then the appropriate remedy than it would have to deny its right to hear an appeal in any particular case or class of cases in chancery, or to deny its right to exercise any other of the powers granted to it by the constitution. If the general assembly has the power to deprive the court of its right to issue the writ of mandamus in one particular case, no reason can possibly be suggested why it may not do so in any other case, or in all cases; and if so, then the result would be that the court would be entirely stripped of one of the powers expressly granted to it by the constitution. Such a result surely cannot be brought about by an act of the general assembly.

Again, by Article III., Section 2, of the constitution, the governor is invested with the pardoning power. I do not see why, upon the same principle that it is held that the general assembly may take away from the Supreme Court the power to issue the writ of mandamus in one particular case, they may not take away from the governor the power to grant a pardon in some particular case; and if in one case, then in all, and thus defeat this provision of the constitution altogether. In the one case the power to issue the writ of mandamus is expressly granted, just as in the other the power to grant pardons.

If the general assembly can in the one case limit the power granted by confining its exercise to certain particular cases, I am at a loss to perceive any reason why it may not do so in the other.

It must be conceded that, not only at the time of the adoption of the constitution, but also at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in this case, mandamus was the appropriate remedy in the case made by the petition of the relators, and that the Supreme Court then had the power, conferred by the constitution of the state, to enforce by writ of mandamus the rights *claimed by the relators, if established according to law. What is there now to prevent the court from exercising such power? Will it do to say that the court is prevented from exercising a power expressly conferred by the constitution by an act of the general assembly forbidding the exercise of such power? If so, then, it must necessarily follow that an act of the general assembly has the effect of repealing or abrogating a provision of the constitution, a conclusion which no one will accept. For as the court undoubtedly once had the power in question, and had it by virtue of an express grant in the constitution, and as the only thing relied upon as depriving the court of such power is the act of the general assembly of 24th December, 1878, it must follow either that the court still has the power to issue the writ of mandamus, or that this power thus conferred by the constitution has been taken away by the act of the general assembly above mentioned. These views do not by any means involve the idea that the general assembly may not by appropriate legislation regulate the form of the remedy or the practice in administering it. This they may undoubtedly do, as there is nothing in the constitution which can be regarded as prohibiting such an exercise of legislative power. But when it is proposed by a simple act of the general assembly to destroy or abrogate a remedy provided for by the constitution by denying to this court the right to exercise a power expressly granted by the constitution, it is difficult for me to understand how the constitutionality of such legislation can be vindicated. But, as I have said above, I regard this question as concluded by the decision in the case of State v. County Treasurer, and as long as that decision stands unreversed I am compelled to yield my convictions to an absolute decision of the court of last resort. For this reason, and this alone, I concur in the conclusion reached as to the first question discussed in this case. As to the other question, I am quite content to rest the conclusion upon the reasoning employed in the opinion of the CHIEF JUSTICE.

Rule discharged.

Before Aldrich, J., at Edgefield, June Term, 1878.

The defendant was indicted for murder. There was a deficiency of twenty jurors, and the "five-mile apartment" being exhausted the deficiency was ordered to be supplied from the "other apartments." From the affidavit of the jury-commissioner, made after the trial, it appeared that the board in drawing from the other apartment did not confine themselves to the names of such persons as lived within five miles of the court-house. The sheriff summoned these jurors by verbal order. No venire was issued. Before the panel was complete, a recess was taken, during which a juror sworn in the case, was heard to say that he was opposed to hanging anybody, because he himself might be hanged some day. When the recess was over, this was reported to the court; and the juror, being interrogated by the judge, repeated what he had said. The juror was not resworn on his voir dire, but was discharged, to which appellant objected, on the ground that it was too late to raise any objection to the juror. The appellant exercised his right of twenty challenges, and made no application for another.

*After the testimony was closed, the appellant's attorney raised, at the beginning of his argument, the point that the court had no right to pass the order for the twenty additional jurors; and if so, that they should be such as lived within five miles of the court-house, and that no venire was issued for them. These objections were deferred and made afterwards in arrest of judgment, together with the objection as to discharging the juror; and they were severally overruled.

The defendant was convicted and sentenced to be hanged.

An appeal was taken to this court upon the following grounds:

1. That the court erred in overruling motion to arrest judgment in the said case, when the said motion was made upon the following grounds, to wit: The jury that tried the said case was not drawn, summoned and impaneled according to law in such cases made and provided.

2. That after a juror had been called and not objected to by either the state or the prisoner, and sworn to try the case, he was ordered to stand aside, without being examined upon his voir dire, and the prisoner was, under the circumstances, allowed only twenty challenges.

Mr. B. W. Bettis, Jr., for appellant.
Mr. Solicitor Abney, for respondent.

March 3d, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The appellant alleges irregularities in the drawing, summoning and impaneling of the petit jury. It does not appear that there was any challenge to the array or to the poll, but the jurors were sworn without objection. So far as the present objection is raised on matters not appearing on the record, and such as could only be brought to the notice of the court by proof beyond the record of the facts alleged, it cannot be considered on appeal, for the want of objection and exception in due time. It is too late to allege such defects, either in the panel or in individual jurors, after the swearing of the jury. State v. Williams, 2 Hill 381; King v. Hunt, 2 B. & Ald. 430; Queen v. Hepbam, 7 Cranch 290 [3 L. Ed. 348]; Amherst v. Hadley, 1 Pick. 39.

*Where the defect appears upon the record, it may be the subject of a motion in arrest, though not previously objected to, as where there is a fatal defect in the venire, (State v. Dozier, 2 Speers 211; State v. Williams, 1 Rich. 188;) so where a defect in the authority of the court ordering the drawing appears on the record. State v. Jennings, 15 Rich. 42; State v. Pratt, 15 Rich. 47. Relief may, however be granted by the court of original jurisdiction, although such objection was not taken in time, but that relief is in the discretion of the court, and will not be granted unless it appears that the party has been prejudiced by the matters complained of. King v. Hunt, 2 B. & Ald. 430; Hill v. Yates, 12 East 229. In Kennedy v. Williams, 2 N. & McC. 79, a new trial was granted where the objection to a juror could not be taken in due time, as the knowledge of the facts had not come to the party making the objection until after the time had elapsed for making such objection. It will be borne in mind that that court had authority to grant new trials on the grounds that were available in a court of original jurisdiction, whereas this court is limited to the correction of errors of law in such cases, and is clothed with no discretionary power on appeals in such cases. State v. Baily, 1 S. C. 1. But such objection is required (Gen. Stat. 523,) to be taken before the returning of the verdict when it involves irregularity in the venire facias, or in the drawing, returning or impaneling of jurors in order to set aside a verdict, in addition to showing that the party has been prejudiced by such irregularity. So far, then, as the objection of the appellant relates to the proceedings for the drawing, summoning and impaneling of the jury, it cannot be heard, for want of objection and exception in due time.

The appellant objects that the record is defective in not showing that a venire was issued for the summoning of talesmen. In State v. Williams, 2 Hill 381, it was held that a venire could not be issued for talesmen, under the acts of 1731 and 1769. Brev. Dig. 446. The act of 1877 so clearly resembles the portion of the act of 1769 considered by the court, that the decision of the court in State v. Williams may be regarded as equally applicable to the one as to the other of these acts. The conclusion in that case was, that, independent of some statute authority, the *court had no power to issue a venire for talesmen, and that the act relied on furnished no such authority. The act of 1877 confers no such authority, directly or indirectly, but only makes mention of drawing, summoning and returning in connection with duties thereby imposed. The preceding practice, therefore, remained unchanged, and State v. Williams is conclusive authority. This objection must be overruled.

It appears by the record that a juror who had been sworn without objection was set aside by the court on its own motion, and another drawn to fill his place. The ground of such action was the oral admission of the juror, in answer to a question put by the court, that he had said, pending the trial, "that he, the juror, was opposed to hanging anybody, because he, the juror, himself might be hanged some day." Improper language by a juror in a criminal case, indicating hostility to a party on trial before him, has been held good ground for a new trial. State v. Hopkins, 1 Bay 372; see, also, Dent v. Hartford, 2 Salk. 645. It cannot admit of reasonable doubt that if proper evidence of such a fact as would justify the court in granting a new trial, should be brought to the notice of the court during the progress of a criminal trial, a juror might be withdrawn and the trial proceed de novo. We know of no authority, however, for vacating the seat of a juror after he has been sworn, and calling another to occupy his place, by the authority of the court acting on proof of facts occurring beyond the presence of the court. No authority for such practice has been brought to our attention, and on principle it appears subversive of sound practice. It might open the door to the exercise of undue authority on the part of courts.

There must be a new trial, on the ground last stated.

New trial granted.

McIVER and HASKELL, A. J.'s, concurred.

Before Aldrich, J., at York, September Term, 1878.

Susan J. Dunlap executed, in 1860, a sealed note, payable to W. J. Clawson, administrator of J. P. Dunlap, on January 1st, 1862. In 1863 she intermarried with A. E. Hutchinson. Suit was commenced on this note against Hutchinson and wife in February, 1867, by W. J. Clawson. In December, 1877, W. J. Clawson died, and his executors, Thomas W. Clawson and C. E. Spencer, by proper order, became the plaintiffs.

At the trial the defendant, A. E. Hutchinson, requested the court to charge the jury—

That the defendant, A. E. Hutchinson, the husband of the defendant, S. J. Hutchinson, is not liable on the note executed by his wife before her marriage, his liability being removed by the provisions of the act of 1870, relating to the rights of married women.

His Honor refused so to charge, and the defendant, A. E. Hutchinson, excepted.

Verdict for plaintiffs.

A. E. Hutchinson appealed to this court, upon the ground that his Honor erred in refusing to charge the jury as requested.

Mr. J. F. Hart, for appellant.

At common law, the husband became liable for the wife's debts, contracted prior to the marriage. Death of husband or wife, or divorce, relieved the husband or his estate. 1 Pars. on Cont. 344.

What was the reason of the law? Because the wife could not be imprisoned for her ante-nuptial debt without her husband.

*Reev. Dom. R. 144–5. Another reason would seem to be, that the person of the wife, as well as her goods and chattels, was merged in the husband.

The husband's liability for the wife's debt was not in the nature of a contract with her creditor. If so, his estate would have been liable after his death. "The debt is not transferred to him." Id.

If his liability is not by contract, then he became liable merely because the remedy upon her contract could not be applied, except by joint suit against the husband and wife; and, consequently, a joint judgment resulted. In no case could the wife be sued alone. The husband's liability—existing during coverture only—was only an incident to the remedy.

II. If only an incident to the remedy, it is removed by Article XIV., Section 8, of the constitution, and the act of 1870. Gen. Stat. 482; 14 Rich. 134; 7 S. C. 88; which compare with 1 S. C. 352, and see changes wrought by act of 1870.

III. This constitutional provision does not apply only to future debts or marriages. Article I., Section 10, of the Constitution of the United States does not apply, for there is no contract here of the husband; it is only a part of the remedy which may be impaired. Cooley on Const. Lim. 357; Potter's Dwarris on Stat. 471; 13 N. Y. 299; 1 How. 316.

The cases confine the constitutional application to the remedy existing against the contracting party at the time the contract was entered into, and not to such incidental remedies as may afterwards adhere to it. 4 Wheat. 197; 12 Wheat. 213; 2 How. 609; 13 Rich. 129; 2 S. C. 224, 226.

1. There has been no change of the common law rule which makes the husband liable by mere implication.

The liability grew out of the practice which required the *joinder of the husband in an action for the debt, and not out of the doctrine of the marital rights. 2 Bish. on Mar. Wom., § 312; 5 Duer 186. The constitution and act of 1870, standing alone, make no change. Code, § 137.

2. There has been no change of the law by positive enactment. Section 3 of act of 1870, is inoperative because not disclosed in the title to the act. Const. Art. II., § 20; Cooley on Const. Lim. 81–2, 149–50. Its incorporation into Revised Statutes does not cure defect, for they are void so far as they contain new matter. Const., Art. V., § 3; Art. II., §§ 20, 21; 14 Stat. 207.

3. The law discharging the husband from liability is only prospective. Such construction will never be given if another is possible. Sedg. 173; 7 Johns. 499; 5 Duer 186, supra; 13 Rich. 277.

4. The law, if intended to be retrospective, is to that extent, null and void. It would violate Article I., Section 14, of our constitution. Cooley 362; 2 Kern. 202; 5 Duer 192, which is in all respects like the case at bar; 15 Wall. 610.

March 3d, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The question is whether the provisions of the constitution and the statutes passed under it, declaring the rights of married women as to their separate property, destroys the husband's liability for the wife's debts dum sola, where the marriage took place and the action was brought prior to the adoption of the constitution. The note in suit was given by the wife of the defendant dum sola in 1862, and this action was commenced in 1867. The constitution declares "that the real and personal property of a woman held at the time of her marriage, or which she may thereafter acquire, either by gift, grant, inheritance, devise or otherwise, shall not be subject to levy and sale for her husband's debts, but shall be held as her separate property, and may be bequeathed, devised or alienated by her the same as if she were unmarried; provided, that no gift or grant from the husband to the wife shall be detrimental to the claims *of his creditors." Article XIV., Section 8. Under this provision, standing by itself, the husband would still remain subject to his common law liability for the debts of his wife prior to marriage, which would be manifestly unjust after taking from him that interest in his wife's property that was the ground of such common law liability. Accordingly the act of 1870, (14 Stat. 325,) after having re-enacted the enabling features of this constitutional provision and declared in still more full terms the capacity of a married woman to deal with her separate property, adds the following proviso: "Provided, that the husband shall not be liable for the debts of the wife contracted prior to or after their marriage, except for her necessary support." The provisions of the act of 1870 were re-enacted in the General Statutes, page 482.

It is claimed that these provisions acted retrospectively, so as to divest rights of action already acquired under marriages celebrated before the adoption of the constitution. No intention is expressed, as there are no words signifying an intention to impair rights already accrued; if it exists, it must be made out inferentially on principles of construction. Such an enlargement of the expressed sense must not be allowed unless imperatively demanded by the manifest intent of the act, as when it would fail of full efficacy upon any other construction, in which case it would stand on the high ground of a necessary implication. In the present case the equity of the statute is the key of its intent, because the plain object in view was to equalize the rights and liabilities of the husband, which equality had been disturbed by the constitutional provision. This would exclude the idea of depriving the creditor of his acquired right of action where, at the same time such right of action accrued, the husband possessed full and undiminished marital rights as in the case in hand. In Witsell v. Charleston, 7 S. C. 88, the question was whether the wife's equitable interests passed into her legal separate estate, created as such by the constitution, under the words "real and personal property," and the present question was not touched.

The appeal must be dismissed.

Before Kershaw, J., at Spartanburg, March Term, 1878.

In the trial justice's court, a verdict was rendered for plaintiff July 5th, 1877, for "fifty dollars for wagon and harness, or wagon and harness returned to plaintiff, and damages for plaintiff for retention of wagon and harness, twenty dollars." The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court. Defendant appealed to the Circuit Court, where judgment was given plaintiff for $70, with interest from July 5th, 1877, and costs. Defendant then appealed to this court upon the grounds that his Honor erred—

1. In holding that the defendant was liable for property taken by legal process from the plaintiff.

2. In refusing to hold that the plaintiff had shown no cause of action.

3. In failing to make separate findings of law and fact as required by law.

4. Because the damages found were excessive.

5. In refusing to dismiss the complaint and give judgment against the plaintiff for the costs and disbursements of the action.

WILLARD, C. J. On appeal to the Circuit Court from the trial justice's court, judgment was rendered against the defendant for damages for the taking and detention of a wagon and harness from plaintiff. Testimony had been offered tending to show that the defendant had obtained from the plaintiff the wagon and harness in question under the pretext of hiring it to go to a point in North Carolina and return; but in reality to remove it into the State of North Carolina and subject it to process for the recovery of a debt originally due from plaintiff to defendant and his partner in business, and assigned to a person in North Carolina, for the purpose of bringing suit upon it and attaching the property in question. It was for the Circuit judge to determine the force of this testimony, and he has done so, finding for the plaintiff, with damages. All that we can determine is whether any error of law was committed by the Circuit judge.

It was entirely competent in the evidence to find that the hiring was pretensive and fraudulent ab initio. The appellant assumes that the relation of bailor and bailee subsisted between the plaintiff and defendant, and advances propositions of law pertinent to cases arising under that law of relation. It is very clear that there was ground for holding that fraud existed on the part of the bailee sufficient to convert the transaction into a naked trespass ab initio. The relation of bailor and bailee, as a contract relation, depends upon mutuality of understanding and intent. If the defendant sought possession of the property with other objects and intents than those disclosed, there could not be that mutuality of understanding essential to the creation of a relation depending on the contract of the parties to bind the bailor. This doctrine is forcibly exemplified in State v. Lindenthall, 5 Rich. 237 [57 Am. Dec. 743] Judge O'Neall says: "The guilt of one accused of larceny depends upon intention. If such an one obtain the possession of goods by consent of the owner for one purpose, such as hiring or carrying, with intent to steal, and consummate that intention partially or entirely by converting the goods to his own use, he is, beyond doubt, guilty of larceny. This is abundantly shown by Gorman's Case, 2 N. & McC. 90 [10 Am. Dec. 576]; *Thurston's Case, 2 McM. 382." There was no error in rendering judgment for the plaintiff on the facts appearing in evidence.

It is alleged that the judgment is erroneous, as it should have been for the return of the property, and that the value of the property should not have been included in the damages awarded, but assessed separably, so that the value would become part of the damages only in case the property was not returned. The plaintiff had a right to demand either damages for the taking and detention, as in trover for conversion, or the return of the property with damages. The code has not changed the rights of parties in this respect. The provisions of Section 301 of the code apply to a judgment awarding possession of personal property, not to a case where the plaintiff is entitled to general damages. It is for the plaintiff to elect which form of remedy he will pursue. It cannot be objected that the plaintiff's demand in the trial justice's court, being for the recovery of a wagon and harness, and damages for detention thereof, it therefore bound him as an election as to the form of judgment. Whether a complaint in a court of record could have that effect need not be considered, but no such effect can be claimed for informal pleadings in a trial justice's court. The case, then, should proceed to judgment according to the rights of the parties.

The objection to the damages as excessive cannot be considered in this court, as we have frequently held, nor is there any ground for reversal in the fact that the Circuit judge did not state his conclusions of fact and law separately, it not being made to appear that appellant has been prejudiced thereby as it regards the merits of his case.

The judgment below is affirmed.

J. MIMS SULLIVAN v. MARY W. WARE.

Where lands were sold for delinquent taxes, in June, 1872, under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of March 12th, 1872, (15 Stat. 163,) an auditor's deed to the purchaser, made under the provisions of the third section of the same act, is null and void, and conveys no title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1491; Dec. Dig. ⟸746.]

Before Cooke, J., at Greenville, September Term, 1875.

This was an action by J. Mims Sullivan against Mary W. Ware for partition of a tract of land, the greater part whereof was purchased by the plaintiff as the property of the defendant, at a sale made by the county treasurer on June 5th, 1872, for taxes due for the year 1871. The auditor's deed to him bears date June 7th, 1872, and is as follows:

"Whereas, the county auditor of each and every county in the State of South Carolina, is authorized and required, by an act of the general assembly of the state, entitled 'An act to amend an act, entitled "An act providing for the assessment and taxation of property," passed September 15th, 1868, and all acts amendatory thereto,' approved March 12th, 1872, to execute a 'warranty deed' to the purchaser or purchasers of all property forfeited to the state, under the provisions of the said act providing for the assessment and taxation of property, and said other acts amendatory thereto, and sold by the county treasurer under the provisions of said acts:

"Now, therefore, this indenture witnesseth that I, James M. Runion, county auditor of the county of Greenville, in the state aforesaid, of the first part, in consideration of the sum of two hundred and seventy-nine and eighty-two and one-half one-hundredths dollars, good and lawful money of the United States, to me in hand paid by the said J. Mims Sullivan, of the second part, for and in behalf of the State of South Carolina, have granted, bargained, sold and released, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell and release unto the said J. Mims Sullivan

*all that certain lot, tract or parcel of land, bounded and described as follows, (except ten acres,) to wit:

"Twenty-five hundred acres, situate in the county and state aforesaid, in Oak Lawn township, namely, two hundred acres of arable or plow lands, and twenty-three hundred acres of wood, uncultivated and marsh lands, being that body of land which was sold by the county treasurer of Greenville county, on the fifth day of June, A. D. 1872, as the property of Mrs. Ware, wife of T. Edwin Ware, of said county, for taxes, penalties, costs and charges accrued thereon, and purchased at said sale by J. Mims Sullivan, except ten acres as above stated, which will be allotted and surveyed from this body of land for the use and benefit of the said Mrs. Ware, wife of T. Edwin Ware.

"Together with all and singular the rights, members, hereditaments and appurtenances to the said premises belonging, or in any wise incident or appurtenant. To have and to hold all and singular the premises before mentioned (except the ten acres before mentioned) unto the said J. Mims Sullivan, his heirs and assigns forever. And I, James M. Runion, county auditor as aforesaid, do hereby bind the State of South Carolina to warrant and forever defend all and singular the said premises (the ten acres excepted) unto the said J. Mims Sullivan, his heirs and assigns, against the said State of South Carolina, and against every person and all persons whomsoever, lawfully claiming or to claim the same or any part thereof."

On September 2d, 1872, the defendant tendered to the county treasurer the amount of the taxes and costs paid by the purchaser, together with fifty per cent. additional, and demanded that she be allowed to redeem said property under the laws of this state.

The jury found for the defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

Messrs. Cothran & Wells, contra.

March 18th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. According to the view which we take of this *case, it will not be necessary to consider the several requests to charge submitted by the plaintiff at the trial; for we do not think they were pertinent to the case as made, and therefore a refusal to charge them does not constitute such error of law as would warrant the setting aside of the judgment below, even though, abstractly considered, they may not have been free from all legal exception, about which, however, we are not to be understood as expressing any opinion. We confess it somewhat difficult to understand precisely what was meant by the charge to which exception was duly taken. Giving to it, however, the construction claimed for it by the appellant, as the one most favorable to the success of his appeal, that it was practically a charge that the jury should find for the defendant, we think it was not subject to any legal exception. The case of the plaintiff rested upon the validity of the deed from the county auditor as sufficient to vest in him title for the proportion of the land claimed, and we think it was wholly insufficient for that purpose, and therefore an explicit direction to the jury to find a verdict for the defendant would have been fully warranted, as the question of the sufficiency of the deed was a question of law only, under the uncontradicted facts appearing in the case. It was not and could not be pretended that the land was sold as "forfeited" land, the only taxes due thereon being the taxes for 1871. It must, therefore, as the plaintiff himself alleges in his complaint, have been sold for delinquent taxes, and there is no allegation or proof that the land had ever been declared forfeited, as indeed it could not very well have been, if the only taxes in arrear thereon were those for the year 1871, as seems from the auditor's certificate to have been the case, the sale having been made in 1872. Hence, the sale must have been by virtue of the provisions of the fourth section of the act of March 12th, 1872, (15 Stat. 163,) and not by virtue of the provisions of the third section of that act. If so, then it follows that the deed from the county auditor, upon which alone the plaintiff based his claim, was wholly ineffectual to convey any title to him. For while the auditor is authorized to "execute a warranty deed to the purchaser" for any lands sold under the provisions of the third section of the act, there is no such authority conferred upon *him in the case of sales made under the provisions of the fourth section of that act, and his deed, therefore, has no more force and effect than if it had been signed by the sheriff, the coroner or any other county officer.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Before Northrop, J., at Union, June Term, 1876.

The sheriff of Union county, in November, 1875, levied the execution in this case upon two bales of cotton and some seed cotton and corn, of value more than sufficient to satisfy the execution, as the property of the defendant in the execution, such defendant, being an agricultural laborer, owning no lands, and having less than $500 worth of personal property, including the property levied upon. The sheriff returned the property to the defendant as exempted property. The cause of action arose January 1st, 1873.

The sheriff was ruled by the assignee of the plaintiff to show cause why he had failed to make the money; and this appeal is taken from order discharging the rule.

March 5th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The Circuit Court discharged a rule against the sheriff for failure to enforce an execution against personal property, consisting of cotton in bales, seed cotton and corn, the defendant claiming that they are exempt from levy under the provisions of the act of March 13th, 1872, (15 Stat. 229, § 9,) he being an "agricultural laborer." It is stated in appellant's argument, that the contract upon which the judgment was obtained bore date prior to the passage of the act in question, contending that such exemption could not be claimed as against an antecedent contract; but that fact does not appear in the brief, and, therefore, is not available to the appellant. The question to be considered is, whether the legislature could create new subjects of exemption in addition to those enumerated in the constitution. The provisions of the constitution relating to the exemption of personal property from execution, are contained in Article II., Section 32. After providing for a homestead exemption on the land of a debtor, the constitution goes on to say: "To secure the full enjoyment of said homestead exemption to the person entitled thereto, or the head of any family, the personal property of such person of the following character, to wit, household furniture, beds and bedding, family library, arms, carts, wagons, farming implements, tools, neat cattle, work animals, swine, goats and sheep, not to exceed in value, in the aggregate, the sum of five hundred dollars, shall be subject to like exemption as said homestead; and there shall be exempt in addition thereto all necessary wearing apparel." The question is, whether the subsequent attempt to add to the list of articles exempted "one third of the annual products of agricultural laborers" by the act of 1873 was consistent with the provisions of the constitutional enactment, or tended to deny the proper force due to the same; *and if the latter conclusion is reached, such conflicting provisions must be held unconstitutional and void.

This involves a question of intention to be made out constructively on the provisions of the constitution. It is contended that the enumeration of kinds of property intended for exemption is exclusive, and general rules of interpretation are urged as leading to that conclusion. It will not be necessary to resort to such general rules, or to place the decision on any technical rule or reasoning, as the nature of the subject with which the constitution deals, points very distinctly to the solution of the question at issue.

The question of allowing the legislative exemption to debtors is, in its nature, fundamental, as involving an inquiry into the principles of government. Until within a few years it has not been regarded as a legitimate exercise of legislative power to place the property of the debtor beyond the reach of his creditor, except to an inconsiderable extent. Not that the competency of the legislature to make such exemptions independently of constitutional restrictions, was doubted, but because the spirit of the laws was supposed to oppose such exercise of legislative power. It may well be considered that in solving the question of the legitimacy of such legislation, the constitution had in view a limit that should be imposed to its unrestricted exercise. When it is treating of subjects that have been constantly dealt with by legislative bodies, with the sanction of the courts and the community, such an inference does not necessarily arise.

In such cases some special ground would have to appear by inferring, in the absence of an express declaration to that effect, that the constitution, in prescribing the mode in which a power of that class should be exercised, intended to exclude its exercise in any other mode. But in the present case, where the constitution was dealing with a principle fundamental to the policy of our jurisprudence, and which, by its abuse might unsettle the very corner-stone on which that jurisprudence rests, it is obvious that in imposing limits to such power of exemption regard was had to the general question, to what extent government should go in relaxing the laws for the enforcement of obligations. There can be no doubt that the object of the section in question was to *limit the legislature. If the constitution had been silent altogether on the subject, the legislature would have, doubtless, been competent, as affecting future contracts, to create such exemptions, and to give them any measure of extent that might appear desirable.

Again, Article I., Section 20, confers express powers on the legislature to grant homestead exemptions to a reasonable extent, leaving the determination of what is to be regarded as reasonable to the legislature, so far as unfettered by subsequent clauses of that instrument. If that section had stood alone it would leave no doubt as to the power of the legislature being unrestricted. But the constitution was not content with establishing this as a principle, and in Article II., Section 32, assumes to give a more accurate definition of the kind of legislation contemplated in the twentieth section of Article I., enumerating the subjects to which it should extend and the limitations that should be established as affecting these subjects. Such a definition as applied to a kind of legislation not sanctioned at the time of the adoption of the constitution, but introduced by that instrument, must be regarded as intending limitation of the legislative authority. True, it is not the case of a power entirely new and not before capable of being exercised, given upon conditions and subjected to limitations, in which case such conditions and limitations must be regarded as limitations of the right of exercise as well as the mode of exercise; but it is a case within the same principle as calling into exercise a function of general legislation that had lain dormant through the conviction that it was not a legitimate exercise of legislative power consistently with the principles of our jurisprudence. This view leads us to the conclusion that the exemptions allowed by the constitution cannot be extended or restricted by any act of the legislature. This view does not conflict with what was said in Homestead Building and Loan Association v. Enslow, 7 S. C. 20, where, speaking of the degree of authority possessed by the owner of lands in which a homestead might be claimed, to encumber his land, it is said, "whether the legislature had not the right to extend the measures of relief afforded to

tive authority set forth in Article *I., Section 20, of the constitution, need not be considered, for no such exercise of authority beyond the limits of Article II., Section 32, has been attempted." This is a question suggested, with no answer to it given; but it was not directed to the question whether the legislature could afford relief beyond the limits imposed by the constitution, but a more full relief within those limits. We must conclude that the provisions of the act of 1873, so far as they attempt to extend the exemption to a class of personal property not embraced in Article II., Section 32, are unconstitutional and void. The discharge of the rule must be set aside, and the cause remanded for proceedings conformable herewith.

Before Mackey, J., at Oconee, March Term, 1878.

plaintiff, and disallowed defend*ant's counter claim, although reporting, as a conclusion of fact, that "defendant was damaged by the misrepresentations of the plaintiff in the sum of twenty-five dollars." Defendant appealed, upon the ground that he was "entitled to set up his counter claim for damages sustained by reason of the breach of plaintiff's warranty," and that it should have been allowed.

McIVER, A. J. In this case the plaintiff brought his action upon an account, to which the defendant pleaded a counter claim, based upon the allegation that he had paid to plaintiff $25 for an ox, which the plaintiff warranted as fit for the purpose for which it was bought, which warranty was alleged to have been broken. For this breach of warranty the defendant claimed damages as a counter claim, and the only question raised here is whether the defendant could set up such a counter claim to the plaintiff's action. There is no pretence that the cause of action upon which the counter claim was based arose "out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim," nor is there any pretence that it was connected with the subject of the action.

If, therefore, it is sustainable at all, it must be under the second subdivision of Section 173 of the code of procedure, as being a cause of action arising on contract. It seems that there was evidence tending to show that the defendant had bought the ox in the summer of 1873, from the plaintiff, upon his representation that the ox had not been brought from the mountains that season, and that but for such representation he would not have bought; whereas, in fact, as the referee found, the ox "had been brought from the mountains during the summer of 1873, and, by reason of having been so brought, it died of distemper *in the early fall of that year, and was of no value to defendant," and he therefore found "that the defendant was damaged by the misrepresentations of the plaintiff in regard to the above-mentioned ox in the sum of $25." The counter claim was, however, disallowed—exactly upon what ground does not appear in the case as submitted; but from the argument we infer it was upon the ground that the defendant's claim for damages was not based upon a cause of action arising on a contract, but that defendant's only cause of action was for the deceit in making false representations in regard to the ox, which is a tort. It seems to us, however, that there is no just ground for saying that the defendant's claim for damages was not based upon a contract, or was not a cause of action arising on a contract. It may be that if the defendant had brought his action against the plaintiff in the nature of an action on the case for deceit, that he would have had a good cause of action for such deceit. But while deceit is a tort, it is one arising out of a contract, and a party may, as in this case, waive the tort and sue upon the contract. This was conceded in Schweizer v. Weiber, 6 Rich. 159, and, as is said in 1 Chitty on Plead. *139, "formerly case was the usual remedy for a false warranty or other misrepresentation on the sale of goods, but of late it is more usual to declare in assumpsit." See also Stuart v. Williams, Doug. 19. It does seem that this was at one time doubted in this state, inasmuch as Nott, J., in Read v. Duncan, 2 McC. 167, declined to express any opinion upon the point. But, as Frost, J., says, in Wood v. Ashe, 3 Strob. 72, Brevard's Reports had not been published at the time the case of Read v. Duncan was decided, and therefore the case of Houston v. Gilbert, 3 Brev. 63 [5 Am. Dec. 542], probably escaped attention. For in that case, which was an action of assumpsit to recover the price paid for a slave, on the ground that the plaintiff had been deceived by the representations made by the defendant while negotiating the contract of sale, it was held that it was settled law that in an action of assumpsit the plaintiff may recover on an express and also on an implied warranty where there has been fraud in the contract, and the proposition that to authorize a recovery on the ground of fraud or deception it would be necessary to bring an action of trespass on the case, declaring specially *in tort, and that an action of assumpsit in such case could not be maintained, was expressly repudiated. See also the case of Fowler v. Williams, 2 Brev. 306 [4 Am. Dec. 579]. What is said in Lightner ads. Martin, 2 McC., at page 216, apparently in contradiction of this view, was clearly a mere dictum, as no such question arose in that case. In Pomeroy on Rem., p. 820, § 801, it is said: "It may be regarded as a doctrine established by the overwhelming weight of authority that, whenever by the principles of law, independent of the new procedure, a cause of action may be treated as arising either from tort or on contract, and the party holding the right may elect between the two kinds of remedial proceeding, and does in fact elect to one on contract, the demand thus determined to be upon contract may be counter claimed against a plaintiff's cause of action arising on another contract."

In this case, as we have seen, the defendant might, upon "the principles of law independent of the new procedure," treat the cause of action upon which his counter claim is based either as a tort, by bringing an action on it, in the nature of an action on the case for a deceit, or he might waive the tort and sue upon the contract; and it is very obvious, from the form in which the counter claim is pleaded, that he has done the latter, and has elected to sue for the breach of warranty. Hence, according to the proposition laid down by Pomeroy, which he says is established by the overwhelming weight of authority, the defendant was legally entitled to set up the counter claim pleaded by him in this case.

It is argued, however, that there was no warranty, nothing but a mere representation, and, therefore, the defendant's counter claim could not be said to be a cause of action arising on a contract. In 1 Pars. on Cont. *580, it is said "any distinct assertion or affirmation of quality made by the owner during a negotiation for the sale of a chattel, which it may be supposed was intended to cause the sale, and was operative in causing it, will be regarded either as implying or constituting a warranty." And again: "It is certain that the word warrant need not be used, nor any other of precisely the same meaning. It is enough if the words actually used import an undertaking on the part of the owner that the chattel is what it is represented to be, or *an equivalent to such undertaking." In this case it is impossible to escape the conclusions that in the course of the negotiation the defendant was assured by the plaintiff that the ox had not been brought from the mountains, and was, therefore, not liable to disease, to which, it would seem, mountain cattle were peculiarly liable when first brought to the level country, and that upon this assurance the defendant bought, and without it he would not have bought. This certainly brings the case within the rule stated by Parsons, supra. This rule is fully sustained by the case of Hawkins v. Pemberton, 51 N. Y. 198; 10 Amer. R. 595, in which the authorities are collected and reviewed, and by the recent case of Van Wick v. Allen, 69 N. Y. 61; 25 Amer. R. 136. We are, therefore, of opinion that it was error to exclude the counter claim upon the ground that the cause of action upon which it was based did not arise out of contract.

It was also insisted that the counter claim could not be admitted, because it was based upon a claim for "unascertained damages," and this view would seem to be sustained by certain language used in Gibbes v. Mitchell, 2 Bay 351. But that case has, in this respect, been modified by the recent case of Haynes v. Prothro, 10 Rich. 318, in which it was expressly held that unascertained damages arising ex contractu are admissible as a set-off, and it is there said that so much of the case of Gibbes v. Mitchell as announced a contrary doctrine was a mere dictum, and was of no authority. So that even prior to the adoption of the code of procedure this objection could scarcely be sustained. Since the code, however, we do not see how there can be a question upon the subject, for if the counter claim is based upon a cause of action arising on a contract, by the express terms of that statute it may be pleaded to an action on a contract, whether the damages be liquidated or unliquidated, ascertained or unascertained. Accordingly in Pomeroy on Rem., § 798, p. 817, it is said: "It may be stated as the universal rule that, in an action on contract to recover debt or unliquidated damages, the defendant may counter claim debt or damages arising on another contract, whether such damages are unliquidated or ascertained."

The judgment of the Circuit Court is set aside and a new trial ordered.

New trial granted.

*(Case No. 698.)

THE STATE v. ALEXANDER BRYCE, Jr.

(November Term, 1878.)

[1. Counties ⇐43.]

The chairman of a retiring board of county commissioners has no authority to discharge any of the duties of his office after his successors have been duly elected and qualified, although not yet organized into a board by the election of a chairman.

[2. Jury ⇐59.]

A jury list prepared by the jury commissioner and such retiring chairman is illegal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. § 269; Dec. Dig. ⇐59.]

Before Cooke, J., at Oconee, March Term, 1877.

At the preparation of a jury list for Oconee county, in January, 1877, only two persons besides the clerk and sheriff were present—the jury commissioner and the chairman of the board of county commissioners who were elected in November, 1874. The county commissioners elected in November, 1876, all qualified during December of that year. The former county auditor resigned his office, and his resignation was accepted December 19th, 1876. His successor had not yet been appointed. The grand and petit jurors present at this term of the Circuit Court were all drawn from said list.

The defendant was indicted for larceny and for receiving stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, namely, four books belonging to the office of county auditor. Defendant challenged the array of jurors, upon the ground that the list was illegally prepared. The challenge was overruled, and defendant was convicted of receiving stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen.

Defendant submitted a motion in arrest of judgment, upon several grounds, all of which being overruled, and defendant being sentenced, he appealed to this court, upon several grounds, of which it is necessary to state only one:

Because the jury by which the verdict of guilty, &c., was rendered in said action, was not a legal jury, for the reason that there was no legal chairman of the board of county commissioners or county auditor for this county present in preparing the list from which said jury were drawn.

*Mr. J. W. Harrison and Mr. S. P. Dendy, for appellant.

The whole board of three must be present and act from the very terms of the statute, both in preparing the list and drawing the jury. See ch. CXI., §§ 1, 3, 4, 5, 15; 1 Bay 354; Potter's Dwarris on Stat. 767; Black. Rules of Con. 151; 31 How. Pr. 51; L. & Eq. Rep., Vol. IV., pp. 328–330.

The third section of the act of 1874 (15 Stat. 638), is unconstitutional and void. See Art. II, § 20, Const. S. C.; Potter's Dwarris on Stat., ½ p. 64, 103, 105–6, and note 5.

If the act of 1874 above referred to, be held constitutional, then the whole board of jury commissioners should have a legal existence in the county before a majority can act. See Potter's Dwarris on Stat., ½ p. 223, note 29, and 228, note 30, and cases cited; 2 Cranch 127.

Under the constitution and statutes of this state, county commissioners are elected for two years, and hold until their successors are elected and qualified. Art. IV., § 19, Const. S. C.; Rev. Stat., ch. XIX., § 35, p. 155.

Election or appointment, and taking prescribed oath of office, and filing approved bond, is the only qualification within the meaning of the statutes of this state, and confers the office. Rev. Stat., ch. XIX., § 3, p. 146; State v. Lyles, 1 McC. 239.

HASKELL, A. J. There are several grounds of appeal presented by the defendant, but the first disposes of the question and is the only one which requires consideration. The objection is to the jury; that the jury list was not legally prepared. The law on that subject, and at that time, is as follows:

1. There shall be a jury commissioner, "who, with the county auditor and chairman of the board of county commissioners, shall constitute a board of jury commissioners for the county. Rev. Stat., § 1, 518; Id., § 3, 519. "The board of jury commissioners of each county shall, once in each year, during the month of January, prepare a list," &c.

From that "list" the grand and petit jurors are drawn. The board is thus composed of three public officers designated. It is *submitted by the appellant that all should be present at the preparation of the jury list, but that only two were present in fact; and, secondly, if it should be decided that a majority constitutes a quorum, he submits that one of the two persons present was not qualified to act, and that, consequently, there was not a majority. On this subject it is said in Sedg. on Stat. and Const. Law 387: "In regard to the number requisite to constitute a quorum of the members of a public body, or the number requisite to do business, it has long been settled that where a statute constitutes a board of commissioners or other officers to decide any matter, as to open books, to receive subscriptions and distribute the stock of a railroad company, but makes no provision that a majority shall constitute a quorum, all must be present to hear and consult, though a majority may then decide."

The more general rule laid down in Bouvier's Law Dict., tit. "Quorum," is, that where the act is to be done by a definite number of persons, a majority of that number "is required to constitute a quorum, unless the law expressly directs that another number may make one." It may be unnecessary to decide whether the whole number is requisite, for that question will not properly arise until it has been determined that a majority was present. We presume that it will not for a moment be contended that a minority of the whole number could perform the duties of the board, for such a proposition would be absolutely without foundation. We will proceed, therefore, to examine the real question in the case—was there present at the preparation of the jury list a majority of the board of jury commissioners? The facts are that only two were present. "Morgan H. Bryce, jury commissioner for Oconee county, and James M. Hunnicutt, claiming to be chairman of the board of county commissioners for said county."

It is undisputed that Morgan H. Bryce was jury commissioner. The county commissioner are elected under the constitution for two years. James M. Hunnicutt had held the office as a county commissioner during the period preceding the election in November, 1876. The jury list was prepared January 8th and 9th, 1877. The county commissioners had been regularly elected in November, 1876, and had all executed their official bonds, which had been severally approved and were all recorded on the 18th *day of December, 1876. It will thus be seen that the new county commissioners had been duly elected and had been qualified nearly a month prior to the time when the jury list was prepared. We know of no authority on the part of James M. Hunnicutt to perform any of the duties of a county commissioner after his successor had been elected, and had qualified by taking the oath of office and filing proper bonds. Such are the facts of this case. The conclusion is, that on December 18th, 1876, the newly elected county commissioners had become installed in their offices, and that from that time the former county commissioners were no longer in office. James M. Hunnicutt was, therefore, no longer chairman of the board of county commissioners, and was not qualified to act on the board of jury commissioners. His action, therefore, being without authority of law, is null and void. The consequence is that there was present but one member of the board of jury commissioners. He had no authority to prepare the jury list, for that is a duty, not of the jury commissioner, but of the board of which he was but a member. The whole proceeding, therefore, was without authority of law, and the jury drawn from such a list was not a legal jury, and the defendant did not have a proper trial. It makes no difference that the new county commissioners had not met together and elected their chairman before the 8th of January. They could have been compelled to perform that duty, and that was the legal remedy. Whether their failure arose from neglect, accident or mistake, is immaterial. Neither of those nor any other cause would sanction the interference of a person unauthorized by law to assume the powers delegated to others. The remaining questions bear upon matters of evidence and of fact, which could not properly (and, indeed, need not to) be considered by this court. The animus, the cause, and the official or de facto position of the defendant, were matters for the jury, with proper legal instruction from the judge, and there seem to have been no exceptions to his charge on any of the points.

The judgment is reversed. Motion granted. New trial granted.

Before Hudson, J., at Union, June Term, 1878.

The facts of this case, and the clause of the will construed by the court, are sufficiently set forth in the decree of Judge Hudson, which reads as follows:

James Hill, the father of the plaintiff, made his last will and testament on the 24th day of October, 1854. A few days afterwards he died, and his will was duly proved before the Ordinary of Union county on the 10th day of November, 1854. The devisees and legatees under the will were testator's widow, Susannah, and his sons, George W. Hill, the plaintiff, and John T. Hill, and his grandsons, James H. Scaife and M. G. B. Scaife, children of a predeceased daughter. The widow, Susannah, died a short time after the testator.

By the first section of the will, the testator directs his debts to be paid from moneys due him and from proceeds of his crops, or cotton then on hand; and if this should be insufficient for the purpose, that the deficiency should be made up as follows: one-third by George W. Hill, one-third by John T. Hill, and one-third by James H. Scaife and M. G. B. Scaife.

By the second section he gives to his wife his dwelling-house and furniture for her life, and $3000 in money, to be made up to her as follows: if there should not be enough *left from the fund set apart to pay debts, then J. T. Hill and G. W. Hill shall each make up one-third part, and J. H. Scaife and M. G. B. Scaife one-third part. After her death the dwelling-house to go to George W. Hill.

By the third section he gives to his grandsons, James H. Scaife and M. G. B. Scaife, negroes and other personal property, with a limitation over; on default of children, to John T. Hill and George W. Hill; or, if they be dead, to their children.

Section four is as follows: "I give and bequeath to my son, G. W. Hill, the following negroes, * * * and the land whereon I now live, excepting for my wife the dwelling-house during her life; * * * and I also give and bequeath to him one-third of my stock, * * * and at the decease of my wife, one-third * * *; and after payment of my debts, should there not be funds enough to make the three thousand dollars for my wife, why then G. W. Hill shall make up one-third of the amount out of his share. Now the condition of the above gift is, that the property, including that given off before, both real and personal, is to remain the said G. W. Hill and his child or children; and in case the said G. W. Hill should die and not leave any living child or children, why then the said property is to go to J. T. Hill, James H. and M. G. B. Scaife, or the child or children of them, the child or children representing parents; and the said G. W. Hill is to pay to J. T. Hill one thousand dollars, and James H. and M. G. B. Scaife each five hundred dollars."

In section five testator gives certain property to his son, J. T. Hill, and, after a conditional limitation, the section proceeds: "Then the said property to descend to G. W. Hill and his child or children, and James H. and M. G. B. Scaife and their children; that is, G. W. Hill one-half, and the Scaife or Scaifes the other half."

The action is brought by George W. Hill. The defendants are his children, hereinafter named, his judgment creditors, and the sheriff of Union county. The complaint alleges, that under the devises of the will of his father, the plaintiff is seized and possessed in joint tenancy and in fee, together with his children, the defendants, Margaret S. Thomas, Sarah A. Willard, Martha *E. Hill, Robert G. Hill, Roland Hill, Ruth W. Hill, and Daisey Hill, of the land devised by the fourth clause of the will. That the judgment creditors, defendants, have levied their executions upon the interest of the plaintiff in said lands, and that the sheriff, defendant, is proceeding to sell under said levies plaintiff's interest therein; that plaintiff is desirous of having a homestead laid off to his family out of his interest in said lands, but is unable to have the same set apart until his interest or portion in severalty in said lands is ascertained. The complaint prays judgment that a writ of partition issue to set off to the plaintiff his interest in severalty and in fee; that an injunction issue to restrain the judgment creditors and the sheriff from selling plaintiff's interest in said land until the same is set off to him in severalty; and that after such partition, that the sheriff be required to lay off to the plaintiff his family homestead.

The judgment creditors deny that the plaintiff is a joint tenant with his children, but insist that he is entitled to an estate for his life in the whole of said lands. Certain of the creditors allege that their judgments are founded upon contracts entered into prior to April, 1868, and deny that the plaintiff is entitled to any homestead exemption whatever in said land.

The children are all infants under the age of twenty-one years, except Mrs. Thomas, who is of full age. At the time of making the will and at the death of the testator, George W. Hill had but one child, now Mrs. Thomas. All the others have been born since. For the children, it is claimed that the plaintiff is entitled to only a joint interest with them for the life of the plaintiff in the land, and that they are entitled to the remainder in fee.

A temporary injunction was granted by Judge Wallace, with leave to move to set it aside. The cause came on to be heard before me at June Term, 1878, upon the merits.

The question in the case is, what interest does the plaintiff take, and what interest do his children take, in the land under the will? The devise to them is contained in the fourth clause of the will. Under the devise the children take concurrently with their father, George W. Hill, or they take successively by way of remainder. The will took effect at the death of the *testator, and the interest of George W. Hill vested in possession at once. As it regards his interest, no further period of distribution was fixed or contemplated. And if the children are to take concurrently with him, then only those in existence at the time of vesting in possession can take. The others could not take; they were not in esse; and none could take but those in existence at the period of distribution. Wessenger v. Hunt, 9 Rich. Eq. 464; Myers v. Myers, 2 McC. Ch. 256 [16 Am. Dec. 648]; 2 Jarman on Wills [74], [75], [76]; O'Hara on Wills, ch. XXIII., § 1, ch. VI. This construction would give the entire estate to the plaintiff and the one child living at the death of the testator. But it is conceded by all parties, plaintiff and defendants, that this was not the intention. And it is clear that it was not. But if the children take in succession by way of remainder, all can take; otherwise, they cannot. See authorities, supra. The will shows a manifest intention to give a different estate to the father and to the children, and that the children should all take. And they can all take only in succession. Therefore they must take by way of remainder.

It is adjudged that the plaintiff, G. W. Hill, under the devise of his father's will, is not seized of the land in question in fee and jointly with his child or children, nor is he seized jointly with them—he for life and they in fee. The devise is to him for life, the remainder to his children. Whether the remainder be vested subject to be divested by predeceasing the life tenant, or a vested transmissible interest, it is not necessary in this contest to decide. It will be time enough at the death of the parent for the surviving children and the children of such as predecease the life tenant, if any, to settle the question.

2. Therefore, the partition craved cannot be granted. But the plaintiff is entitled to have his homestead admeasured out of the life estate, provided he be entitled to a homestead at all as against the creditors enjoined. This will depend upon the dates of the causes of action upon which the judgments respectively are based, which must be ascertained upon a reference. Any homestead admeasured to the plaintiff from the life estate can only be co-extensive with the same, and must terminate with his natural life. It cannot, therefore, be admeasured under the provisions *and terms of the act of the legislature in such case, but must be admeasured under the special directions of the court under the broad grant of the constitution.

3. That as it is possible that the homestead exemption may prevail against some of the judgment creditors and not against others, all equities which may arise between these creditors as against each other, and the claimant of the homestead, in determining how much and what part of said land shall be sold, and which part first, and for whose benefit, be reserved for the further consideration of the court after the coming in of the referee's report.

4. That the existing injunction be continued until the further order of the court.

5. The terms of this judgment having been verbally announced, and an intention to appeal therefrom having been declared, and a request made, that, pending the appeal, further proceedings by the judgment creditors to enforce their executions be stayed in case the appeal be taken, the stay will be granted, subject to terminate by the 1st day of November next, should the taxes on said land for the present fiscal year be not paid by that day by the plaintiff; this, however, not to interfere with the existing injunction.

It is further ordered that Joseph F. Gist, Esquire, be appointed referee herein, to take proof of the amounts and priorities of the judgments against the plaintiff, together with the dates of the causes of action upon which said judgments are founded, and that he report the same to the court, together with his conclusions.

(Signed) J. H. Hudson,
June 25th, 1878. Presiding Judge.

The defendants, the children of G. W. Hill, filed the following exceptions, to wit:

1. For that his Honor adjudged that the plaintiff, G. W. Hill, under the devise of his father's will, is not seized of the land in question in fee and jointly with his child or children, nor is he seized jointly with them, he for life and they in fee. The devise is to him for life, remainder to his children.

*2. For that his Honor did not adjudge that the defendants, as the children of the plaintiff, G. W. Hill, now living, are entitled to the land mentioned in the fourth item of the will of the testator jointly with their said father during his life, one of said children having been born and alive at the time of the devise.

3. For that his Honor did not adjudge that the defendant, Margaret S. Thomas, is entitled to the land mentioned in the fourth item of James Hill's will, jointly with her father, G. W. Hill, during his life, as a child of the said George W. Hill, living at the time of the devise.

And gave the following notice of appeal, to wit:

"Take notice that the defendants * * * appeal to the Supreme Court from so much of the decree of his Honor Judge Hudson, entered herein on the 25th day of June, 1878, as adjudges that the said defendants had no interest in the tract of land described in the complaint during the lifetime of their father, George W. Hill, and from all the other parts of said decree which ignore the rights of said defendants."

Mr. J. H. Rion, for appellant.

I. G. W. Hill, having a child living at the time of the devise, under the second resolution in Wild's case, the father, G. W. Hill, and his children take as joint tenants; and G. W. Hill is entitled to the one-fourth or one-fifth of the estate devised, as there are three or four children. The children take as purchasers. 2 Atk. 220. "Children," in its natural sense, is a word of purchase. 4 Paige Ch. 297. And see 3 Atk. 397, as to distinction between "children" and "issue."

To A and his children, A having children at time of making will, he takes a joint estate with his children. 4 Paige 297; 2 Strange 1172; 2 Vern. 545. All the cases recognize that under the second resolution in Wild's case, the children take jointly and immediately with parent. 1 Doug. 324. Opinion of Lord Mansfield, "immediate" he says.

Under act of 1824, all take fees where it is not inconsistent with the intention of the testator. But it is clear that Mr. Hill's interest is regarded as not extending beyond his own life; while as to the children, they must have died before their father, to let

*in the remaindermen; hence they take a fee defeasible, if they predecease their father.

Again, the will provides for remaindermen only if there be no children of Mr. Hill living at his death; hence, the children, if living, take by implication, otherwise there is a void in the devise, if Mr. Hill should die, leaving children living at his death.

The scheme of the will is manifest. G. W. Hill, as the paterfamilias, is to have the management and control of the whole estate for his life, but the condition of this control is, that while he is to provide certain sums for other purposes of the will, the whole property is to remain the property of himself and his child or children, and after his death that child or children are to take the property. His interest is joint with them for life, and for life only; their interest is from time of devise until their death, or a fee if they survive their parent.

The resolution in Wild's case has a peculiar appropriateness in this devise. G. W. Hill had a child at time of devise, and testator seems particularly to have had this child in his mind. The devise is to this child or children. The remainder, after devise to J. T. Hill, is to G. W. Hill and child or children. The devise to J. T. Hill is to him, and not to him and child or children. The bequest to the Scaifes is to them only, and again with remainder to G. W. Hill and child or children.

The fact that the charge is in G. W. Hill, and not in G. W. Hill and his children, does not indicate an intention contrary to our view; for he, as paterfamilias, (or trustee,) has in charge and control the whole of the property, land and slaves, out of which the amount required may be easily produced as income.

II. The limitation over, if he die without children living at the time of his death, restricts G. W. Hill to a life estate, and vests in the children a fee defeasible in the whole estate, subject to be defeated if they do not survive G. W. Hill, and subject to the life estate carved out for G. W. Hill, their father.

The intention is plain that G. W. Hill's interest is limited to his life, for upon his death, the whole estate passes by implication to such children as may then be living; and if no children, *then to the remaindermen. No objection that their estates have not same termination. 2 Bl. Com. [181.]

Observe Reeder v. Spearman, 6 Rich. Eq. 88, as to Johnson v. Johnson, McM. Eq. 337.

If the devise were to Mr. Hill, and in case he die without children, over—or, to Mr. Hill for life, and in case he die without issue or children living at the time of his death, over—Mr. Hill would take a fee conditional, under our authorities, ending with Addison v. Addison, 9 Rich. Eq. 58; and the same might be the construction if the devise were to Mr. Hill and his children; and if he die without children living at the time of his death, over, if he had no children living at the time of the devise; but, he having a child living at the time of the devise, it, under Wild's case, takes as purchaser, and there is no estate of inheritance in the father contemplated, implied, or necessary to carry out the intention of testator, and although they are joint tenants with their father while he lives, yet, subject to this life estate, they take (even independently of our act of 1824, and a fortiori under that act,) an estate in fee defeasible, if all die before their father.

The same would be the result if the devise were to G. W. Hill and his children after him; or, G. W. Hill and then his children; or, G. W. Hill, as a place of inheritance for him and his children.

In the case of Hannan v. Osborne, 4 Paige 336, where the devise was to a daughter and her children forever, with a void remainder over (which is the same as no remainder,) there it was held that the children took only by way of remainder, though in this case the parent was restricted to a life estate. But in South Carolina the courts would have held (as shown above) in conformity to Wild's case, that the children took an immediate present interest as purchasers. The provision in our case is, however, in very different words from that in Hannan v. Osborne. In that case, the devise was "to Mary Ann * * * all the remainder of my estate, both real and personal, to have and to hold the same to her and her children forever; but in case my said sister shall die and all her children die, leaving no children," over.

*The Chancellor says, (p. 341,) that under common law, there being children in existence at time of devise, they would take "jointly with parent," unless the intention of testator appeared in the will that the children were only to take by way of remainder. And the Chancellor further says in this case, (p. 342,) that "the devise is not to the mother and her children, but to her, to have and to hold the same to her and her children forever." Besides, he says that the devise being to children, when there was in esse only a child, showed that testator had in view that the children were to take by way of remainder.

The language of the case is, "Held under the Revised Statute," etc.

I respectfully submit that the error of the Circuit judge arises from not considering the distinction between the word child (of purchase) and issue (of limitation,) and not recognizing the second resolution in Wild's case.

III. Now, what children take?

The children take as joint tenants with their father.

The rule laid down in many of our cases, that those only who are in esse and capable of taking at the time fixed of a division, applies only when a time for division is fixed. But in our case the estate is to "remain G. W. Hill's and his child or children," and there is no division or change until the death of G. W. Hill, when the time for division is really fixed. Children who have died before that period are dropped out, and their issue cannot take unless the court makes the word "children" include grandchildren. 2 Ves. 336, where a limitation over is the ground; 2 Strange 1172; 4 Strobh. Eq. 15, 16; 2 Vern. 545; 2 Strange 1172. Children can come in at different times, and the Chief Justice gives authorities: 2 Bl. Com. [182], note as to Sugden's remarks; Carson v. Kennedy, 8 Rich. Eq. 268.

Mr. William Munro, for respondents.

Under the will of his father, the plaintiff, George W. Hill, takes a life estate in the lands devised in the fourth item of the will, with remainder to his children.

Two rules are relied on by the respondents:

1st. Intention *must prevail, if consistent with law. 2d. Effect must be given to all the words of the will, if possible.

If the devise were to "George W. Hill and his child or children," without other words, the rule in Wild's case, 6 Co. 17, would apply, and this would be a case of joint tenancy between George W. Hill and his eldest child. 6 Rich. Eq. 88; O'Hara on Wills, ch. XXIII., § 4.

But if effect be given to the words of limitation over, George will take a life estate, with remainder to his children. Bail Eq. 552; 2 Hill L. 330; McM. 347; 2 Strob. Eq. 63; 2 Ves., Jr., 536, note 1.

But, it is said, these are cases of personalty, and that the rule is different in respect of realty.

The only difference is in this, that in the case of personalty, the limitation over converts the issue or heirs of the body, mentioned in the words of the direct gift, into purchasers in remainder; whereas, in a devise of lands, the words of limitation over are ineffectual to convert the issue or heirs of the body, mentioned in the direct devise, into purchasers. This is because of the different nature and qualities of the two species of property. 1 Rich. Eq. 411; 3 Rich. Eq. 390–393; S. C., 4 Rich. Eq. 380–384.

Now, in a case like this, where it is conceded that the devisees do take as purchasers, the words of the limitation over must have their obvious meaning. Bail Eq. 552.

Second. Under the devise the children of George W. Hill take as purchasers, and must take concurrently with the parent, or successively by way of remainder.

All the children cannot take, if they take concurrently with the parent. All the children were not in esse at the death of the testator. Those only who were in existence at the death of the testator can take concurrently with the parent. 2 Jarman on Wills, *74, *75, *76; O'Hara on Wills, ch. XXIII.; 9 Rich. Eq. 464; 2 McC. Ch. 256; 2 McC. Ch. 445.

But if the children take successively to the parent, all can take. See authorities supra.

Now, did the testator mean that all should take? So it is claimed by all.

*The appellants claim that the period of distribution, or which is the same thing, the vesting in possession, was at the death of testator, and at same time insist that the children born after that period, as well as the one born before, should take. This is opposed to all the authorities.

The respondents, on the contrary, claim that the period of distribution is deferred until the death of George W. Hill, the life tenant, and that all the children will take, and thus carry into effect the intention of testator.

The appellants demand partition among George and his children, i. e., those in esse.

If any children are hereafter born, must there not be another partition?

There are other words of the context, showing that George is to take a different estate from his children. He is to pay money to equalize "his share."

The case of Hannan v. Osborne, 4 Paige Ch. 341, 342, is identical with this. No difference can be distinguished.

Particular attention is asked to the words of Chancellor Walworth, on pages 341, 342; they seem to counsel to cover the points of this case.

Another strong point in this case is, that the testator has defined the meaning of his own words.

Ambiguous words in one part of an instrument must receive the same construction as the same words used without ambiguity in another part of the same instrument.

The words whose construction is disputed in the fourth section of this will, are again used in the fifth section, and are there defined: "That is to say, G. W. Hill one-half, and the Scaife or Scaifes the other half." 2 Jarman on Wills *744, Rule XVIII.; 2 Williams on Ex'rs *928.

March 15th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. The appeal is from the construction of a will, and the only question is as to what estate in land is devised by the following words, to wit: "I give and bequeath to my son, G. W. Hill, * * * the land whereon I now live. * * * Now, the condition of the above gift is, that the property, including that given off before, * * * is to remain *the property of the said G. W. Hill and his child or children; and in case the said G. W. Hill should die and not leave any living child or children, why then the said property" over. The will is set forth in full in the statement of the case.

The Circuit judge decides that the devise is to G. W. Hill for life, with remainder to his children. The appeal is on behalf of the children, several of whom are minors, and they claim to take jointly with their father during his lifetime, with remainder in fee for those who may survive him. The whole appeal rests upon the proposition that this case is governed by the second resolution in Wild's case, which is as follows: "If a man devises lands to A and to his children or issue, and he then has children or issue of his body, then his express intent may take effect according to the rule of the common law; and no certain and manifest intent appears in the will to the contrary." The parent and the children thus take jointly. The other points presented by the appellants are mere deductions based upon the above proposition, which, therefore, should be first considered. The resolution relied on relates only to cases of direct devise to parent and children—as if to A and B, both to take immediately. In this case the gift to G. W. Hill is separate and distinct. The land is first given to him absolutely. A clause is then inserted, called "the condition of the above gift," and containing a provision that the said property previously given to G. W. Hill shall not only remain his, but shall also remain for his "child or children." The gift to the children is of the whole property, just as it had been to G. W. Hill. It is thus given to two persons or classes of persons, to each in entirety, but in this way, i. e., it is given to A, but it is made a condition that it shall "remain" for B. The term child or children is primarily a word of purchase, and not of limitation, and can only be given the latter as its secondary meaning when such construction is rendered necessary by the context. No such necessity appears in this case. On the contrary, the primary meaning is admitted, and it expresses the real intention of the testator. Child or children, then, is the same as a designated person. It is as if the property had been given to A, when if nothing more had been said the gift would have been in fee simple under the act *of 1824. Rev. Stat. 443. But the expression is added, as a condition of the above gift, that the property is to "remain to A and B," and "in case the said A should die and not leave B living, then over." The real intention cannot be doubted. The gift of the whole property was already to A, and there is nothing in the context to justify the idea that the testator meant to diminish the amount. In fact, the contrary is shown. The testator's design was to divide his property into three parts, one to G. W. Hill to remain to his children, another to J. T. Hill, and the other to two grandsons, together representing a daughter. G. W. Hill is charged personally with sums payable to the other son and the two grandsons for purposes of equalization. Again, in a limitation over of the property devised to J. T. Hill, to "G. W. Hill and his child or children," and to the two grandsons and their children, the testator explains by saying, "that is, G. W. Hill one-half, and the Scaife or Scaifes the other half." That is to say G. W. Hill was to enjoy the whole property devised to him and his children, but the time of his enjoyment is limited. It was to him and to his children after him. It might be said that such was the language in Johnson v. Johnson, McM. Eq. 347, and the first taker was held to have taken a fee conditional. But the Chancellor says it would have been different in Johnson v. Johnson if there had been a limitation over in the event of the first taker having no children living at her death. "That would show the intention of giving the remainder to the children living at her death, and would restrict the mother to a life estate." That is this case. Nor, to return, is there, on the other hand, any evidence that the "child or children" shall take less than the whole. The only mode by which both can have the whole property is for them to take it successively. It is given to the father. He is, beyond peradventure, a taker at the beginning. When can the children take? Certainly not at the beginning, for then there was only one. The word "remain," which constitutes the gift to the child or children, perhaps contains the explanation. It has within it the meaning of continuance, and, consequently, when there are several actors, the idea of succession. The property was already in the father by the preceding gift. The condition permits it to continue or remain *(in) him, but adds that it shall remain (for) his child or children. It is the same as if he had said it shall go to A, but it must remain for B. There is no difference between that and the common expression, "for A and then for B."

In the case of Sisson v. Seabury, 1 Sumn. 235 [Fed. Cas. No. 12,913], the devise was to "A and his male children, lawfully begotten of his body, and their heirs forever, to be equally divided among them, and their heirs forever." The court, after determining that the "male children" did not mean male issue indefinitely, found no difficulty in fixing the estate in A to be for life only, with the fee simple in remainder to the male children. The fact that the devise was to the male children and their heirs, &c., was of great force in that case, but the difference in words in that respect is not material, for, under the act of 1824, unless the contrary appears, the devise to children is the same as to children and their heirs. The court, per Story, J., says: "Where words of devise are used, giving an estate to A and then to B, no one would doubt that the estate to A was a mere life estate, although not so expressly limited. It results from a general rule of law. If the testator, instead of designating the second devisee by name, uses words which are commonly a mere descriptio personarum, the conclusion is equally natural that the estate to A is for life only. We are at liberty to abandon this conclusion only when there is an apparent intent to use the words as words of limitation and not as words of description—'male children' are not, technically speaking, words of limitation, but of description of persons. The court ought, then, clearly to see that they are used as words of limitation before it abandons their common meaning." The word "then" did not occur in the devise, nor was there "remain" to qualify a preceding absolute gift to a preceding devisee. This case is much stronger than the case of Sisson v. Seabury, which is recognized authority, and supported by a long array of the decisions of the English courts. In that case the point was different, but the line of approach on one side is the same as in this. A had no child at the time; the second resolution in Wild's case, was, therefore, not applicable. But it was contended that he took an estate tail under the first resolution in Wild's case. It was held that he took an estate for life, and the *reasoning which leads to that conclusion is equally applicable to that point in the case before us. The fact that there was one child of G. W. Hill in esse at the time of the making of the will, would be of more importance in the view urged by the appellants were it not that, by the addition of the word "children," the testator had shown it to be his intention to include after-born children who could not take immediately. For it is only where the children are to take immediately that the second resolution in Wild's case can be said to govern. With regard to the effect of "children" as a plural, where there is but one child in being at the time, the conclusion is put quite forcibly in Hannan v. Osborne, 4 Paige Ch. 336, cited in the arguments. That case, too, is very much in point throughout. See, also, Sisson v. Seabury, with the authorities there cited by Mr. Justice Story.

The judgment is affirmed. Motion refused. Appeal dismissed.

WILLARD, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

Before Hudson, J., at Spartanburg, June Term, 1878.

This was an indictment against the defendant for obstructing a public road. In the indictment it was called "a highway," "a public highway," "a common highway," and the indictment concluded contra formam statuti. The proof was, that it was a neighborhood road, connecting two public highways. The obstruction consisted in the erection of a fence by defendant across this road, about the time that he opened a new road, of the same length as the old road, but at some distance from it. And this new road was partly over another's land.

In his "proposed case," the appellant makes the following statement:

The defendant made a written request that his Honor the presiding judge, charge the jury—

1. That before finding a verdict of guilty, the jury must believe from the evidence that the obstruction in the road was a public nuisance.

2. That if the jury from the evidence believe that the defendant has opened a new road in place of the old one, and equally as convenient as the old one, then the jury should return a verdict of not guilty.

Said charges his Honor refused to make.

His Honor then charged the jury that the same rules applied in law to the obstruction or change of a private path as to a public highway—both being public roads. That whenever the public had had the use of a road over lands continuous and adverse for twenty years, said road because thereby a public highway. That the obstruction of such a highway or private path constituted of itself a public nuisance. That if the jury, from the evidence, believed that the defendant had obstructed said road, then they must find the defendant guilty—and that no citizen has the right to close up a public highway or private path running through his land, although he makes another road *equally as convenient, because said citizen would have the right to close the latter road completely before the right of the public thereto had ripened into prescription, and would thereby deprive the public of any road whatever over the land.

To all of which charges and refusals to charge, the defendant duly excepted.

The respondent not agreeing to the case as proposed, it was submitted to Judge Hudson, who made the following report:

The foregoing case on appeal was submitted to the solicitor of the seventh circuit by the defendant's attorney, to which certain amendments were proposed by the solicitor, and not being accepted by the defendant's attorney, I have been called upon to settle the case.

There was little, if any, conflict of testimony on the main points of the case, to wit: That the "Flatwoods Road," connecting the Mills Gap and Rutherford highways, had been uninterruptedly used by the public in going to mill, to church, and in crossing from one highway to the other, for more than twenty years. It was clearly proved by others, and admitted by the defendant, that he had erected a fence across this road and forced the public to abandon the old road for more than a half mile, and in lieu thereof had substituted a new road running through his new ground field, across which he had erected two gates. The obstruction was placed there in April last, and existed at the time of trial.

At the close of my charge to the jury the defendant's counsel submitted certain propositions of law, and requested that I should accordingly instruct the jury. Two of them I declined. The first of these set forth in the case, I qualified by charging the jury that if the evidence satisfied them that the road in question had been uninterruptedly used by the public for more than twenty years, and kept in repair by the neighborhood, it was a public road, for the obstruction of which an indictment would lie; that the obstruction of such a public highway or private path to the impediment of travel constituted of itself the public nuisance.

The second proposition I declined, saying to the jury that the law does not concede to private individuals the right to obstruct public roads and force the public to pass through fields enclosed *with gates; that our public roads would be in a precarious condition if liable to be changed at the caprice of private individuals. Easements valuable to the public might easily be lost or forfeited if such rights were accorded to private persons.

In explaining to the jury the character of the road in question I endeavored to follow the law as laid down in Sartor's case, 2 Strob. L. 61, and instructed them that if they were satisfied from the evidence that for twenty years or more the public had enjoyed the free and continuous use of this Flatwoods road without molestation, it became a public road or highway, technically called a private path, for the obstruction of which an indictment would lie, and that the nuisance consisted in the obstruction complained of.

With the addition of this statement of facts and instructions, I regard the defendant's case sufficiently settled to bring the errors complained of to the attention of the Supreme Court.

The defendant was convicted and sentenced, and he appealed upon the following grounds:

That his Honor erred—

1. In refusing to charge the jury that before finding a verdict of guilty the jury must believe from the evidence that the obstruction in the road was a public nuisance.

2. In refusing to charge that if the jury from the evidence believe that the defendant has opened a new road in place of the old one, and equally as convenient as the old one, then the jury should return a verdict of not guilty.

3. In charging that the same rules applied in law to the obstruction or change of a private path as to a public highway—both being public roads.

4. In charging that whenever the public had had the continuous and adverse use of a road over lands for twenty years, said road became thereby a public highway.

5. In charging that the obstruction of such a highway or private path constituted of itself a public nuisance.

6. In charging that if the jury from the evidence believed that the defendant had obstructed said road, then they must find the defendant guilty.

*7. In charging that no citizen has the right to close up a public highway or private path through his land, although he makes another road equally as convenient.

8. And because said verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

1. Unless the obstruction in the road was a nuisance to the public, an indictment will not lie. The very essence of this indictment is an alleged injury to the public. Unless, then, the defendant was guilty of a nuisance, and has done something that was an annoyance to the public, he is improperly convicted. What is a nuisance? 3 Bl. Com. 166; Bac. Ab., tit. "Nuisances;" 2 Bouv. Law Dict.

2. The citizen has the right to change the course of a private path over his land, provided the change causes no inconvenience to the public. There are different classes of public ways in this state which may not be ignored. 1 McM. 47; 3 McC. 173; 7 Rich. 392; 2 Strob. 66; Act of 1855, Gen. Stat. 266; 11 Rich. 259. A neighborhood road approaches very near to a private way. 6 Rich. 400. It is customary to substitute one neighborhood road for another, and there can be no objection if the new road is as good as the old. 11 Rich. 485; 1 Russ. on Cr. 317; Broom Leg. Max. 357. The Circuit judge seemed to think that if a new road was substituted, it might afterwards be closed, before use thereof had ripened into prescription, and the public be thus deprived of any road over the land. This could not be, because, (1) the prescription to the old road could not be lost until it was gained in the new; and (2) the dedication of the new road by defendant is irrevocable. 12 Rich. 100; 2 Wait's Act. and Def. 715. The obstruction of the new road by gates is authorized. Gen. Stat. 266; 11 Rich. 259.

3. There was error in charging that if the jury from the evidence believed that the defendant had obstructed said road, then they must find the defendant guilty. Because the evidence did not show that the public had a right over this road through defendant's lands.

HASKELL, A. J. The indictment is for a nuisance committed by obstructing a "way" contra formam statuti. The statute relating to that subject is in Rev. Stat., ch. XLIV., § 16, p. 267. "If any person shall cause any obstruction to be placed in any part of the said highways or on any bridge or causeway thereof, so as to obstruct or render dangerous or difficult the passage of carriages or other traveling thereon, and shall not immediately remove the same, when required, he shall be deemed guilty of a nuisance, and on conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $10, nor less than $2, and shall be further liable for the expenses of removing the said nuisance." The preceding section (15) establishes a penalty whenever "any person shall willfully and maliciously destroy, injure or in any manner hurt, damage, impair or obstruct any of the public highways," &c., &c. The indictment cannot be made under Section 15, for it in no sense describes that offence, but it is cited to show that "said highways in Section 16 means public highways," as mentioned in Section 15. No objection was made to the indictment for insufficiency or upon any other ground, and the only question is, whether there was any error in the charge of the judge. To convict under this indictment there must be proof that the road was a public highway, and that the obstruction was committed by the defendant, for the road being properly proved, the obstruction constitutes the nuisance. The only exceptions which need be considered, for the others are without any merit, are those which refer to the ruling of the judge upon the question, what constitutes a public highway. The case comes up on a statement by the appellant, with some additional and explanatory remarks by the judge, who thus settled the case. Whenever, therefore, the statements made by the appellant are not corrected by the judge, we take them to be admitted. One of the exceptions taken is to the charge "that whenever the public had had the continuous and adverse use of a road over lands for twenty years, said road thereby became a public highway." And another is to the charge "that the same rules applied in law to the obstruction or change of a private path as to a public highway, both being public roads." This report of a charge is *not contradicted by the judge; he simply makes some additional statements not bearing directly on these exceptions, and says that the law, as laid down in Sartor's case, 2 Strob. 61, was his guide. We are forced, therefore, to conclude that for the purposes of this case no distinction was drawn between a "public highway" and a "neighborhood road or private path used by the public;" consequently, that proof either of a "public highway" or a neighborhood road, as in State v. Sartor, would suffice. We think that this was an error, and will state the reasons for such opinion.

The section of the general statutes under which we infer that this indictment was brought, is taken, with very slight alteration, from the act of 1824, (Stat., Vol. IX., p. 545,) entitled "An act concerning the state roads, and for preserving and protecting the same." The preamble thus sets forth the subject and the purpose of the act: "Whereas, it is necessary that the several roads which have been or which hereafter may be constructed in this state, under the authority and at the expense thereof, should be protected by law from injury and dilapidation, and that provision should be made for keeping the same in good and contract repair; be it therefore," &c. The act then proceeds to make provisions concerning "the said roads." Sections 15 and 16, above cited, are copied from Sections 1 and 2 of the said act, substituting the words "public highways" for the said roads, viz., the roads described in the preamble. It may be argued that republication in the general statutes can work no material change, and that the meaning of "public highways" in the said sections, is limited to the roads described in the original act. It is deemed, however, more proper to consider the question as it comes up, and decide what class of roads is legally comprehended by the term "public highways," as used in this state.

It is a well-recognized fact that we have three classes of roads. Judge Evans, in his "Digest of the Road Law of the State," prepared by him in 1850, at the request of the Agricultural Society, describes them as follows: "It would seem from these views that roads are of three kinds—1. Highways, which are laid out for the use of the public generally. 2. Private paths, laid out for, used and kept in repair by particular persons. 3. *Private ways or individual roads. The first two are public and the last entirely private. For an obstruction to a public road the remedy is by indictment. For a private way, by civil action." Page 7, section 4, note 9. While such description is useful for general information, it cannot stand for a legal definition, unless the term "highway" be, by usage or judicial decisions or legislation, perverted from its proper and very extensive signification. "Highways is said to be the genus of all public ways," (Russ. on Cr., Vol. I., p. 332,) and in that sense, all public ways are highways, and all highways are public ways. If this be correct, the first two kinds described by Judge Evans are "highways," though differing in many respects from each other, and it would be arbitrary to distinguish one from the other by calling it a highway, which is the common name of both. Such arbitrary distinction has not been adopted. On the contrary, in Heyward v. Chisolm, 11 Rich. 253, in the opinion delivered by Wardlaw, J., it is said: "Judge Evans, in his 'Digest of the Road Law,' page 7, thinks that our acts of assembly relating to roads seem to make a three-fold division of them into highways, private paths and private ways. But this attempt to systematize confused legislation cannot change the meaning of the words that have acquired a settled technical signification. Highway is a nomen generalissimum, which embraces every kind of way common to all citizens, whether a footway, a horseway, a cartway or a way by water; whether under the charge of commissioners or not, and whether originally laid out for the whole public, or laid out for particular persons and used by the public. Jacob's Law Dict., tit. "Highway;" 6 Mod. 225. Indictments for obstructions of our neighborhood roads (strangely called private paths) call them highways. State v. Sartor.

Our roads are therefore properly divided into highways and private ways, and the highways are subdivided into two kinds. The variety of epithets by which these subdivisions have been indiscriminately called has given rise to some confusion. In State v. Mobley, 1 McM. 44, the classification by Judge Brevard in Ex parte Withers [3 Brev. 85] is adopted: "Public roads are best distinguished into two sorts, namely, highways and private roads or paths. A highway is a principal road leading to market, town, *or some place of general resort, and is commonly traveled by all kinds of people. Private roads are neighborhood ways not commonly used by other than the people of the neighborhood where they are, although they may be used by any one who may have occasion to do so." In the leading case on the subject of obstruction of highways, (State v. Sartor, 2 Strob. 60,) is contained, in substance, the classification which was adopted by Judge Evans, and already quoted. In both these cases the question was whether a neighborhood road was a public road or highway, the obstruction of which would constitute a nuisance at the common law. It was particularly decided in State v. Sartor that obstruction of a neighborhood road was the obstruction of a highway, and constituted a nuisance. Beyond that point, which was decided, the classification of roads is of no authority. In State v. Pettis, 7 Rich. 390, neighborhood roads are recognized as highways, and the other class of public roads or ways are referred to as "more public highways." The court, per Munro, J., says: "There appears to have existed in this state, for more than a century, two distinct classes of public ways, the first of which consists of such highways or thoroughfares as lead to market towns, or other places of public resort, are laid out by the public labor, and are in all respects subject to the jurisdiction of the commissioners of roads. Those embraced within the second class are distinguished by the name of the neighborhood roads, or, as they are styled in the early acts of our legislature, private paths. This latter name would seem to import that the ways in question are technically private. They are nevertheless public alike in their origin as in their use. * * * And although they are exempt from the jurisdiction of the commissioners of roads, and are kept in repair by voluntary labor of those for whose immediate use and accommodation they are kept open, the public at large have nevertheless a right to their use, and for their obstruction, like the more public highways in the first-mentioned class, the only remedy is by an indictment for a nuisance. State v. Sartor, 2 Strob. 60." The opinion was delivered in 1854. The legislature shortly thereafter, in 1855, passed an act "To authorize the erection of gates upon all such roads as are not public highways." 12 Stat.
*408; Rev. Stat. 266, § 8. "In 1858 the case of State v. Jefcoat came up to the Court of Appeals (11 Rich. 529) with the question whether a neighborhood road was within the provisions of the act or within the exception to the act, or, in other words, whether a neighborhood road was a public highway. It was held that although such road was a public way, it was, nevertheless, not a public highway." And such, we think, is the law. The case of Heyward v. Chisolm, already cited, is not inconsistent. The real ground relied on in that case was that a public way was not, of necessity, a highway, and that when a highway or public highway (for both terms are used) is pleaded in justification, that the proof of a neighborhood road could not sustain the plea. The argument was that a "private path" was not a highway. The court really decided upon that point. Besides, it was a civil action, and more liberality is allowed, and if "public highway" has been pleaded, the proof of "highway" would have established a public right, which was the real defence. And the court said that if the plaintiff was not really misled, "the name was unimportant." Such liberality cannot, however, extend to the allegations in an indictment. The state must prove what is charged, viz., the obstruction of a "certain public highway," and by the authorities it is established that a neighborhood road is not a public highway. It was essential to a proper trial that the jury should have been instructed as to the real character of the way alleged in the indictment. The law of Sartor's Case could not be the law of this case, for that case was at the common law, and was for a "highway," while this is under the statute, and is for a "public highway." It may be contended that contra formam statuti is surplusage, and that the indictment is good at common law. Be that so, it makes no difference. The objection is not to the indictment, but to the failure to discriminate between the different kinds of public ways. There is a difference of defence, for what is an obstruction of the one is not always an obstruction of the other. A "public highway" is as distinct from a highway as a public landing is from a public way leading to the landing—at least so far as the present question is concerned. The fact that to obstruct either is a nuisance does not help the variation between the allegation and the proof, nor cure the effect of a charge which did not draw the *legal distinction between the two. State v. Graham, 15 Rich. 310. If the way in question had not in fact been obstructed by the fence, but had been restored to its original bed, or only changed, for a short distance, which sometimes and with some public ways the law would not consider an obstruction, and the defendant had put a gate or gates across it, under the act of 1855, then, if it were a "public highway," the remarks of the judge about the gates would be proper, but if the road turn out to be the other class of highway, commonly called "neighborhood road," the remarks would be inapplicable, and would tend to mislead the jury.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial granted.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

McIVER, A. J. I am unable to concur in the conclusion reached by the majority of the court in this case, and will proceed to state, very briefly, my reasons.

The only question which we are at liberty to consider is, whether there was any error in the charge of the Circuit judge; for, there being no exception to the sufficiency of the indictment, we are not called upon to determine anything with respect to that. If we take the charge as stated, in what is designated in the "case" as the "judge's report," which, I think, we are bound to do, no error has been discovered, but, on the contrary, the law as there stated, applicable to the case, is unquestionably correct. The errors pointed out are found only in the charge as represented by the appellant, which, according to my view, should not be regarded as a correct representation of the instructions actually given to the jury. For the "case," as presented by the appellant, embracing his representations of what the Circuit judge did charge, was certainly objected to by the respondent, and the Circuit judge was called upon to "settle the case." This he did in what is styled the "judge's report," and as the only real difference between that and the "case," as presented by the appellant, consists in the representations of what was said to the jury by the judge in his charge, I think we should regard the judge's report as the correct representation, and that appellant's representations are incorrect where they differ from such report. If, however, *the representation made by the appellant as to what was said in the charge to the jury should be regarded at all, it must be construed in connection with the representation of the charge as made in the judge's report. Construing it in this way, I am unable to perceive any error. I think it is conclusively shown, in the opinion of the majority of the court, that there are two classes of roads in this state, for the obstruction of which an indictment will lie. 1. Public highways. 2. Private paths or neighborhood roads; and that both of these classes are comprehended under the "nomen generalissimum" of highway. It is very obvious that the road, for the obstruction of which this indictment was brought, belongs to the second of these classes, and the only question, therefore, is, did the Circuit judge state the law correctly as applicable to that class of roads? I do not understand that this is questioned. The errors pointed out are, first, that, as represented by the appellant, the judge charged "that whenever the public had had the use of a road over land, continuous and adverse for twenty years, said road became thereby a public highway," the error, as I understand it, consisted in the use of the word "public," as qualifying the word "highway." Now, even assuming this representation of the charge to have been correct, still—while this may have been an error, as an abstract proposition of law, inasmuch as it may not be strictly correct to say that "public highways" derive their origin from prescription—I do not see how it can be regarded as an error affecting or likely to affect the questions made in the case on the Circuit. And as I take the rule to be well established that in order to reverse or set aside a judgment of the Circuit Court it is not sufficient to point out any mere abstract errors of law, but they must be such errors in applying the law to the case as made below, as affected or would be likely to affect the result, I do not think, even conceding this to be an error committed, that it would be sufficient to require that the judgment below should be set aside. It is very clear to my mind that no question was raised in the trial below as to the distinction between these two classes of public roads, for in the indictment, to which no exception was taken, the road in question is indiscriminately designated as a "public highway," a "common highway," a "highway," and as a "common public highway," and there *is no request to charge or exception indicating any design to draw a distinction between a "public highway" and a "private path" or "neighborhood road," technically so-called. The only points made in the defence were: 1st. That the mere obstruction of a public road was not of itself sufficient to constitute a nuisance, but that the jury should have been instructed to inquire whether in fact such obstruction was a nuisance to the public. 2d. That the defendant, by opening a new road alleged to be equally as convenient as the old one, relieved himself from liability under this indictment. As to these propositions, it is conceded, as I understand it, that there was no error in the charge. The second error pointed out is in saying to the jury "that the same rules applied in law to the obstruction or change of a private path as to a public highway, both being public roads." This alleged error is to be found only in the charge, as represented by the appellant, and not in the charge as represented by the judge's report. As to this alleged error, while I am not exactly prepared to say that it was an error at all in this particular case as developed below, it is sufficient to say that the same remarks which have been made in reference to the first error alleged will apply. It is true that if the obstruction complained of was the erection of gates across the road, then to determine whether such an erection was an obstruction for which an indictment would lie, it would be important to inquire whether the road was a "public highway" or a "private path," for if it was the former such an obstruction would be indictable, while if the latter, it would not, under the provisions of the act of 1855, (12 Stat. 408,) as construed by the case of the State v. Jefcoat, 11 Rich. 529. In this case, however, the obstruction complained of was not the erection of gates but a fence, and certainly the building of a fence across a "private path" is just as much indictable as if built across a public highway. It seems to me, therefore, that to set aside the judgment upon the ground of the errors mentioned would be to give the appellant the benefit of purely technical objections to abstract propositions of law not applicable to the case as made on the Circuit and not raised in the court below. Again, I do not think that the indictment can be regarded as framed under the statute but that the words *"contrary to the form of the statute," should be rejected as surplusage and the indictment be regarded as one at common law, as in Sartor's case. It is a well-established rule of criminal pleading that an indictment for an offence created by statute must follow the words of the statute; and, if it does not, it cannot be sustained except by the rejection of the words contra formam statuti, and treating it as an indictment at common law, which may be done in those cases where the offence existed at common law and has not been abrogated by any statute, as in this case now under consideration. The statute under which it is suggested that this indictment is framed is Section 16 of Chapter XLIV., General Statutes, p. 267, taken from Section 2 of the act of 1824. 9 Stat. 545. But the indictment cannot be regarded as framed under that section, for it omits one of the material ingredients of the offence there described. Under that section the mere placing an obstruction in a public highway does not constitute the offence, but it consists in not immediately removing such obstructions when required. Hence to sustain an indictment under this section it requires not only an allegation that defendant placed an obstruction in the public highway, but also that he failed and refused to "immediately remove the same when required," and this latter allegation is not contained in the indictment in this case. This section was doubtless intended to prevent the temporary obstruction of public highways by the stopping of carts, wagons or other vehicles in such highway, and refusing or neglecting to remove such impediments to travel when required. Nor can the indictment be regarded as framed under the preceding section of the same chapter of the General Statutes, which is taken from Section 1 of the act of 1824, supra, which was no doubt intended to prevent and punish those who might place permanent obstructions in a public highway: for in such case it would be necessary following the words of that section, not only to allege that the defendant did obstruct such public highway, but that he did so "willfully and maliciously," and these material words are not found in this indictment. I think, therefore, that the Circuit judge was entirely correct in following the law as laid down in State v. Sartor, 2 Strob. 61.

New trial granted.

NANCY E. CRAIG and ROBERT J. CRAIG v. WILLIAM C. BEATTY, WILLIAM H. McCORKLE, Executors, and Others.

Testatrix died in 1860, and directed her executors to place a sum of money in the hands of W. W. and W. H. M., "who are earnestly requested and directed to place said sum of money at interest, and to expend said interest as it annually accrues, in providing clothing" and other articles for the comfort of certain negro slaves; and if the executors or said W. W. and W. H. M. are prevented "by any legal action and determination from carrying out" these "provisions and injunctions," or at the death of said negroes, then said sum of money to others (white persons.) Held, that testatrix intended to create a trust for the benefit of slaves, and the bequest was therefore void under Section 4, of act of 1841, 11 Stat. 154.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Slaves, Cent. Dig. § 59; Dec. Dig. ⟸13.]

[2. Wills ⟸699.]

A failure for four years after probate of a will in common form to dispute the validity of its provisions cannot be construed into acquiescence in such provisions, nor does it bar the right to have the above-recited directions declared null and void.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Burkett v. Whittemore, 36 S. C. 433, 15 S. E. 616.

[3. Wills ⟸688.]

When a testatrix in her will intended a trust, which could not take effect, the property so intended will pass either to the residuary legatees, or to the distributees under the statute, according to the terms of the will.

Before Hudson, J., at York, March Term, 1878.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs against William C. Beatty and William H. McCorkle, executors of the will of Nancy Blair, and certain negroes mentioned in the second section of said will, and certain other persons named in this same section, who were to take the legacy and interest, if the negroes should not be permitted to enjoy the interest. The section of the will construed by the court is set forth in the opinion. The negroes mentioned in the will were slaves of testatrix. Testatrix died in October, 1860, and her will was admitted to Probate in York district in November of the same year. The William Wright and William H. McCorkle referred to in the second section were also appointed executors of the will, but William Wright having died before testatrix, she substituted, by a codicil, William C. Beatty as executor, but not as trustee.

*The Circuit judge held that the second section of the will was null and void, so far as it regards these negro slaves; and the negroes appealed to this court.†

Mr. James F. Hart, for appellants.

Mr. C. E. Spencer, for respondents.

April 2d, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. The appellants, Jacob and Isaac Blair and Jane Woody, were slaves, belonging to the testatrix, and claim under the second section of her will, which is as follows: "I will and enjoin that the sum of two thousand dollars be reserved by my executors and placed in the hands of William Wright and William H. McCorkle, who are earnestly requested and directed to place said sum of money at interest, and expend the interest, as it annually accrues, in providing clothing, sugar, coffee, and such other necessaries and articles as they may deem proper for the comfort of the negroes, Isaac, Jacob, Adeline, and such other of my negroes that may be alive at my death, during their natural lives, and at their death, or if my executors or the individuals first named in this section of my will be prevented by any legal action and determination from carrying out the provisions and injunctions of this 'second' section, then, and in that case, the said principal and interest not expended by said legal proceedings, or otherwise, are to be equally divided between Mary, Margaret and John Blair," and others.

The action is brought by these legatees or their legal representatives. The former slaves are made parties, and their right, if they have any, is the question before this court, they being the only parties who appeal. The Circuit judge decided that as regards these appellants, the second section of the will which relates to them is null and void under the fourth section of the act of 1841, which is as follows: "That every devise or bequest to a slave or slaves, or to any person upon a trust or confidence, secret or expressed, for the benefit of any slave or slaves, shall be null and void." 11 Stat. 154. It is argued in behalf of the *appellants that the gift to Wright and McCorkle is not obnoxious to the said act, because it is neither a bequest to slaves nor a trust secret or expressed for their benefit, but is a provision for the necessary support of the slaves under the act of 1740. That act imposes a duty upon the owner of a slave, and a penalty for its non-observance. It is a mistake to think that the bequest to Wright and McCorkle constituted a gift to the owners of the slaves. It is argued that the slaves were not disposed of by the will, and that the legal title remained in the executors, and that the bequest was to the executors. Such, however, is not the fact. It is true that Wright and

†The Reporter has not been furnished with the brief.

McCorkle were appointed executors, but Wright died in the lifetime of the testatrix, and by a codicil William C. Beatty was made executor in his stead, but was not substituted in his place in the other capacity. Besides, the testatrix herself draws the distinction that in the one character they, as individuals, or in the other, as executors, they may be prevented from executing her wishes. But they are actually different persons, so that argument is without foundation. This fact draws a wide distinction between the present case and that of Ford v. Porter, 11 Rich. Eq. 238, on which the appellants mainly rely. But the extent to which Ford v. Porter goes on that subject is that an absolute gift to the owner of a slave is not impaired by an accompanying but purely precatory recommendation that the gift be applied to the support of certain of his (the donee's) slaves in their old age. "That a gift to enable the legatee to confer a bounty is not a trust, but a beneficial legacy. How (the court asks) can a gift to the master be a legacy or benefit to the slave, except at the master's discretion?" Id. 255. That whole case hung upon the point that the gift of the slaves and the gift of the money to the same legatees were respectively absolute gifts, without any trust, and that the recommendations with regard to the treatment of the slaves and the use of the money were in no sense imperative. But in the case before us the language of the will admits of no such construction. The executors are directed to place the money in the hands of Wright and McCorkle for certain purposes distinctly stated. There is no gift to them personally, with a mere request or recommendation on the part of the testa*trix, submitting its execution wholly to their own discretion. On the contrary, her directions are in the plainest terms imperative and mandatory. The donees are "directed" to invest the money and to apply the interest exclusively for the benefit of others, and in the event that they be "prevented by any legal action and determination from carrying out the provisions and injunctions of this 'second' section, then" she directs them to turn the money over to certain persons whom she names as her legatees. A power in the nature of a trust is thus conferred upon them, and nothing more. It is difficult to find room to doubt the intention of the testatrix not to give anything to Wright and McCorkle for their own benefit, and there is no room to doubt the plain legal meaning of her language.

For the distinction between precatory and mandatory expressions, "the one inclining, the other compelling" the donee "to execute the purpose," we need only refer to the language of Lord Eldon, as cited in Ford v. Porter, supra, and Ford v. Dangerfield, 8 Rich. Eq. 102, and to the authorities collected together upon the whole subject under the case of Harding v. Glyn, 2 Lead. Cas. in Eq., Part II., 1833, (4th ed.) *946, 957. In this case the words are imperative, the subject matter of the wish or direction is certain, the object or persons intended to have the benefit of the directions or wishes expressed are certain, and finally the taker has no discretionary power to withdraw the subject from the object to which it is directed by the testatrix. Those are the usual tests, and when they all exist, as in this case, the intention to create a trust cannot be questioned. Such trust is inhibited by the act of 1841, the cestuis que trust being slaves. The case of Fable v. Brown, 2 Hill Eq. 389, was decided in 1835. It held that a bequest to a slave was not void, and that a trust in his favor might be executed. The fourth section of the act of 1841 reverses such propositions directly, and that case is no longer authority upon the point.

The next ground is, that even if the section of the will under consideration be contrary to the act of 1841, still it is not void but voidable, and that being merely voidable the parties in interest may be estopped by actual acquiescence, or by what must be legally construed to be acquiescence. The case of Ford v. Porter, *supra, is cited to show that such gift in trust for the benefit of slaves, is only voidable and not void until so adjudicated. There is no such point in that case. It is, however, held in Vose v. Hannahan, 10 Rich. 465, that a gift of slaves declared by Section 3 of the act of 1841 to be void, is void only for the benefit of the distributees or next of kin of the donor, "but is good as against the donor or administrator." By reference to the case and to the act, it will be seen that the cause which led to such conclusion under Section 3 of the act does not exist with regard to Section 4, and that as to the latter, no such conclusion has ever been reached. Even if such could be the decision here, it would be of no force for the purpose to which the appellants endeavor to apply it. For it cannot be denied that the proper parties to test the voidability of the bequest are before the court. It seems to be admitted. And the appellants rely solely upon the ground that these parties are estopped by acquiescence. The Circuit judge decides that there was no actual acquiescence, and we see no evidence to disturb such finding.

It is contended, however, in behalf of the appellants, that there has been acquiescence by operation of law. That more than four years having elapsed since the probate of the will, and since the parties have all been of age, that they are barred, and they rest upon the case of Kinard v. Riddlehoover, 3 Rich. 258, and the act of 1839. That case and the act mean nothing more than that parties are barred from requiring proof in solemn form after four years' acquiescence in the probate in common form; time running against those who were infants at the time of probate after they come of age. Parties are only precluded from disputing the testamentary character of the instrument, the execution of the will; but the court before which the will is brought for construction is not precluded, nor are the parties in interest. The testamentary character of the instrument is not in question at all. The parties claim under it. The executors ask instructions as to its legal meaning. Acquiescence in the probate is not acquiescence in all or any of the provisions of the instrument. It may be a will and yet all its provisions may be void. Examination of Kinard v. Riddlehoover, supra, and the subsequent proceedings between the parties, in 1 Hill Eq.

376, will show clearly *that the principles therein enumerated are not at all applicable to the point named in the present case. We must decide, therefore, that there has been no acquiescence, and the bequest, even if not ab initio void, but only voidable, cannot be sustained in behalf of the appellants. It was, perhaps, unnecessary, to consider the question, but it was urged, and it has received the fullest consideration.

The last ground is, that whatever may have been the law when the will went into effect, it does not now prohibit a bequest to these persons who have been emancipated and are able to take and to hold property. That question has been conclusively determined in Blakely v. Tisdale, 14 Rich. Eq. 95. Nothing is more familiar than that "if the testator meant to create a trust and not to make an absolute gift, but the trust is ineffectually created or is not expressed at all, or fails, the next of kin take." The testatrix in this case evidently was in doubt as to this bequest, and has selected the legatees to whom the money should go in the event that her bequest for the benefit of the slaves should not be sustained. The will was probably drawn before the case of Ford v. Porter was decided, and the testatrix died before the case was reported. The provision she attempted to make was, however, so dubious in its validity that she went on, and in that event disposed of the property. But the bequest was unquestionably void under the act, and that view is fully sustained by the reasoning throughout in Ford v. Porter. The money, therefore, or the right to the money, went at once to the parties entitled under the statute of distributions or the provisions of the will, as the case might be. The constitutionality of the act of 1841 is made a question, but no reason being advanced to support it, and the court perceiving none to sustain such a view, it is deemed unnecessary to further discuss it. The judgment, so far as the appellants are concerned, is affirmed. Motion refused.

Appeal dismissed.

Before Kershaw, J., at Laurens, February Term, 1878.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff in the Court of Common Pleas for Laurens county against W. H. Langston and the other defendants, his sureties on his official bond as judge of probate for said county, for certain moneys which said Langston, as judge of probate, collected for said plaintiff and never paid over to said plaintiff or to his successor in office.

Langston was elected judge of probate for said county in June, 1868, and executed a bond, dated July 21st, 1868, of which the condition is as follows:

Whereas, the above-bound W. H. Langston hath been elected to the office of judge of probate for Laurens county—

Now the condition of the above obligation is such that if the above-bound W. H. Langston shall well and truly perform the duties of the said office, as now or hereafter required by law, during the whole period he may continue in said office, then the above obligation to be void and of no effect, or else to remain in full force and virtue.

*At the general election in 1870, one Powell was elected judge of probate for said county, but he never qualified or entered upon the duties of the said office, having been killed the day after said election. Langston, without executing a new bond, continued to discharge the duties of said office as judge of probate until the general elections in 1872.

The money sued for in this case was collected by Langston, as judge of probate, in May, 1872, on a bond given to same Langston, as Ordinary for Laurens district, on January 2d, 1860, and made payable to him as Ordinary and his successors in office.

The defence set up was that the judge of probate is elected for the term of two years only, and that the liability of his bondsmen is limited to that time; and the amount in question having been received by Langston after the two years for which he had been elected in 1868, and after the general elections in 1870, that his bond sureties were not liable.

The Circuit judge charged the jury as follows:

The bond is conditioned that the official shall well and truly perform the duties of said office, as now or hereafter required by law, during the whole period he may continue in said office. The constitution declares that the judge of probate shall be elected by the qualified electors of the respective counties for the term of two years.

The act approved February 14th, 1870, passed during the term of office of this officer, Mr. Langston, declares that the then "present county officers shall continue to perform the duties of their respective offices until their successors shall be elected and duly qualified."

The duty of continuing to perform the duties of their respective offices was covered by the condition of the bond. It was a duty imposed after the making of the bond, but the sureties expressly contracted to guarantee the performance of any duties that might thereafter be required by law.

This judge of probate did under the act continue to perform the duties of his office, in the default of a successor, and while so continuing he rightfully received the money claimed in this action and failed to pay it over. There is no controversy as to the facts, and therefore it is my duty to instruct you that the *plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount claimed, with interest from the day he is admitted to have received it, less his commissions on the same—two and one-half per cent. for receiving, and two and one-half per cent. for paying out the same.

All the defendants excepted to this charge.

The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, upon which judgment was rendered.

The defendants appealed to the Supreme Court from the decision rendered in this case upon the following grounds:

1. The defendant, Langston, as probate judge for said county, having received the money received from this case in 1872, some eighteen months after the term of office of the said Langston for which the other defendants had signed his official bond as sureties had expired, it is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in charging the jury that said sureties were liable for said amount under said bond.

2. The defendant sureties being bound by the bond for the acts of the said Langston only for the term of office for which he had been elected, and the said term having expired in November, 1870, and the money in this case having been received by the said Langston in 1872, while he was holding over, it is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in holding as matter of law that said sureties were responsible for the amount, and so charge the jury.

Messrs. Simpson & Holmes, for appellants.

1. The sureties of Langston cannot be held liable for any defalcation of their principal after the expiration of the term for which he was elected, because their contract was for that period and no longer. They had, and could have had, no conception, at the time they executed the bond, that he would or could hold for a longer time than that for which he was elected. Chitty on Con. 454; 2 Hill 591; 1 McC. 41; Const., Art. IV., § 20; 5 Rich. Eq. 227.

2. Langston had no common law right to hold over after his term of office had expired. 30 Barb. 193; S. C., 8 Abb. 359.

3. The legislature had no power, after his election and during *his term of office, to extend it beyond the two years for which he was elected, and thereby extend the liabilities of the sureties to his bond. The act was unconstitutional and void. 1 McC. 250; 46 N. Y. (1 Sick.) 57; 52 N. Y. (7 Sick.) 374; 53 N. Y. (8 Sick.) 648.

4. While the legislature had no power to continue his term beyond the two years, so as to extend the liabilities of the said sureties, yet the said Langston, holding under the said act, and thereby under color of title, could legally turn over the papers of his office to himself, as his own successor de facto. And having thus turned the bond in question over to himself, (though without giving a new bond,) the sureties to his bond under his former term are not liable for any misappropriation of the funds thereafter collected on the bond for the respondent's intestate. 7 S. C. 21; 3 Keyes 447; 19 How. 323; 14 How. 315; 24 Barb. 587; 1 Desaus. 452.

5. The language in the condition of the said bond is, in itself, indefinite, and must be restrained and limited by the period for which the law authorized his election, i. e., two years. And the legal intent and meaning of it is, that he would faithfully discharge such duties as the law then required, or should at any time during the two years require to be performed within the said two years, or so much of that time as he should continue in said office. 6 East 511; 2 Saund. 412; 1 T. R. 295; 5 B. & P. 175.

6. "Holding over" was not a duty imposed by the condition of the bond. 1st. Because it could not be required to be performed within the two years. 2d. It was not a duty within the scope of the office at all, but a continuation of all the duties of the office beyond the official term. New duties imposed by law during the term, to bind the sureties must be of a "similar nature and character to those already devolving on the incumbent." 36 N. Y. (9 Tiff.) 459; 3 Abb. N. C. 252; 1 Tr. App. 209.

Messrs. Todd & Ferguson, for respondents.

1. The defendant, Langston, is indisputably liable for the moneys mentioned in the brief, whether he was probate judge *according to law or not; and, therefore, the appeal must be dismissed as to him.

2. The sureties on Langston's bond are liable for these moneys, received in May, 1872, because he continued to be probate judge down to and after that date, under the provisions of the act of February, 1870, (14 Stat. 338); and because according to their bond, they bound themselves that he should "well and truly perform the duties of said office, as now or hereafter required by law, during the whole period he may continue in said office."

The act of 1870 continued him in office till the election and qualifying of a successor, in 1872. No good objection can be made to that act, because: 1st. It was not in conflict with the constitution of the state, for the constitution does not provide either that a probate judge's exercise of his office shall terminate in two years after his election, or that the holding of an election for a successor shall create a vacancy when the election cannot be made of effect. 2d. Nor is the act in the nature of an ex post facto law, for that description applies only to criminal laws. 8 Peters 110. 3d. Nor is the act objectionable as impairing the obligation of a contract, for these terms are applicable only to laws which attempt to diminish or discharge obligations. If liable to any objection, that law is to be objected to as retrospective in its action, inasmuch as it may be said that it continues the liabilities of sureties beyond the period contemplated at the execution of the bond. But the sureties took the chances of the probate judge continuing in office longer than two years, as the language of the condition states. Besides, retrospective statutes, to be objectionable, are those only which discharge or impair existing obligations, or deny rights of action previously existing, or divest vested rights. Potter's Dwarris on Stat. 162, and note; 1 Kent Com. 455; 2 Peters 380.

3. But conceding that Langston was not de jure probate judge in May, 1872, he certainly was de facto. Being such, and such under color of law, (act of February, 1870,) a stranger was authorized to pay him money due that officer. 1 Rich. Eq. 177.

4. But admitting that Langston's term of office expired in October, 1870, and that he was not thereafter judge of probate, his duty was to turn over the bonds in his office to the clerk of *the Court of Common Pleas (there being, as is said, a vacancy in judge of probate's office.) When he failed so to do, there was a breach of his bond, for which his sureties were clearly liable. The case of Black v. Ramey, 4 Strob. L. 79, is full upon this point. And the doctrines enunciated in 1 Rich. Eq. 177, and 5 Rich. Eq. 491, are to the same effect. It is therefore immaterial which horn of the dilemma the appellants take—either that Langston was or was not probate judge in May, 1872.

5. The constitution of the state provides that the probate judge shall hold his office "for the term of two years." The sureties of Langston as judge of probate contracted for his faithful performance of all duties appertaining to his office so long as he (Langston) should continue in office. That he continued to discharge the duties of his office until after May, 1872, is not denied. It may be claimed, however, that after the expiration of two years the bond was voluntary, and therefore not binding on the sureties. A bond is not void merely because it is voluntary; nor is a voluntary bond void because the condition is for the faithful performance of the obligator's duty to the public. 1 Bail. L. 211; 5 Peters 128.

April 2d, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. The statement is, that this was an action brought by the plaintiff against Langston and the other defendants, his sureties on his official bond as judge of probate, for certain moneys collected by the said Langston, judge of probate, for said plaintiff, but not paid over either to the said plaintiff or to his (Langston's) successor in office. Langston was elected judge of probate in June, 1868, and gave his bond, which is conditioned that he "shall well and truly perform the duties of the said office as now or hereafter required by law, during the whole period he may continue in office." The money was collected on a bond which was in the Court of Probate when Langston took possession as judge of probate in 1868. It was collected in May, 1872, nearly two years after the time when, according to law, the term for which Langston had been elected in 1868 had expired. The defense set up by the sureties was, that the judge of probate is elected for two years only, and that the liability of the *bondsmen is limited to that time; and the amount in question having been received by Langston after the two years for which he had been elected in 1868, and after the general elections in 1870, that his bond sureties were not liable. The Circuit judge charged in substance that the condition of the bond obligated Langston and his sureties to the performance of the duties of the office by Langston "as now (then) or hereafter (thereafter) required by law during the whole period he may continue in said office," applied not only to any change in the nature of those duties, but also to an alteration in the duration of the office. And that an alteration in the duration of the office having been effected by the act of February 14th, 1870, by which the judge of probate was continued in office after the expiration of his term and until his successor had been elected and had qualified, and a default having been committed by him while performing the duties of the office during the time intervening between the expiration of his term and the election and qualification of his successor, that his sureties were liable. The appeal is from the judge's charge.

The first question is, whether the judge of probate was continued in office by the act of February 14th, 1870, entitled "An act to provide for a general election of county officers," and of which Section 2 says: "That the present county officers shall continue to perform the duties of their respective offices until their successors shall be elected and duly qualified." If this act was intended to apply to the judges of probate, Section 2 is, to that extent, unconstitutional and void. The constitution, Article IV., Section 20, provides that "a Court of Probate shall be established in each county. * * * The judge of said court shall be elected by the qualified electors of the respective counties for the term of two years." How said office shall be filled when a vacancy occurs is provided for by Section 11 of the same article: "All vacancies in the Supreme Court or other inferior tribunal shall be filled by election as herein prescribed; provided, that if the unexpired term do not exceed one year, such vacancy may be filled by executive appointment." In no event other than that of an unexpired term not exceeding one year, can the office be filled except by an election "by the qualified *electors of the respective counties, for the term of two years." For that is the manner "prescribed" in the constitution, Article IV., Sections 11 and 20. It has been said at length, in so many cases, that it is unnecessary here to repeat further than by saying that when the constitution expressly ordains, the subject is to that extent taken away from the legislative body of the government, and can neither be altered nor repealed. Section 20 is imperative: "Shall be elected * * * for the term of two years." Section 11 is equally so: "All vacancies * * * shall be filled by election as herein [Section 20] prescribed." In this case, there was no portion of an unexpired term, and the executive could not have exercised his power of appointment. The vacancy was occasioned by the legal expiration of the term to which the officer had been elected. To fill the office otherwise than by regular election, as prescribed in the constitution, is a palpable attempt to violate the constitution, and cannot be allowed to stand. The Circuit judge instructed the jury thus: "The judge of probate did, under the act, (act of February 14th, 1870,) continue to perform the duties of his office in the default of a successor, and while so continuing he rightfully received the money claimed in this action and failed to pay it over," and that therefore the sureties were liable. We are unable to concur in the view that Langston "rightfully received the money," although if he had rightfully kept it and paid it over to the proper parties when demanded, that question would be of no moment. But, as things are, it is of importance. Langston could not hold his office beyond the period of two years fixed by law, and, whatever the wording of the official bond, his sureties are only liable for default committed by him during the time that he was in office. We think, too, that the words in the condition of the bond refer to the nature of the duties and not to alteration in the duration of the office. But if the latter was the meaning, it has no legal effect, for the duration of office could not be changed except by amendment to the constitution. Langston could not "rightfully receive" the money on the bond unless he received it as judge of probate, for the bond was payable to the Ordinary and his successors in office, and had been turned over to the Court of Probate and become, under the law, payable to the judge of probate. *But Langston was not judge of probate at the time he collected the money—May, 1872—his term having expired nearly two years before, and therefore he could not "rightfully receive." If he had been entitled to collect the money in May, 1872, his sureties on the official bond given for the term running from 1868 to 1870, could not be held liable, for he could not lawfully collect the money unless he lawfully held the bond, with a power to collect, which could not be unless he was judge of probate at the time. If he had been judge of probate in May, 1872, the fact that he collected the money on the bond would be conclusive evidence of the fact that the bond had been properly turned over, by the judge of probate holding from 1868 to 1870, to his successor holding from June, 1870, to June, 1872. The fact that both are the same person makes no difference in this respect, for the terms of the offices are distinct and separate, and if there is evidence that at the expiration of the first term, the funds were properly turned over to the successor, although the person be the same, the sureties on the official bond for the first term are thereby discharged. Vaughan v. Evans, 1 Hill Eq. 414; Field v. Pelot, McM. Eq. 370; Enicks v. Powell, 2 Strob. Eq. 196.

The case of Vaughan v. Evans is questioned by Harper, Ch., (who delivered the opinion in it,) in the subsequent case of Field v. Pelot, but the explanation of Vaughan v. Evans, by Johnson, Ch., in his separate opinion in Field v. Pelot, is very satisfactory, and is clear on this point, that in Vaughan v. Evans it was held "that a surety is discharged if no act of mal-administration was committed during his time; provided he can show that at the expiration of that time the trust fund passed into hands lawfully entitled to the possession of it." Page 400.

The case has always been recognized as authority, and the same doctrine is upheld in Street v. Laurens, 5 Rich. Eq. 227. But the facts, as admitted, show that Langston went out of office in June or July, 1870, and that up to May, 1872, when this money was collected by him, there had been no qualified successor, and that he, Langston, had remained in possession of the bond. It is further admitted that there has, since May, 1872, been a judge of probate in that county, and that Langston has failed to turn over to him either the bond or the money in ques*tion. It is manifest that he could not turn over the bond, for the money had been collected and the bond given up before his successor had been elected. One of the duties of the office for which the sureties are liable is to turn over the property and funds in the office to the successor. Anything not then properly accounted for is a devastavit, and, by legal presumption, it was committed during the term. The view on this point is thus expressed by Harper, Ch., in Field v. Pelot, p. 384: "If a guardianship should be revoked, and so continue, the surety would be liable for everything which the guardian had received up to that time and should afterwards fail to pay over. Nor would it be necessary to show that the guardian had actually wasted the funds, or committed any act of mal-administration before the revocation. But if, after the revocation, the guardian, as an individual, should obtain the unauthorized possession of a part of the infant's estate, the surety would not be held liable for that."

The defence contained in the last sentence cannot be set up in this case, for Langston had received the bond in his official character. These sureties would have had a good defence if Langston had been his own legal successor. That defence, however, is prevented by the facts as admitted, and they, the sureties, are obliged to rest solely upon the ground that the wrong was committed after he, Langston, went out of office. By the law as above expressed, that defence cannot avail, nor should it; for the sureties are bound for whatever comes into the hands of the office while he holds his trust, if it is received by him under the trust. They pledge themselves to a given amount that their principal will not commit a breach, or that if he does they will be responsible, and upon such security the interests of many depend, and demand protection. But the point is decided in Lowndes v. Pinckney, 1 Rich. Eq. 155. In that case the commissioner in equity had not turned over to his successor a bond given to him as commissioner in equity, but had retained it and collected the money on it. The court says: "It [the bond] was not delivered over to his [the commissioner's] successor within the period prescribed by law, nor for six years afterwards. * * * In the judgment of the court, the sureties of Mr.

*Elliott [the commissioner] are responsible for the sums thus received by him in consequence of this neglect or violation of duty. * * * It may be that Mr. Elliott supposed himself entitled to retain the bond and receive the money, either as receiver or as private agent of the parties, and that he was not bound to deliver it over to his successor under the provisions of the act of 1821. But this error of judgment does not alter the consequences of the act."

That case made a stronger showing for the sureties than this, and there was a difference of opinion among the members of the court; but we follow its decision upon the point in question, and especially are we relieved from any doubt in so doing, for the reason that the principal grounds for the dissenting opinions do not exist at all in this case. Besides, the sureties rest here upon technical defence. It is plain that it was thought that Langston was continued in office by the act of February, 1870, and that the old bond remained as security. For if that had not been thought, a new bond would have been required. If the sureties had any doubt upon that subject, they had their remedies, and could have prevented any waste by Langston. They are held by this decision simply to their original liability, for the safe keeping and proper accounting concerning all that went into Langston's hands as judge of probate during the two years, 1868–1870, and no more. While the Circuit judge may not have expressed the law as it is viewed by this court, his conclusion of law was correct, and we see no reason why a new trial should be granted. As the facts admitted stand, the sureties are legally liable, and if the charge of the judge had been in accordance with these views, the conclusion would have been the same, and could not have changed the result. The attempt on the part of Langston to appeal is without any foundation; the facts show his liability, whatever had been the decision with regard to his sureties.

The judgment is affirmed. Motion refused. Appeal dismissed.

[3. Judgment ⇐614.]

A judgment recovered against a sheriff, after the expiration of his term for moneys received while in office, is no bar to a subsequent action against the sheriff and the sureties on his official bond, jointly executed, alleging breaches generally and setting forth the recovery of this judgment against him, and his failure to pay the same.

[This case is also cited in State ex rel. Slay v. Williams, 19 S. C. 62, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Northrop, J., at Abbeville, September Term, 1877.

H. S. Cason gave his bond as sheriff of Abbeville county in August, 1868, with Charles W. Cowan and others, his sureties. His term of office expired in November, 1872. In January, 1869, Cason sold a lot of land under execution, and received the payment therefor. J. D. Cresswell, the plaintiff in this execution, moved for a rule against the sheriff requiring him to show cause why he had failed to pay over this money; and the rule was issued and served in June, 1873. In answer the sheriff alleged facts and asked a trial by jury, which was granted by the court. J. D. Cresswell having died, the proceeding was prosecuted by Thomas L. Coleman, his administrator.

The case came to trial April Term, 1875, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff.

Thomas L. Coleman, as administrator of *J. D. Cresswell, for the sum claimed, with interest from January 12th, 1869, to time of the verdict, and upon this verdict judgment was entered and costs amounting to $117 included. Nothing upon this judgment was realized from the defendant, Cason, and the return of nulla bona was entered upon the execution. This suit was brought October 29th, 1875, on the official bond containing the usual condition, against H. S. Cason and his sureties. At the trial, the court admitted the record of the judgment against Cason alone, as well as parol testimony against the other defendants.

The defendants asked that the following instructions be given to the jury:

1. That no suit can be maintained upon the sheriff's bond, without a previous order of court.

2. That suit cannot be maintained against Henry S. Cason jointly with other defendants; judgment having already been recovered on the same cause of action against H. S. Cason by J. D. Cresswell in his lifetime.

3. That plaintiff cannot recover upon an allegation of judgment recovered against Henry S. Cason alone; that the act of Henry S. Cason should be charged which renders his sureties liable.

4. That the complaint should be dismissed as stating no cause of action against the defendants.

5. That the demand for judgment for the penalty of the bond is irregular, and should have been only for the sum which it is alleged was received by H. S. Cason as sheriff.

6. That a single breach of the bond should have been assigned.

These instructions were refused and defendants excepted. The jury found a verdict for plaintiff for $1144.27, which included the principal, interest and costs in the case against Cason alone.

The defendants appealed from the judgment upon the grounds taken in their request to charge—and in appellant's argument the further position was taken, "that the liability of the sureties of the sheriff according to the bond is for the performance of his duty. The obligation does not include costs in cases against him alone, nor accumulation of interest by compounding in judgments."

Mr. J. S. Cothran, for respondents.

WILLARD, C. J. The action is against the sheriff and his sureties on his official bond, for failure to pay money received on executions. On the trial, which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff, the court refused certain requests to charge, and this refusal is the only ground of exception to the verdict. The first request involved the proposition that no suit can be maintained upon the sheriff's official bond without a previous order of the court. This objection is not well taken. The statute (Gen. Stat. 215, § 11,) provides that "the bond of any public officer in this state may, at all times, be sued on by the public, any corporation or private person aggrieved by any misconduct of any such public officer." The sheriff, in the execution of ordinary process, acts as a public officer, and is thus within the provisions of the statute. The principle that the courts will not permit one acting under their immediate orders and supervision to be sued for such action, independently of a due control over such proceedings, is inapplicable to such a case. If the objection had been valid it could not have been taken by way of charge. The time to raise the question would have been before the defendant had answered, as it involved the question of his obligation to answer. If, however, he submits to answer, the court would presume an order when necessary and not permit that fact to be put in issue in the cause.

It is objected that a recovery having been had against the sheriff for the misconduct alleged, he cannot be joined in the action on the official bond. Even if pleaded properly, which it was not, this is not a defence. The bond is a different cause of action from that on which the judgment was recovered. The bond is alleged as a joint bond, and the sheriff, as one of the joint obligors, was a proper party.

The next proposition is, that the plaintiff cannot recover upon an allegation of judgment recovered against Henry S. Cason alone, and that the act of Henry S. Cason should be charged, which rendered his sureties liable.

The last part of this propo*sition is contradictory to the complaint, which does allege the fraudulent withholding of money collected under execution. The first part of the proposition was equally objectionable. It appears from the brief that the record of the recovery against Cason, the sheriff, was only admitted on the trial as against him, and that parol testimony was submitted as against the sureties. The record of the recovery against the sheriff was clearly admissible against his sureties without previous proof of notice of the pendency of the suit against the sheriff and an opportunity to defend the same, and was prima facie evidence of a breach of the condition of the bond. Treasurers v. Temples, 2 Speers 48; Treasurers v. Burch, 2 Hill 519; Norton v. Wallace, 1 Rich. 507; S. C., 2 Rich. 460. Cases arising on official bonds stand on a different principle from those that were discussed by this court in Smith v. Moore, 7 S. C. 209 [24 Am. Rep. 479]. In the class of cases there considered, the surety or administrator was to be considered as in some sense interested, directly or indirectly, in the subject matter of the action against the principal or party indemnified, and, as such, should not be bound by such judgment unless an opportunity had been afforded him to protect such interest. Hence the necessity for notice and an opportunity to defend. The contract of the surety on an official bond has reference to the general conduct of the officer within the sphere of his office, and not to his particular conduct in cases and transactions that should arise in the discharge of his official duties, and therefore they have no concern or interest to protect in an action brought against such public officer by one aggrieved by his misconduct. The law presumes that a judgment recovered against the principal rests on sufficient grounds of proof, but allows that presumption to be rebutted by proper evidence. It does not appear that any evidence rebutting such presumption was submitted to the jury in the present case, and therefore it was competent to rest the verdict on such judgment as proof of official misconduct. The objection that the complaint does not state a cause of action, has no foundation.

The fifth and sixth requests to charge relate to matter waived by failure to demur or answer.

An objection was discussed in the argument on the ground *that the verdict should not have included costs recovered against the sheriff, but no such exception appears on the record, showing a defect in the charge in that respect, and it cannot be considered.

The appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

IDA WEBB, BURWELL McBRIDE, SARAH McBRIDE and WILLIAM McBRIDE v. THE GRANITEVILLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY and CHARLES L. PAUL.

[Corporations ⊂⊃134.]

Certain stock stood upon the books of a corporation in the name of two persons "executors of M." It was then transferred to "P., guardian," and a certificate issued in the same name. P. was in fact guardian of minor children of M. P. endorsed the certificate and put it in hands of D., an attorney-at-law, for safe keeping. Under a petition in P.'s name, setting forth that this stock was the property of P.'s wards under the will of M., D. procured an order from the Circuit judge permitting a sale and re-investment. D. then assigned the certificate to a bank as collateral security for the repayment of money borrowed for his own purposes. Failing to repay, stock was sold, and purchased by the bank by whom it was afterwards transferred to H., president of the bank, who was also president of the corporation, and to G.; transfers being made on the corporation books from "P., guardian," to the bank, and from the bank to H. and G. Held, that P. held as trustee, and that the books of the corporation, the certificate of stock and the order of the judge (which alone could give authority to the guardian to sell, and a knowledge of which, therefore, must have been had by the purchaser,) were sufficient to put H. upon inquiry, and so charge him with a knowledge of the trust and conversion; and that his knowledge in this matter was the knowledge of the corporation of which he was the president.

Before Reed, J., at Beaufort, November Term, 1877.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the court. The order for the sale of the stock, referred to in the opinion, together with the petition therefor, is as follows:

*State of South Carolina, Beaufort county. In the Circuit Court.

To the Honorable Judges of the said Court:

The humble petition of Charles L. Paul showeth, that under the appointment of the Court of Probate, he is the guardian of the persons and estates of four infants, children of William McBride, deceased: that under the last will and testament of Burwell McBride, the grandfather of the said infants, (and of your petitioner,) he has in trust for the said infants, besides other property,——— shares of the capital stock of the Graniteville Manufacturing Company; that he is fully persuaded a change of the investment will materially promote the interests of his wards; that in due course of proceeding, he filed approved bonds with the judge of probate for the said county. Wherefore your petitioner, with full appreciation of his responsibility in the premises, prays your Honors' assent that he may, at his own discretion, so re-invest the said stock for the benefit of his said wards. And your petitioner, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

Davant, Solicitors pro pet.

Order.

On hearing the petition of Charles L. Paul, guardian, and on motion of Messrs. Davant—

It is ordered that the said guardian have leave to sell, transfer and re-invest the said stock in his said petition mentioned, whenever and in such manner as, in the exercise of sound judgment and discretion, it shall appear to him advisable for the best interests of his said wards; provided, his guardianship bonds continue to be satisfactory to the judge of probate for the said county, and he, the said guardian, make regular and proper accounting, as by law is required.

December 9th, 1870.

At Chambers. (Signed) Z. Platt, Circuit Judge.

The Circuit degree is as follows:

The material facts in this case, as gathered from the pleadings and evidence, appears to be as follows: That the defendant, *Charles L. Paul, was appointed guardian of the plaintiffs by the Probate Court of Beaufort county, on or about the 9th day of June, 1870; that at that time there was standing on the books of the defendant corporation, the Graniteville Manufacturing Company, certain stock in the names of F. W. Fickling and John M. Hill, executors, without naming the person of whom they were executors. But it was proven by the defendant, Paul, that the testator was one Burwell McBride, who was the grandfather of plaintiffs, and who had been long deceased, and that plaintiffs, through another, had an interest in the said stock; that on the 19th day of July, 1870, forty-nine shares of the stock of the defendant company were transferred by F. W. Fickling and John M. Hill, executors, to Charles L. Paul, guardian, to whom the usual certificate was issued, and the number of shares therein named afterwards stood in the stock-ledger of the said company in the name of Charles L. Paul, guardian, as he was described in the certificate.

The names of his wards were not disclosed in the transaction, nor does it appear that plaintiffs are the persons, and that the forty-nine shares of stock were of their estate, otherwise than by the testimony of Paul himself. The fact, however, has not been questioned that on or about the 12th day of December, 1870, the said Charles L. Paul, guardian, transferred and delivered the said certificate of stock to J. C. Davant, by his endorsement on the back of the same, in the presence of two witnesses, and on the 26th day of December, of the same year, the said

John C. Davant, claiming to be the absolute owner thereof, transferred the said certificate of stock, in due form, to the "Savings Bank of Augusta, Georgia." That afterwards, upon the surrender of the said certificate to the defendant company, thus endorsed and assigned, a new one for forty-nine shares of its capital stock was issued to the said "Savings Bank of Augusta, Georgia," and subsequently thereto the bank sold and transferred the said stock, for its full value, to H. H. Hickman and Samuel Giles, to whom, upon the surrender of the scrip held by the bank, a new certificate for forty-nine shares of their capital stock was issued, and they are now, so far as appears, the holders and owners of the same. It is claimed that the defendant company were trustees *of plaintiffs, who were the legal owners of the forty-nine shares of stock in question, and sought to make them liable for a breach of trust in permitting the transfer from Paul, guardian, to his assignee, without their knowledge or consent. As a basis to rest this claim upon, it charged that the defendant company had notice that the forty-nine shares of stock standing in the name of Charles L. Paul, guardian, was in fact their estate. The testimony in the case, which was all derived from plaintiffs' witnesses, fails to sustain the charge, and is direct to the point that the defendant company had no knowledge whatever as to the ownership of the stock, other than that it stood on their books in the name of Charles L. Paul, guardian. It appears, from certain informal papers exhibited with the complaint, that a proceeding was instituted in the Common Pleas for Beaufort county, in December, 1870, by John C. Davant, claiming to be attorney for Paul, guardian, to obtain authority for the sale of the forty-nine shares of stock standing in his name. That proceeding even did not disclose the names of his cestui que trust, but an order was nevertheless obtained from a judge, at chambers, authorizing a sale and re-investment. The order was assumed by plaintiffs' counsel as having been made without warrant of law, and as void on several accounts, but was not alluded to in the argument for the defendant company. I do not perceive what value could be attached to it in the cause, unless, through it, notice could have been brought home to the defendant company. That was not done, and, according to the view I take of the case, it is not necessary to pass upon the question raised by that proceeding. The defendant, Charles L. Paul, answering the complaint through plaintiffs' counsel, admits his liability to account, and the single question remaining in the case, therefore, as I understand it, is, did the "Graniteville Manufacturing Company," by permitting the transfer of the forty-nine shares of stock, standing on its books in the name of Charles L. Paul, guardian, to his assignee, make themselves liable under the circumstances as for a breach of trust, for which they should be held to account to plaintiffs?

The case of Bayard v. Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank, of Philadelphia, 52 Penna. St.

232, and of Magwood v. Rail*road Bank, 5 S. C. 379, was chiefly relied upon to fix their liability, whilst the same cases were quoted as authority for the defendant's company. In the first of these cases, the plaintiff held certain certificates of stock, issued to him in the name of Thomas F. Bayard, trustee of Mary Gilpin, and the stock so stood on the books of the banks. By power of attorney duly executed, he authorized his vendee of one of the certificates to transfer the shares named to himself. This the bank refused to permit until it had been referred to their solicitor to ascertain and report the nature of the trust. Whereupon, a friendly action upon a case stated was instituted to determine whether the bank was liable for damages on account of its refusal to allow the transfer. The court held that inasmuch as the name of the cestui que trust, Mary Gilpin, was disclosed in the certificate, and upon their books, the bank was justified in refusing to permit the transfer without the production of some authority from her besides the certificate. In the opinion delivered the court says: "That although the legal right was in the plaintiff, he was not the owner. The person to be affected by the transaction was not himself, but Mary Gilpin, and hence the bank was justified in refusing to permit the transfer until some authority beyond the certificate was produced." In the course of the opinion, the case of Albert and wife v. City of Baltimore, 2 Md. 159, is cited, in which it was held that "the mere designation of the holder of the stock as trustee, without a specification of the trust, or naming the cestui que trust, is not such notice to the transfer agents as to make it their duty to look beyond the legal title, for it did not point to any source of information. The fiduciary character of the person in whose name the stock stood did not appear;" and in Stockdale v. South Sea Co., Barn. 363, the Lord Chancellor says: "It is certain that these great companies are only to consider the person in whose name the stock stands, unless the trust of the stock is disclosed on their books." After referring to other English and American authorities that have held the same doctrine, the statement of Chancellor Johnson, in delivering the opinion in Albert v. Savings Bank, 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 407, is quoted as follows: "These authorities must be understood as applying to cases where the fiduciary character appears, *but there is nothing to indicate the nature of the trust or the beneficiaries," and the court adds, "there is no case in which it has been ruled that a trustee of stock, whose certificate shows a declared trust for another named, has a right to transfer it without showing a power beyond his certificate." The case of Bayard v. Bank is, therefore, rather an authority as to how far the transfer agent will be justified in refusing to permit a transfer, than as to how far he may proceed in allowing it, without incurring responsibility. It decides that where the cestui que trust is known, the transfer should not be made without his consent; but when unknown, and no clue is given to his identification, as in this case, the transfer may be lawfully made. In Magwood v. Railroad Bank, H. M. Magwood was trustee of the plaintiff, Elizabeth C. Magwood, and held certain certificates of stock for her, which stood on the books of the bank in his name, as trustee of Elizabeth C. Magwood. Without her knowledge or consent, he sold certain of said certificates, and his vendee, under the power given him, was permitted to transfer the stock without question.

The proceeds of the sale were lost to the trust estate, and the action was brought against the bank to recover the value of the stock as improperly transferred. It was held that the bank was liable, "it appearing that the transfer occasioned the loss of the stock." In delivering the opinion the court says: "Inasmuch as the trust, in the present case, was declared on the books and face of the scrip to the extent of naming the cestui que trust, it follows that if the action of the trustee in disposing of the stock was without authority, and tended to defeat the object of the trust, the corporation is liable in equity to the extent of any damage sustained by reason of its co-operation with the trustee to that end." The bank having been held liable because the cestui que trust was known, and the transfer permitted without her authority, it follows that, as in the case of Bayard v. Bank, if the trust had not been declared, and the name of the cestui que trust disclosed, the transfer would have been justified. The case of Simons v. Railroad Bank, 5 Rich. Eq. 270, is to the same effect. In that case, the bank was held to account for stock improperly transferred, but the decree was predicated on the fact *that the nature of the trust and the names of the beneficiaries were set out in the certificates and stood upon the books of the bank, what was held to be distinct notice, and as furnishing such indications as, if followed up, must have led to the most complete information on the subject. The inference is, that if these disclosures had not been made, the bank would have been justified in making the transfer. The rule in Morse on Banks and Banking, p. 166, is stated thus: "Any person showing a prima facie right may demand a transfer to himself, and any officer who can properly make the transfer at all, will be protected in making it, without going behind the apparent legality and propriety of the demandant's rights in order to determine whether there is any hidden cause for objecting to it." And in Mount Holly Turnpike Co. v. Ferrer, 11 N. Y. Eq. 117, it is said that "a certificate of stock in a company, accompanied by a power of attorney authorizing the transfer of the stock to any person, is prima facie evidence of equitable ownership in the holder, and renders the stock transferable by the delivery of the certificate." Indeed, the rule as to the transfer of the stocks of incorporated companies by ordinary trustees seems to be settled, that if the name of the cestui que trust and real owner is disclosed, the transfer officer should require the production of some other authority besides the certificate before permitting the transfer; but if the names of the beneficial owners are not known, and there be no indication on the face of the scrip, or the books of the company, to put them on inquiry, they are not only justified, but may be compelled to permit the transfer by the prima facie owner, as evidence by the production of the usual power. But it was suggested by the plaintiffs' counsel that there is a distinction between the authority of an ordinary trustee and a guardian in making a transfer of stock, and that the rule was more stringent as to guardians. Without stopping to inquire into the difference in their powers, if there be any, I refer to the case of Bank of Virginia v. Craig, Guardian, 6 Leigh 339, which seems to have been well considered, and from which it appears that a guardian may transfer with more facility than an ordinary trustee.

In that case it was held that "bank stock standing in the name of F., guardian of C., may be sold and transferred by the *guardian, and the officers of the bank had no right to control or prevent him from transferring it on their transfer books." In delivering the opinion of the court, Tucker, J., says: "To concede to the bank the power of permitting or refusing the exercise of his legal power by a guardian, would indeed be of serious consequences. It would annihilate the admitted powers of the guardian over his ward's estate, it would arrest the discharge of his duties, and vest the inquiry into his conduct in the officers of the corporation instead of the courts of justice, or drive him to his mandamus or other processes against the bank, to compel its assent to a transfer. The bank has nothing to do with these official trusts. If the guardian defrauds his ward, his sureties are responsible; if the purchaser combines in the fraud, he, too, is chargeable, but the bank cannot interfere and arrest the transfer of its stock by the legal holder of the scrip upon such pretences. It would trammel and embarrass such transactions so as to impede materially that transferable character, which is one of the most valuable attributes of stock." In the case under consideration, the stock which it is sought to make the defendant company responsible for, on account of having unlawfully, as it is said, permitted its transfer from the real owners, was set out in the certificate and stood on their books in the name of Charles L. Paul, guardian; the nature of the trust was not indicated, nor the name of the beneficiaries given. Suppose they had been given, would that have estopped the company from permitting the transfer on presentation of the certificate? It was held otherwise in the Virginia case just referred to. Is the rule different in South Carolina? Has it been so adjudicated as to the office of guardian? If so, I have not been so fortunate as to find the case. The law in this state is so well settled that it is the first duty of a guardian to collect the personal funds and choses in action belonging to his ward, and invest the proceeds in bonds, secured by mortgages of real estate or government securities; that it would be a work of supererogation to cite authorities. Is the stock in a manufacturing company anything more than a chose in action, and if a guardian holding such stock permit it to stand and it is lost by the failure of the company, is there any doubt but he would be held liable for it on account of his neg*lecting a plain legal duty? I think not. It being his duty to collect and re-invest, which, in the case of stock, can only be done by a sale and transfer, shall the company that enabled him to do so, by permitting the transfer to his vendee upon the production of his warrant of attorney, be held guilty of a breach of trust? Or, to save themselves, must they require from the cestui que trust some other authority than the certificate and their own records? What authority? Infants cannot execute a power; would the letters of guardianship answer, or must he resort to a suit in equity, with its attendant delays, trouble and expenses?

If he do this, it may happen that before he gets the order the corporation may fail, and both guardian and ward, if his sureties be insufficient, be involved in the same ruin. It is bad policy to encumber these important fiduciary relations with restrictions not clearly deducible from the law, as it is extremely difficult now to get responsible persons to fill them. And it will be found at last that the interests of infants under guardianship will be best protected, and it is their only protection, by the integrity of their guardians, and the strength of their official bonds. I am of opinion, therefore, that upon general principles applicable to the office of guardian, the defendant company, in this case, would not have been guilty of breach of trust, even if the wards had been named and the transfer permitted upon the certificate alone, without it had been shown that they were guilty of some mala fides in connection therewith.

But, however that may be, as the case stands the stock appeared, prima facie at least, to belong to Charles L. Paul, guardian, and was transferred upon his warrant of attorney thus endorsed. It may have as well been Paul, trustee, or receiver, or agent, or prochein ami. Neither of these descriptions would have proved that there was any one behind to whom it applied as they are doubtless often used for a purpose without indicating an office. Nor did the addition of the word "guardian" at the end of his name furnish any sufficient indication to put transfer agent upon inquiry even, and therefore the defendant company committed no legal wrong by their agency in the transaction under consideration. To hold otherwise would, in my judgment, be to *rivet fetters upon the commercial and business transactions of the country, that would be highly prejudicial to the public interest.

It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the complaint, as to the Graniteville Manufacturing Company, be dismissed.

J. P. Reed.

January 15th, 1878.

From this decree the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

Messrs. Tracy & Tracy, for appellants.

A certificate of stock is a mere chose in action. 1 Saund. 210, note a; Bail. Eq. 147.

It was not a security of the guardian, but an equitable agreement by the company that in those shares some beneficiaries, not sui juris, had the exclusive usufruct, held in trust for them by a guardian.

The guardian had neither the legal nor equitable interest in the stock, and his endorsement transferred no interest. The legal interest is in the corporation.

In South Carolina the guardian is not possessed of any legal estate in his ward's chattels or choses. 4 Rich. Eq. 70; 9 Rich. Eq. 325; 3 Rich. Eq. 156; 3 S. C. 384; 7 Mass. 5.

Whence has a guardian his authority? By appointment of judge of probate. Gen. Stat. 573; 2 Kent. 226. His authority does not extend to power of transferring stock. 2 Kent 228. Statute does not define powers of guardians appointed by the court. Such powers over personal estate can extend only to its custody, direction and management. If he could sell forty shares of stock in 1870, he could have sold sixty shares in 1860. See 2 Smith (Penna.) 232; 5 S. C. 379.

The word "guardian" showed that infants were the real owners of this stock. The corporation alone can make a transfer; it is its duty to see that the person applying has in himself all the interest of the preceding owner. 2 Smith (Penna.) 232; 3 Am. Law Jour. 111; 14 Md. 299; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 407; 8 Am. Law Reg. 219; 14 Allen 523.

The names of wards not being disclosed may put corporation *to somewhat more trouble, but cannot affect the principle. Besides, they had knowledge how it was derived.

The order for leave to sell was of no efficacy; the petition was not signed by general guardian, no guardian ad litem appointed, infants were not parties, and the order was signed by a judge at chambers. 1 Abb. Forms 51; Code, §§ 138, 139, subd. 1, 2; 1 Hill Ch. 27; 4 Rich. Eq. 62; 9 Rich. Eq. 325; 7 Rich. Eq. 43; 3 S. C. 394; 14 Stat. 77, § 8.

The stocks were the specific chattels of the wards, and the guardian could not authorize the corporation to transfer. 1 Rich. 359; 2 Rich. 3; 12 Rich. 333; 9 Rich. Eq. 325; West. U. Tel. Co. v. Davenport, (Sup. Ct. U. S., Oct., 1878.)

See following as to defendant's liability for an illegal transfer: 2 Bright, 293; 2 P. Wms. 76; 14 Sim. 475; 28 Beav. 287; 2 Eden 299; Tan. C. C. Dec. 310; 4 Allen 277; 123 Mass. 110; 14 Md. 299; 7 N. Y. 274; 49 N. Y. 286; 4 Md. Ch. Dec. 357; 22 Eng. L. & Eq. 452; 7 Hurl. & Nor. 603; 58 N. Y. 322.

Messrs. Buist & Buist, for respondents.

Liability for illegal transfer is admitted, but here there is no knowledge of a trust. In 5 S. C. 379, and in 52 Penna. 223, there was such knowledge. But see 2 Md. 159, 168; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 407; Perry on Tr., § 242; 6 Leigh 339; 37 Geo. 515; Tan. C. C. Dec. 324; 7 Johns. Ch. 150; Barrett v. Cochran, 11 S. C., ante page 29.

These certificates of stock are negotiable instruments, and the company had no alternative but to make the transfer when demanded by a bona fide holder. 48 How. Pr. 427; 11 Rich. Eq. 344; 11 Wall. 369. The corporation does not make the transfer; it only records the transfer, and gives certificates of the fact. The title becomes perfect in the vendee upon assignment of certificate. Field on Corp., § 110; 46 N. Y. 325.

The crucial question is, did the mere word guardian, added to Paul's name, give the defendants notice of the trust? Such position of the appellants finds no support in the case relied on (Bail. Eq. 147) by them. In 3
Rich. Eq. 157, and 9 Rich. Eq. *311, relied upon by appellants to sustain position that guardian has no authority over ward's property, the property stood in the name of the wards, not in name of the guardian. In West. U. Tel. Co. v. Davenport the transfer was a forgery, and illegal under statute of Ohio unless by order of the Probate Court.

April 14th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. Paul, the guardian of the infant plaintiffs, took from the defendant corporation a certificate of shares of the capital stock of that corporation belonging to his wards in his own name as guardian. He placed it with a blank endorsement in the hands of Davant, his counsel, for purposes connected with his administration as guardian. Davant hypothecated the certificate to the Savings Bank of Augusta for money loaned for his personal use. Hickman, who was president of the bank, and also president of the Graniteville Manufacturing Company, purchased, with Giles, the stock from the bank, and had the stock transferred by the defendant corporation to such purchasers. To show authority on the part of Paul as guardian to sell the stock, an order of the Circuit judge of the second circuit was produced, claimed as authorizing the guardian to sell the stock for the purpose of changing the form of instrument. Objections were made to this order that need not be considered, for no sale of the nature authorized was made under it. As the title of the stock stood in the name of Paul and the beneficial interest in the plaintiffs, his wards, Paul was a trustee for plaintiffs' use. These relations were sufficiently declared by facts appearing on the face of the certificate and the books of the corporation. The stock previous to the transfer to Paul as guardian stood in the name of Fickling and Hill, as executors of Burwell McBride. The plaintiffs are the children of Burwell McBride. The transfer to Paul as guardian was made with full knowledge on the part of the corporation of the source from which information might have been derived as to the persons represented by Paul, and it must be assumed that the defendant corporation either had full knowledge of the persons entitled as beneficiaries under the trust, or improperly neglected to inform themselves on such subject. The company were, therefore, apprised of the rights of the parties and *occupy the same position as that of the defendants in Magwood v. Bank, 5 S. C. 379. Hickman could only derive title through the order of the Circuit judge, as he was chargeable with notice of the guardianship from the certificate itself, and, as we have just held, the guardian had no authority to sell the plaintiffs' beneficial interest in stock constituting an investment, independently of an order of the court for that purpose. McDuffie v. McIntyre, Post Case No. 720 [11 S. C. 551, 32 Am. Rep. 500]. The order discloses all that was essential to charge Hickman with full notice of the rights of the plaintiffs, both as wards of Paul and under the trusts with which he was charged. As Hickman's alleged title flows through that order, he is chargeable with notice of its contents. The order did not authorize the guardian to hypothecate the stock for the purpose of borrowing money. Such a transaction is neither within the terms or intention of the order, and cannot be justified under it. It must be assumed that Hickman saw the order and the proceedings upon which it was made, and from that he would be informed that Davant was the solicitor of Paul. In the absence of evidence showing that Hickman had reason to believe and did believe that Davant was a purchaser from Paul of the stock for a fair consideration, it must be assumed that Hickman dealt with Davant as the solicitor or agent of Paul. To hypothecate the stock was a breach of trust. If Hickman supposed that Davant had authority from Paul to hypothecate the stock, which is the assumption most favorable to Hickman, then his action must be regarded as assisting Paul to commit a breach of trust. As Hickman was president of the defendant corporation, that defendant is chargeable with notice of such breach of trust. It is in that case an instance of knowledge brought home to the agent of a corporation possessing full authority to act and actually acting as such in the matter to which the notice relates—the strongest case for charging a corporation with notice of matter known to its agent. It is unnecessary to consider the questions discussed by the Circuit judge, as they have no real application to the facts of the present case. The plaintiffs have lost their estate through a series of wrongful acts that would have been ineffectual for *that purpose but for the transfer of the stock on the books of the defendant corporation, and by the exercise of reasonable prudence and care on their part the loss might have been prevented.

The judgment dismissing the complaint as to the Graniteville Manufacturing Company must be reversed and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court for judgment for the plaintiffs against both defendants.

Decree reversed.

Before Kershaw, J., at Spartanburg, March Term, 1878.

These were two actions upon two promissory notes; each complaint was upon a promissory note in the usual form. They described the note sued on as if given by defendant alone. The notes were dated March 14th, 1877, and bore interest at rate of two per cent. after maturity, one of them being payable November 1st, and the other December 1st, next after their date.

At the trial, the two actions were consolidated. The defendant moved for a continuance, upon the ground of the absence of a material witness, whose attendance could not be secured because of his residence at a considerable distance and in another *county. The motion was overruled, and defendant excepted. The notes were produced in court; they were joint and several notes signed by one Dunaway and defendant. Defendant admitted his signature. He moved for a non-suit, upon the ground that the complaint did not contain such a plain and concise statement of facts as was required by the code to constitute a cause of action. The motion was overruled, and defendant excepted.

Verdict for plaintiff for amount demanded in the complaint—judgment accordingly.

Defendant appealed upon the following grounds:

1. That his Honor erred in overruling the motion for a continuance.

2. That his Honor erred in overruling the motion for a non-suit.

3. That his Honor erred in charging the jury that they must find a verdict for plaintiffs for the principal sum stipulated in the notes, and two per cent. interest a month, as demanded in the complaint.

Mr. John Winsmith, for appellant.

Messrs. Duncan & Cleveland, contra.

WILLARD, C. J. The first ground of appeal is that the Circuit judge refused a motion for a continuance on the ground of the absence of a material witness. The reasons for the refusal to continue are not stated, and we have no reason to conclude that any error of law was committed. If the Circuit judge concluded that the facts appearing did not warrant the conclusion that the defendant had used due diligence to procure the attendance of the witness, and that the failure to attend was through no fault on the part of the defendant, and that the witness was material to the defence, and that he would be prejudiced in his defence unless the attendance of such witness was compelled, the refusal of the motion to continue is not a proper subject of appeal to this court. This exception must be overruled.

*The second ground of appeal is the failure of the Circuit Court to grant a non-suit, on the ground that the complaint "did not contain such a plain and concise statement of facts as required by the code to constitute a cause of action." Where the allegations of a pleading are "so indefinite or uncertain that the precise nature of a charge or defence is not apparent, the remedy is by a motion, in due time, for an order requiring the pleading to be made definite and certain by amendment." Code, § 183. If such motion is not made in due time, it is waived. Such an objection should be taken before answer. Section 199 provides that "the court shall in every stage of action disregard any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which shall not affect substantial rights of the adverse party, and no judgment should be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect." This section precluded the Circuit judge from allowing the motion for a non-suit on the ground of informality alone. The only defect in the complaint that could be made available on the motion for a non-suit was that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; all other defects, excepting only want of jurisdiction, were cured by failure to demur or set them up by way of answer. Section 171. But, though the complaint might be defective in the statement of a sufficient cause of action, yet if the plaintiff had, without objection on that ground, supplied requisite proofs to entitle him to a judgment, it would be the duty of the Circuit judge to order immediate amendment without prejudice to the proceeding. It would appear, from the argument of the appellant, that the objection was that the notes in suit were declared upon as the notes of the defendant alone, and the notes produced were signed by the defendant and another person severally liable. No objection appears to the introduction of such notes in proof. The objection is merely to an alleged misdescription of the notes in the complaint. In law the notes were the several obligations of the defendant at the election of the plaintiff, and could be declared on as such. This objection must be overruled.

The third objection is that judgment was given for the amount of the notes, with interest at the rate of two per cent. a month *after maturity. That was the contract of the parties, and at the time it was made there was no law to invalidate it.

The subsequent act of 1877 (16 Stat. 325) fixes the rate of interest (Section 1) at seven per cent. on contracts from and after its passage. Section 2 of that act, presenting certain consequences to arise from establishing a greater rate of interest than that fixed by the first section, must be read as restricted to cases falling under the first section.

The appeal must be dismissed and the judgment affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

E. C. WILLIAMS, Treasurer of Stono Phosphate Company, v. WADE H. HARRISON and J. W. HARRISON.

(November Term, 1878.)

[Infants ⇐57.]

An infant who signs a note as surety may, after attaining his majority, ratify his contract of suretyship, and thereby become bound by the terms of such contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. § 137; Dec. Dig. ⇐57.]

Before Mackey, J., at Greenville, April Term, 1878.

The only point involved in this appeal is as to the liability of Wade H. Harrison, who affixed his name and seal to a single-bill as surety merely, he being, at the time, an infant. After he attained his majority, and before the single-bill became payable, he wrote a letter to the payee, the plaintiff, which, upon its face, purports to be a promise to pay the sealed note.

The Circuit judge gave the defendant, Wade H. Harrison, a judgment of dismissal, upon the ground that the contract was void, and that no action could be maintained thereon. The plaintiff appealed.

*Messrs. Blythe & Ansel, for appellants, contended that contract was voidable and not void, and cited 2 H. Bl. 511; Bing. on Inf. (1st Am. ed.) 8; Tyler on Inf. & Cov. 41, 48, 54–58; Pars. on Mer. Messrs. Earle & Wells, for respondent, contended that contracts from which an infant derives no benefit, (as in this case,) are not simply voidable, but are void ab initio. Authorities cited: 4 McC. 242; 2 H. Bl. 515; Tyler on Inf., § 9; 10 Pet. 70; Story on Con., §§ 39, 57; Story's Eq. Jur., § 241; Schouler on Dom. April 14th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The main question in this case is, whether a contract of suretyship made during minority, is, in judgment of law, actually void, so that no act of confirmation, after arriving at majority, could add validity to it. It must be conceded that the question is unsettled by judicial authority in this state. It is evident, from the language of the court in Little v. Duncan, 9 Rich. 58 [64 Am. Dec. 760], extending the decision in Cheshire v. Barrett, 4 McC. 241 [17 Am. Dec. 735], to the case of a sealed instrument made by an infant, that the general tendency in the courts to uphold the effect of ratification after arriving at maturity, on contracts made during minority, was participated in by the court that decided that case. In view of this tendency, clearly manifest, and the unsettled state of authority elsewhere, we feel at liberty to place the decision of the present case on grounds of reason.

It is the misfortune of this question that it has become entangled with what, at this day, is quite another and distinct *question, namely, that of the authority and duty of the courts to uphold the acts of an infant, on the grounds of their manifest advantage to such infant, and independently of the effect of ratification after attaining majority. The lines of distinction drawn in reference to one of these questions do not accurately apply to the other. Assuming that a person being of full age, and, as such, chargeable with knowledge of his legal rights, deliberately determines that his interest or duty demands that he should recognize and discharge an obligation, imperfect through the fact of its assumption during minority, it would be difficult to find any sound reason why the courts should interfere to deny effect to such an act. If that responsibility rested on the court it might be well to consider the rules that should govern its exercise; but when it is assumed by the immediate party in interest, of competent age, and decided against himself, it does not seem to be a case calling for the interference of a court. The object of the rule that avoids the acts of infants is to protect the infant during a period when he is adjudged unequal to his own protection. If, after arriving at maturity, and no longer needing that protection, he deliberately subject himself to the obligation, the duty of protecting him against himself no longer subsists as binding the court, and he may well be permitted to stand or fall by his own views of interest or duty. Should an infant, immediately after arriving at age, being regarded by equity for certain purposes as in that condition more or less under the influence of his antecedent condition, assume an obligation under circumstances that would raise an implication of mala fides on the part of the obligee, it may well be that he could find relief in the application of equitable principles to his case. Crosby v. Crosby, 1 S. C. 337. But, assuming that in the present case his act is free from any circumstances that could deprive it of the character of a deliberate act, and there can be no reason short of the stern rule of stare decisis, that could warrant the defeat of such act. It is especially objectionable that the court should pronounce a transaction fair and legal on its face absolutely void for the purpose of applying as against an attempt to satisfy the operation of the purely technical rule that that which is void cannot be validated for the want of anything to become validated. *What might be the effect, under the authorities, where the transaction bore on its face evidence that the immaturity of the obligor had been imposed upon, so that, as matter of law, the court could say that the transaction was a wrong done to the infant, need not be considered, as it is inapplicable to the present case. The mere fact that the infant assumed to become a surety for another, is not, in itself, ground sufficient to say that such dealing was a wrong to the infant. The most that can be said is, that the court cannot see how the infant could derive benefit from such an act; but that is not sufficient, if he, himself, after arriving at maturity, deliberately has determined the matter for himself. This direct question was decided in Curton v. Patton, 11 Serg. & R. 305. We think that the decision of the Circuit Court was erroneous in holding that the contract was incapable of ratification. The dismissal of the complaint must be regarded as equivalent to a non-suit. In this point of view it presents the question whether the letter of the defendant, proved in evidence, was sufficient to go to the jury on the question of ratification. On its face it purports to be a promise to pay the note in suit, made upon an offer that involved a new consideration, namely, forbearance to sue the other party to the note. If the proffer was accepted and acted upon it would constitute not only proof of confirmation but a new contract, assuming the old one to be incapable of ratification. It was for the jury to say whether this condition was accepted by the plaintiff.

There must be a new trial.

New trial granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 401–418; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃111.]

Before Townsend, J., at Marion, March Term, 1876.

In this case Honorable William H. Wallace, judge of the seventh circuit, sat in the place of Associate Justice McIver, who had been one of the counsel in the cause in the court below.

The Circuit decree very fully states all the facts of the case. The order of Chancellor Dunkin passed February 20th, 1860, in the case of Fladger et ux. v. Hamer et ux., (mentioned in the Circuit decree and also in the opinion of this court,) so far as it affects the present issues, is as follows:

The commissioners to whom a writ of partition was directed in this case, requiring them to make partition of the property named in the pleadings, having made their return to the writ, it is, on motion of Harllee & Graham, complainants' solicitors, ordered that the said return and recommendations be confirmed, except as to vesting the share of Missouri, wife of John H. Hamer, the defendant, in the said Missouri. And it is ordered, in respect to the portion of negroes allotted to the said Missouri, and the proceeds of land, hereafter directed to be sold, that it be *referred to the commissioners of this court to inquire and report as to who would be a fit and proper trustee on whom to settle said slaves and proceeds of sales of land to the use of the said Missouri; the terms of such settlement and the amount of bond to be given by said trustee.

The Circuit decree is as follows:

William S. Bethea died intestate on the day of March, 1857, leaving his widow, Sarah A. Bethea, and two children, Missouri Bethea and William H. Bethea, as his only heirs-at-law. Sarah A. Bethea administered upon his personal estate, and subsequently intermarried with C. J. Fladger, who, by reason of the marriage, became administrator with her; Missouri Hamer intermarried with John H. Hamer, after the death of her father, and died intestate on the day of , 1862, leaving an infant son, Robert M. Hamer, and her husband as her only heirs-at-law.

The intestate, William S. Bethea, in his lifetime, was joint owner with John C. Bethea of several tracts of land lying in Marion county, then district. On the 14th day of February, 1859, after the death of W. S. Bethea, a bill of complaint was filed in the Court of Equity, for the partition of said lands, by John C. Bethea, against the heirs-at-law of intestate before named. The cause was heard on the 18th of February, 1859, and the court, after directing certain conveyances to be made to perfect the titles, &c., of the joint tenants, and the payment of a certain sum of money by the administratrix of W. S. Bethea, ordered a writ of partition to issue to divide the said lands between John C. Bethea and the heirs-at-law of W. S. Bethea. In December, 1859, the writ accordingly issued, and the commissioners therein named, and to whom it was directed, made their return to the Court of Equity in February, 1860, in which they valued all the lands at the sum, in the aggregate, of $5,151, and recommended that the lands be set apart to John C. Bethea at that sum, who was to pay to the heirs-at-law of W. S. Bethea the one-half of said amount by the 1st day of January, 1861, with interest from the 1st day of March, 1860. The return was confirmed by an order of the court on the 17th day of February, 1860. John C. *Bethea went into possession of the three tracts of land so set apart to him, and continued in possession up to the time of his death in January, 1863. By the terms of his will, of which R. B. Fladger was one of the executors and duly qualified, his son, Edwin A. Bethea, as devisee, went into possession of the said lands, and is now in possession of them, with the exception of the "Clark" tract, which was conveyed by him to John F. Bethea in 1869, and a portion of which was sold by John F. Bethea to D. W. Bethea.

The complaint in this action alleges that neither J. C. Bethea, in his lifetime, nor his executor, after his death, nor his son and devisee, nor J. F. Bethea or D. W. Bethea, as pretended owners of the "Clark" tract, ever paid to Missouri Hamer or her legal representatives, or to any other person authorized to receive the same, her share of the money assessed and decreed to be paid to her by John C. Bethea.

That at the time of her death, Missouri Hamer was a minor and owed no debts, and there has been no administration upon her personal estate; that there is now due and owing to the plaintiffs, as heirs-at-law of Missouri Hamer, on account of her interest in the said lands, the sum of $1,697.39, with interest from the 26th of May, 1873, being the one-third of the amount, with interest, as assessed to be paid by J. C. Bethea; and they are informed that a statutory mortgage or lien exists upon the lands for the payment of her share, and that the title of Edwin A. Bethea, J. F. Bethea and D. W. Bethea will not vest in the same until the said amount of money is paid to her, even if the other heirs-at-law of J. C. Bethea have been paid.

The prayer of the complaint is for the foreclosure of the statutory mortgage, and for a sale of the said lands for the purpose of subjecting them to the payment of the amount due the plaintiffs.

The defendants, in their answer, after admitting most of the allegations of the complaint, deny the fact stated, that the share of Missouri Hamer was never paid to her or her heirs by them or any of them. For further answer they allege that on the 17th day of December, 1859, C. J. Fladger and wife, administrators of W. S. Bethea, filed their bill against John H. Hamer and wife and others, for partition and account, and that at the *February Term of the Court of Equity, in 1860, it was ordered, among other things, "that the said return be confirmed, with its recommendations, except as to the vesting of the share of Missouri Hamer, wife of John H. Hamer, the defendant, in the said Missouri, and it is ordered, in respect to the portion of the negroes allotted to the said Missouri, and the proceeds of the land hereafter directed to be sold, that it be referred to the commissioner of the court to inquire and report as to who would be a fit and proper trustee on whom to settle said slaves and proceeds of sales of land to the use of the said Missouri, the terms of said settlement and the amount of the bond to be given by the trustee. It is further ordered that the share of the negroes and proceeds of sale of land allotted to Missouri, wife of John H. Hamer, remain in the administrator's hands until the further order of this court."

They further allege that the above order was made at the same term of the court, by the same Chancellor, and on the same day that the order referred to and granted in the complaint was made.

They further allege that the money ordered to be paid by J. C. Bethea was a part of W. S. Bethea's estate, and as such was covered by the order of the court settling Missouri's portion upon a trustee.

The defendants further allege that John C. Bethea, in his lifetime, paid the money ordered to be paid to the distributees of W. S. Bethea to C. J. Fladger, the administrator of W. S. Bethea, and that said Fladger, as administrator, has accounted for the same. The defendants insist that said payment was a good payment, and a complete discharge of the statutory lien upon the lands, and plead said payment in bar of the plaintiffs' action for foreclosure. The evidence of the payment of the money by J. C. Bethea to the administrators of W. S. Bethea is a receipt, as follows:

"Received 26th August, 1861, of John C. Bethea, two thousand six hundred and sixteen 75–100 dollars, as above stated, which is in full of the portion of the estate of W. S. Bethea in the lands which were assigned the said John C. Bethea in partition under proceedings in the case above stated had in the Court of Equity for Marion District."

*The title of the case in which the lands were assigned to J. C. Bethea appears above the receipt. The paper is in the handwriting of C. D. Evans, the then commissioner in equity for Marion district.

At the hearing of the case there was oral and record testimony offered. The records and all the papers in the cases of J. C. Bethea v. Sarah A. Bethea, Adm'x, et al., and H. C. Fladger et ux. v. J. H. Hamer et al., were introduced. The testimony shows that Missouri Hamer was four years of age in 1860,† and died before attaining majority, without ever having had a guardian or trustee. John H. Hamer is now the guardian of the infant plaintiff. Edwin A. Bethea, as devisee, went into possession of the lands sought to be sold, about the close of the late war. At the hearing, a motion was made on the part of the defendants to make the other heirs at law of John C. Bethea besides Edwin A., parties to this proceeding. The reasons urged in support of it were that the amount decreed to be paid by J. C. Bethea is a general debt against his estate, and not a claim against one of his devisees on the lands in his possession, and that it is necessary for all the heirs-at-law to be made parties before complete justice can be done. The motion was resisted by the counsel for the plaintiffs.

The record in the case of J. C. Bethea v. Sarah A. Bethea et al., proves the liability of J. C. Bethea to the plaintiffs for the share of Missouri Hamer in the amount decreed to be paid by him. It is incumbent on the defendants to show that this debt or liability has been discharged in some way, either by J. C. Bethea, in his lifetime, or by his executors or heirs since his death, in order to preclude the granting of the relief demanded in the complaint.

The first position assumed by the defendants is, that the order of the court affirming the allotment of the lands to J. C. Bethea, and directing the payment of money by him to the distributees of W. S. Bethea, was a conversion of realty into personalty, and the claim was a mere money demand, secured by the judgment for its payment, which was a lien upon and enforcible against all *the property of J. C. Bethea, and hence the administrators of W. S. Bethea had a right to receive the fund and administer it.

The doctrine of equitable conversion is thus laid down by Sir Thomas Sewell, in Fletcher v. Ashburner, found in Lead. Cas. in Eq. I., 777: "That money directed to be employed in the purchase of land, and land directed to be sold and turned into money, are to be considered as that species of property into which they are directed to be converted; and this in whatever manner the direction is given, whether by will, by way of contract, marriage articles, settlement, or otherwise; and whether the money is actually deposited or only covenanted to be paid; whether the land is actually conveyed or only agreed to be conveyed." The direction to convert either money into land or land into money must be express and imperative; for if the conversion be optional, the property will be considered as real or personal according to the actual condition in which it is to be found.

In the case of Steele v. Prince, 9 Monk Eq. R. 743, it is held: "That if a conversion is rightfully made, whether by the court or a trustee, all the consequences of a conversion must follow."

In this state it has been held that proceeds of land ordered to be sold by a will, are treated as personalty. 8 Rich. Eq. 291.

In the case of Arnold v. Dixon, 19 Eq. 113, Vol. IX., Amer. Law Reg., it was decided that in an administration suit wherein partition was asked, a sale was ordered, and after the decree, but before the sale, one of the parties entitled to a share died, that "the real estate had been converted into personal and passed to the personal representative of the deceased beneficiary."

The ground of this doctrine is, as stated in Story's Eq. Jur., § 791, p. 175, that it is to be presumed that the parties, in directing money to be invested in land, or land to be turned into money, intend that the property shall assume the very character of the property into which it is to be converted. The lands owned by John C. Bethea and W. S. Bethea, jointly, were partitioned after the death of the latter. His share descended to his heirs-at-law as real estate. His debts were inconsiderable, and there was no necessity for the sale of any of his lands for their payment; when the lands were allotted to J. C. Bethea, and he was decreed to pay the value of the share of W. S. Bethea to his *distributees in money, it was for the purpose of partition, and not for the payment of debts. The money decreed to be paid represented the portion of the lands to which the distributees were entitled. There was no direction of the court for J. C. Bethea to pay to the administrators of W. S. Bethea the amount ordered to be paid for equality of partition. It cannot be successfully contended, then, that the administrators were entitled to receive this fund as the assets of the estate of W. S. Bethea for the payment of debts. If they had a right to receive it, it was only on the ground of a conversion, by the court, of real estate into personalty, to be distributed by them among the parties entitled.

The order of the court directing the payment of money by J. C. Bethea, was express and imperative. The distributees of W. S. Bethea were designated as the parties to whom it was to be paid. There could be no election to take the fund as land or money, for when an estate is directed to be sold and the money divided among several persons, none has a right to say that any part shall not be sold. The authority of the court to direct a conversion is unquestionable. A conversion, if directed by the court, was rightfully made.

But it appears that, at the time the judgment of the court was made, Missouri Hamer, the mother of the infant plaintiff, and wife of John H. Hamer, was but four years of age. The rule seems to be different when the real estate of an infant is sold: "If the real estate of an infant be sold, the proceeds are to be deemed real estate until he arrives at majority, and descend to his heirs as such. But on an infant arriving at majority, and obtaining possession of the proceeds of real estate sold, such proceeds are to be deemed personal property, and on his death thereafter descend to his personal representatives as such." Farmer v. Marcet, 11 N. Y. 544, and other cases cited in Monk Eq. R., Vol. IX., 743.

There can be no difference in the rule as applied to a case, where the real estate of an infant is allotted in a partition to another and money decreed to be paid to him for equality, and when a sale is directed for the purpose of a partition. It will be seen that, in this case, one of the parties entitled in the par*tition to a share of the lands was a minor at the time the decree was made against J. C. Bethea; that the amount to which she was entitled was directed to be paid to her as a distributee; and that there was no necessity (or intention on the part of the court) for selling the lands for the payment of debts. Missouri's share in the lands was her own real estate, and having been allotted to another, the proceeds, or equivalent of same in money, must be considered as real estate until she attained majority—and she never arrived at majority—and her share in the amount due by J. C. Bethea was never converted, and her interest should have descended to her heirs-at-law as real estate.

I am of the opinion that the order of the court did not operate as a conversion of real into personal property, so far as Missouri was concerned, and the administrators were not entitled to receive her share as money, either for the purpose of distributing it, or for the payment of any debts of the intestate. The next position of the defendants is, that if the administrators had no right to receive her share as personal property, they clearly had the power to do so by virtue of the order of Chancellor Dunkin, made on February 20th, 1860.

The order was made in the proceeding for the partition and settlement of the estate of W. S. Bethea. In the first clause it directed, "that in respect to the portion of the negroes allotted to the said Missouri, and the proceeds of the land hereafter directed to be sold, it be referred to the commissioners in equity to inquire and report who would be a fit and proper trustee on whom to settle said slaves and proceeds of sales of land to the use of said Missouri."

In the second clause of the order, the lands mentioned in the return of the commissioners appointed to partition the real estate of W. S. Bethea, are directed to be sold.

The last clause of this order directs, "that the share of the negroes and proceeds of sale of lands allotted to Missouri, wife of J. H. Hamer, remain in the administrator's hands until the further order of the court."

This order was made at the same term of the court, and only two days after that, the order was granted allotting the lands to *J. C. Bethea, and directing him to pay so much money to Missouri as one of the distributees of W. S. Bethea.

There can be no question about the power of the administrators, under the order of February 20th, 1860, to receive the proceeds of the sale of the lands therein ordered to be sold to which Missouri was entitled. The Chancellor seems also to sustain the view already presented in the question of conversion, for he directs the proceeds of lands to be held, clearly indicating that it was a direction to secure real estate, and not personalty, by reason of a conversion consequent upon the sale.

Did this order also include the amount ordered to be paid to Missouri by J. C. Bethea?

The terms of the order are general. The administrators are directed to hold the proceeds of sale of land allotted to Missouri. The amount J. C. Bethea was decreed to pay her was proceeds of lands allotted to her. These proceeds were allotted to her by the same Chancellor at the same term of the court, and only two days before. The court was certainly cognizant of this fact, and must have intended that the proceeds as well as all others should be embraced within the terms of the order.

What was the object of this order, in so far as it related to Missouri? Clearly to protect her share in her father's estate from the debts of any future husband. As expressed in the order, the object is to settle her property upon a suitable trustee. If this was the object, why should not her entire property have been thus settled? The court clearly never intended to settle only a part upon a trustee. It does seem that the purpose of the court was to settle all of the property, and if so, then the last clause of the order embraced the amount in controversy. This seems to have been the construction placed upon the order by the then commissioner in equity, for it is in proof that the receipt of the administrators to J. C. Bethea is in his handwriting. J. C. Bethea and the administrators appear to have so understood the order. All parties concerned seem to have acted upon such a construction. The administrators accounted in the settlement of the estate of W. S. Bethea for the fund so received by them.

At the time this order was made no trustee had been appointed for Missouri. This seems to have been the reason for directing *the administrators—one of whom was the mother, and the other the stepfather of Missouri—to hold the property. That the infant was protected by the court in same way when this direction was given, is to be presumed from the fact of the direction itself. The extraordinary prudence and caution of the Chancellor granting this order render its propriety and necessity unquestionable.

If this order was intended to embrace the proceeds of the lands allotted to J. C. Bethea, to which Missouri was entitled, the administrators had the power to receive her share from J. C. Bethea, and to hold it until the further order of the court. That they did so receive her share is incontestably established by the receipt. It is now in their hands, and to them the plaintiffs must look. The fact of the insolvency of the administrators, or their bondsmen, cannot affect the question to be decided in this case. Considering the order of Chancellor Dunkin, and all the peculiar circumstances of this case, it would be a great hardship to require the heirs or devisees of J. C. Bethea to again pay this amount, when it was once paid under what was supposed to be the direction of the court.

It is adjudged, ordered and decreed that the complaint be dismissed.

July 1st, 1876. C. P. Townsend.

From this decree the plaintiffs appealed to this court, upon the ground that the payment to the administrators of W. S. Bethea could not operate as a satisfaction of the amount J. C. Bethea was ordered to pay to Missouri Hamer, one of the distributees of William S. Bethea, under the order of February 17th, 1860.

WALLACE, A. A. J. In 1857 John C. Bethea and his brother, William S. Bethea, were the joint owners of three tracts of land, viz., the Clark land, the Hamilton or Hamner Hays land, and a tract of land lying on Reedy creek. In March, 1857, W. S. Bethea died intestate, leaving as his heirs-at-law his widow, Sarah A., and two minor children—a daughter, Missouri, and a son, W. H. Bethea. The widow administered on the estate of the intestate, and afterwards intermarried with J. C. Fladger. The infant daughter intermarried with John H. Hamer, and died before attaining her majority, leaving one child, Robert M. Hamer. On the 14th of February, 1859, John C. Bethea filed his bill for the partition of the three tracts of land jointly owned by himself and W. S. Bethea. On the 18th of February 1859, it was, amongst other things, ordered that a writ of partition should issue. On the 5th of December, 1859, the writ was issued, and on the 6th of January, 1860, the commissioners made their return, setting apart the three tracts to John C. Bethea, at the valuation of $5151, and recommending that John C. should pay one-half of this sum, viz., $2575.50, with interest from the 1st of March, 1860, to the distributees of W. S. Bethea. This return was confirmed and made the decree of the court on the 17th of February, 1860. John C. Bethea subsequently paid this amount to C. J. Fladger and wife, as administrators of the estate of W. S. Bethea. On the 17th of December, 1859, C. J. Fladger and wife filed their bill against J. H. Hamer and wife and W. H. Bethea for the partition of two tracts of land, of which W. S. Bethea was sole owner in his lifetime, viz., the Home place and the Herring place, which they had in possession, and also of the three tracts in which John C. Bethea had a half interest. On the 17th of February, 1860, the day on which the commissioners in the case instituted by John C. Bethea made their return to the writ in that case, a writ of partition was issued to commissioners to divide the Home place and the Herring place. A return to this writ was made on the 20th of February, 1860, recommending that the Home place and the Herring place be sold on sale-day in December, 1860. On the same day the return was made it was confirmed, except *as to vesting the share of Missouri, wife of John H. Hamer. This action is brought by the representatives of Missouri Hamer, to recover the amount of her share of the $2575.50 ordered by the court to be paid to the heirs of W. S. Bethea by John C. Bethea, and to set up a lien to the extent of Missouri's share of that amount upon the land assigned to John C. Bethea. The defendants set up the payment to C. J. Fladger and wife as a discharge of the debt of John C. Bethea to the heirs of W. S. Bethea, and extinguishment of the statutory lien upon the land. The duty of administrators is to collect and sell, under proper proceedings, the personal estate of their intestates. Primarily they have to do only with the personal estate, and, so far as their powers and duties are concerned, that only is personal estate which has that character impressed upon it at the time of the death of the intestate. Now, when under proceedings in partition the three tracts of land were assigned to John C. Bethea by the court, the title which had vested in the heirs of W. S. Bethea, at his death, was extinguished, and their interest was transferred and attached to the money to be paid. Whether there was any conversion of realty into personalty is a question with which the administrators of W. S. Bethea have no concern. This land was certainly realty at the death of W. S. Bethea, and, as such, they had no authority to administer it. Nor would the order of court, directing the title of the heirs to be extinguished by the payment of money to the heirs, change the relation of the administrators to this part of the estate of their intestate. The question as to a conversion might arise between the personal representatives and the heirs of Missouri Hamer.

It does not appear that there was any insufficiency of personal assets to pay the debts of the intestate. The administrators, therefore, as such, had no power to discharge John C. Bethea from his obligation to pay Missouri Hamer, by receiving the money themselves. It was certainly competent for the court to direct to whom the money should be paid. Did the court direct that this fund be paid to the administrators? In the case instituted by John C. Bethea the court ordered that the sum to be paid by John C. Bethea should be paid to the heirs of W. S. Bethea. In the case of Fladger and wife, the court orders: 1st.

*"That in respect to the portion of the negroes allotted to the said Missouri, and the proceeds of the land hereafter directed to be sold, it be referred to the commissioner in equity to inquire and report who would be a fit and proper trustee on whom to settle said slaves and proceeds of sales of land to the use of said Missouri." 2d. "That the lands mentioned in the report of the commissioners be sold." 3d. "That the share of the negroes and proceeds of sales of land allotted to Missouri remain in the administrator's hands until the further order of the court." It will be seen that the first clause of the order directs the commissioner in equity to inquire and report a proper trustee to take charge of the negroes allotted to Missouri, and the proceeds of land hereafter directed to be sold. Now, the land immediately thereafter directed to be sold, in the same order, and the only land thereafter directed to be sold, are the Home place and the Herring place. So it was for Missouri's share of the proceeds of these two tracts that the commissioner was to report a trustee; the share of Missouri in the other lands of her father having been covered by a previous order in another case. There is no language in the last clause of the order under consideration that extends its operation beyond the case in which it was made. Construing the whole order together, the first and second clauses designate the property to be settled to the use of Missouri, and the last clause provides for the custody of that property until the settlement could be made. No part of the order authorizes the administrators to receive from John C. Bethea Missouri's share of the money to be paid by him.

The decree of the Circuit judge dismissing the complaint is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Decree reversed.

WILLARD, C. J., and HASKELL, A. J., concurred.

JACOB LYONS v. BELLA HOLMES, JAMES D. TRADEWELL and WILLIAM HOLMES.

[1. Deeds ⊂⊃53; Evidence ⊂⊃374.]

When the witnesses and parties to a deed, signed by an illiterate grantor with her + mark, are dead, proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses, together with other evidence confirmatory of the execution of the deed, are sufficient to require the case to be submitted to the jury upon the question of the execution of the deed, notwithstanding there was no evidence of grantor's signature. Proof of the signature by grantor in such cases is not indispensable.

2. Cases in our state reviewed and explained, and Russell v. Tunno, 11 Rich. 318, limited.

Before Townsend, J., at Richland, January Term, 1879.

This was an action to recover a lot of land in the city of Columbia, formerly the property of Sarah Hane, a free woman of color. Plaintiff was devisee of Henry Lyons, and in support of his title offered in evidence a deed bearing date June 5th, 1855, conveying the lot to Henry Lyons in consideration of $500. The deed was signed "Sarah X (her mark) Hane," and the names of I. D. Mordecai and C. S. Bedell were signed as witnesses. A probate by Mordecai and a certificate of record by the register of mesne conveyance for Richland county,† both bearing date June 5th, 1855, appeared upon the deed. Henry Lyons died in 1858, and by a codicil to his will, this lot was devised to plaintiff. Subsequently Sarah Hane died intestate, leaving Richard Holmes, her husband, at the date of the deed and since, her sole heir-at-law. Richard Holmes again married and afterwards died in 1870, and by his last will and testament devised this property, one moiety to his wife, Bella Holmes, and the other moiety to James D. Tradewell in trust for William Holmes—the defendants in this action. Defendants denied the execution of the deed.

*The evidence showed the death of both parties to the deed, and also the death of the witnesses. The signatures of the witnesses were proven. No evidence was offered to prove the mark to be that of Sarah Hane, nor that she was seen to sign it. The other evidence in this case is fully stated in the opinion of the court.

† It does not appear in evidence, but it is a fact that the records of this office were all burnt in February, 1865.—REPORTER.

The Circuit judge ruled that the deed was not sufficiently proven, and on defendant's motion ordered a non-suit.

Plaintiff appealed.

Mr. W. A. Clark, for appellant.

The sole question presented for the consideration of this court is, what proof is sufficient to authorize the submission to a jury of a deed executed with the grantor's X mark, when both of the subscribing witnesses are dead. Proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses would seem to be all that could be required.

First. The best evidence which the nature of the case admits is to be produced. Stark, on Ev. 642*; 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 82; 2 McC. 139*; 1 Bail. 543*.

Second. In England the rule would seem to be settled that if the subscribing witnesses be dead, or beyond the jurisdiction of the court, proof of their handwriting would be sufficient, and it would not be necessary to prove the handwriting of the grantor. Stark. on Ev. 519–521*, and cases cited; see review of English cases by Nelson, C. J., 19 Wend. 443.

Third. The courts of the State of New York have certainly recognized the rule as well established. 19 Wend. 437; 1 Johns. Cas. 230; 4 Johns. 461.

Fourth. In our state the rule would seem to be, that in such cases the handwriting of the grantor ought also to be proved, or "something to connect him with the instrument." 2 McC. 138; 11 Rich. 318.

These cases, however, establish no invariable rule. See remarks of Mr. Justice Gantt, in delivering the opinion of the court, in Plunkett v. Bowman.

And in the case of Russell v. Tunno, the testimony was too weak and uncertain. See remarks of Judge Withers.

Fifth. It is impracticable, after the lapse of so long a time, to prove the execution of a

X mark; and herein arises one of those *circumstances which will dispense with the proof of the execution by the grantor, by testimony other than that of the subscribing witnesses.

Our courts have always recognized another rule where the instrument was executed by the X mark. 2 N. & McC. 374; 1 Rice Dig. 256.

And this rule is said by Judge Withers, in Russell v. Tunno, p. 32, to be recognized by our decisions.

And even when the execution of the instrument is in writing, but by a person not accustomed to write her name, or to transact business, so as to render her signature hardly susceptible of proof, our courts have held that the question should be submitted to the jury as presumptive evidence that such grantor had executed the deed. 2 Bay 157.

Sixth. The grantor was sufficiently connected with the instrument as to bring the case within the rule laid down in Russell v. Tunno.

Mr. J. D. Pope, for respondents.

1. The first proposition, that in the case of the death of the attesting witnesses it is not only necessary to prove their signatures, but that the signature of the grantor must also be proved, will hardly be called in question. Steph. Dig. Ev., Art. LXVI., pp. 121–122; App. 221.

In South Carolina, in such case, if there are two witnesses to the instrument, as in conveyances of real estate, then the signatures of both attesting witnesses must be proved as well as the signature of the grantor. 4 McC. 253; 1 Brev. 245.

In considering the cases in our books, the act of 1802 must not be overlooked as to the execution of bonds or notes, when other testimony is allowed, if the witness to the instrument is absent, unless the defendant shall swear that the signature to the bond or note is not his. Gen. Stat. 514.

2. The second proposition, that when the deed is executed by making a cross (X) mark, and the witnesses are dead, the death of the witnesses being proved and the signatures proved, it is also necessary to prove the identity of the grantor as the real person who was present and made the mark, thus connecting him *personally with the mark so purporting to be made by him, is, we think, equally conclusive.

Why does the rule require that in case of death the signature of the grantor should be proved? It is to identify and connect the grantor with the deed. So, in the case of the marksman, the mere mark cannot do this. Any one may have made the mark. It has no character to distinguish it; and, therefore, the marksman must be identified in person as the one who actually made the mark as his signature. That certainly is the rule in England. 2 Stark., IV., 239; 1 B. & Ald. 19; 1 Exch. 511.

In South Carolina we have to the same point, 1 McM. 305; 2 McC. 138; 2 Brev. 200. And the last case upon the subject, where the English and South Carolina authorities are reviewed by Judge Withers. 11 Rich. 318.

3. In the case in hand, there is nothing going to show the identity of Sarah Hane with the deed in question.

(1.) If the probate before the magistrate could be evidence in the cause, (which it is not,) the witness, Mordecai, does not say that he saw Sarah Hane, to him personally known, sign, seal and deliver.

(2.) The paper signed by R. Holmes does not identify Sarah Hane with this deed, nor does it identify the lot of land described in the deed, for Sarah Hane had several lots of land in Columbia.

(3.) Nor is the paper itself evidence, being an acknowledgment, not of Sarah Hane, nor by any one in the presence of Sarah Hane. This certainly could not affect her nor her property; nor does the testimony of R. D. Senn throw the least light upon the subject.

April 15th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. The question in this case is whether the testimony offered by the plaintiff to prove the execution of a deed from Sarah Hane to the plaintiff's testator, Henry Lyons, was sufficient to allow the case to go to the jury. The Circuit judge, not regarding the testimony as sufficient, non-suited the plaintiff, and upon that error is assigned. The deed in question purports to have been signed by Sarah Hane with a X mark, in the presence of two subscribing witnesses, both of whom were dead at *the time of trial. It bears date June 5th, 1855, and appears to have been duly proved and recorded on the day of its date. The plaintiff proved the handwriting of the two subscribing witnesses and their death, and also proved by Levin, that as agent of the plaintiff, he paid the state and city taxes on the lot in controversy, which said deed purports to convey, from the year 1866, when plaintiff left the city, until the year 1869 or 1870, upon an understanding with Richard Holmes, who was the husband of Sarah Hane, that he would refund the amounts so paid, as he had agreed with the plaintiff to pay the taxes as long as he occupied the premises; and that he continued to pay the taxes until the defendants raised the question as to the ownership of the property. R. D. Senn also proved that the said Richard Holmes, under whom the defendants claim, executed in his presence a paper, of which the following is a copy:

"The sale of the lot, made by my wife Sarah, to the late Henry Lyons, deceased, has my consent, with the verbal conditions this day reduced to writing by J. C. Lyons.

"Columbia, March 14th, 1860."

Witnessed by R. D. Senn, who testified that at the execution of this paper there was some talk between Lyons and Holmes about the occupancy by Holmes and wife of the lot of land now in controversy, but he could not say what were the precise terms of the verbal conditions which this paper shows were that day reduced to writing. It seems to us, that even under the most stringent rule which can be deduced from our cases, the testimony offered was amply sufficient to allow the question of the execution of the deed to go to the jury. The deed bore date more than twenty years before it was offered in evidence, and for that length of time it had been spread upon the public records of the country. All the parties to it were dead, including both of the subscribing witnesses. The supposed grantor was not only an illiterate woman, unaccustomed to write, but actually unable to write. All this, taken in connection with the testimony of Levin and Senn, afforded much stronger proof than that which has been held sufficient in some of our cases. In Hopkins v. De Graffenreid, 2 Bay 187, the question, as in this case, was whether the *testimony offered to prove the execution of a deed was sufficient to go to the jury. The deed purported to have been executed by Thomas and Dorothy Moore, and the handwriting of the two subscribing witnesses, one of whom was dead, and the other out of the state, was duly proved, as was also the handwriting of Thomas Moore, but the handwriting of Dorothy was not proved. The court, while admitting the general rule of law "as laid down in 3 Burr. 1247, and Doug. 89, 90, (which, however, will be found not to lay down any such rule,) that it is necessary after you have proved the handwriting of the witnesses, then to prove the handwriting of the party to the bond or deed," said that this case formed "a strong and marked exception to the general rule," because the handwriting sought to be proved was that "of an old and infirm woman who did not sign her name more than once probably in fifty years, and it was next to an impossibility to find a man living who could prove her handwriting," and, therefore, they applied the rule that "where the best evidence a thing is capable of cannot be procured, then the next best ought to be admitted, not as conclusive, but as presumptive evidence of the fact." The non-suit was, therefore, set aside in order that the testimony might be submitted to the jury. So in Young v. Stockdale, 2 McC. 531, a deed twenty-six years old, but whether recorded or not does not appear, was held to be sufficiently proved by proof of the handwriting of the grantor and one of the subscribing witnesses, all the parties being dead, and the other subscribing witness, a young man at the date of the deed, and his handwriting unformed, and, therefore, very difficult, if not impossible to be proved. In Shiver v. Johnson, 2 Brev. 397, it was held that where the maker of a note signs by his X mark, and the subscribing witness is out of the state, proof of the handwriting of the witness will be sufficient proof of the execution of the note, "from the necessity of the case." To the same effect is Whitaker v. Bussey, 2 N. & McC. 374; see also Collins v. Lemasters & Lee, 2 Bail. 141, for a case in which very slender proof was not only allowed to go to the jury, in proof of the execution of a bond signed by a marksman, but which, upon appeal, was held sufficient to sustain the verdict notwithstanding the fact that the evidence adduced by the defendant, after his *motion for a nonsuit was overruled, contradicted that offered in behalf of the plaintiff.

There does appear to be some conflict in the decisions in this state as to what shall be sufficient evidence of the execution of an instrument to which there are subscribing witnesses, when the testimony of such witnesses cannot be obtained, but such conflict arises mainly, as we think, from the fact that certain dicta are thrown in some of the cases, which, in subsequent cases, are erroneously quoted as authority. The case of Oliphant v. Taggart, 1 Bay 255, decided in 1792, which is sometimes cited to show that, in this state, it is necessary to prove the handwriting of the obligor or grantor, as well as that of the subscribing witnesses, seems to be the first case upon the subject. The case, however, does not establish any such doctrine. The action was upon a bail bond, purporting to have been executed in the presence of one witness who had left the country prior to the trial. The plaintiff offered to prove the handwriting, not only of the witnesses, but also that of the obligor; but the counsel for the defendant objected, "under the circumstances of the case," and produced the affidavit of the subscribing witness, made prior to his departure for France, in which he swore positively that he had never seen the defendant sign the bond in question. Thereupon the court said that the evidence offered was legal and proper, but, in view of the fact stated in the affidavit submitted, it would be improper to let the case go to the jury then, and directed a commission to issue for the examination of the subscribing witness. The next case is that of Hopkins v. De Graffenreid, decided in 1798, supra, which has already been commented on. Hopkins v. Albertson, 2 Bay 484, decided in 1803, simply holds that in order to prove a will as a link in a chain of title to real estate, where all three of the subscribing witnesses are dead, it is necessary to prove the handwriting of all three of the witnesses, but no question was raised, and nothing was said, as to the necessity of proving the handwriting of the testator also. Myers v. Taylor, 1 Brev. 245, decided in 1803, held that in an action on a bond it was necessary to prove the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses, in proof of the delivery of the bond, as well as that of the obligor. The report of the case does not *show that any question was raised as to the necessity of proving the handwriting of the obligor, for, that having been proved, the only question was whether it was not necessary to prove, also, the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses. In another report of this case, under the style of Meyers v. Taylor, 2 Bay 506, Judge Bay appends an "N. B.," in which he says that the judges in a subsequent case, the name of which he does not give, upon a reconsideration of the point, held that the rule had been laid down too strictly, and that proof of the handwriting of the obligor would be sufficient without proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses. The case referred to is probably that of Madden v. Burris, 1 Brev. 387, decided in 1804, in which the court held that the endorsement on a note, to which there was a subscribing witness, was sufficiently proved by testimony that such endorsements were genuine without producing the subscribing witness to the endorsement, or proving his handwriting. The next is Gervais v. Baird, 2 Brev. 37, decided in 1806, in which the action was on a note signed with a X mark, to which there was a subscribing witness, who was not produced, nor was any proof of his handwriting offered, but another witness proved that the defendant was in the habit of making her mark in the same manner in which it was made on the note, and said that he believed the mark was hers: Held, that the proof was sufficient upon the authority of Madden v. Burris, supra.

It is true, that Grimke, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, did say: "Proving the handwriting of the subscribing witness would not be sufficient." This remark is, however, clearly nothing more than an obiter dictum, and not called for by anything occurring in the case, as it does not appear that there was any offer or attempt to introduce such proof. Paisley v. Snipes, 2 Brev. 200, decided in 1807, was an action on a note purporting to have been signed by the defendant with a X mark, to which there was a subscribing witness, who, it was admitted, was a resident of the state. The court held that proof of the handwriting of such witness was not sufficient, upon the authority of Gervais v. Baird, in which, as we have just seen, the question did not arise. A better reason for the decision was, however, suggested, based upon the construction of the act of 1802, *which seemed to require, in the absence of the subscribing witness, proof of the signature of the maker or obligor, and, therefore, proof of the signature of the subscribing witness would not fulfill the requirements of the act. The court does go on to say: "If the maker of the note be a marksman, that circumstance will not avoid the necessity of proving his signature. In many instances the mark of a man who cannot write can be known and distinguished, and, therefore, the case admits of the same proof that is necessary in cases where the maker can write. But if the mark cannot be proved in this way, it must be proved by the subscribing witness to the note, or by some other person who was present and saw the mark made." These remarks were plainly not necessary to the decision of the question arising in that case, for, as the subscribing witness was admitted to be a resident of the state, it was clearly insufficient to prove his handwriting. They may, therefore, be regarded as mere dicta; and this we are fully warranted in saying, for in the very next case upon this point, decided by the same court, in 1810, (Shiver v. Johnson, 2 Brev. 397), as we have seen above, the contrary was held, the court saying: "The signature of a marksman may be proved by the peculiarity of his mark, [as in Gervais v. Baird, supra,] or his acknowledgment, if the witness whose name is subscribed to the note does not attend; and proof of the handwriting of such witness is not sufficient, if he be within the state, [as in Paisley v. Snipes, supra;] but if the subscribing witness be not within the state, proof of his handwriting is sufficient from the necessity of the case." This doctrine has been affirmed in the still later case of Whitaker v. Bussey, decided in 1820. The next case is Cornneil v. Bickley, 1 McC. 466, decided in 1821, of which there is no report, except that the point decided is stated to be that where the subscribing witnesses to a deed are out of the state, their handwriting must be proved, notwithstanding the fact that the handwriting of the grantor has been proved, and, therefore, throws no light upon the question under consideration, although it is sometimes cited to sustain the proposition that it is necessary to prove the handwriting of the obligor or grantor, as well as that of the subscribing witnesses. Next comes the case of Plunket v. Bowman, 2 McC. 138, decided in 1822, which is much *relied upon by the respondents, and serves as a basis for the case of Russell v. Tunno, which will be hereinafter considered. In Plunket v. Bowman, the action was on a bond. The subscribing witness being dead, his handwriting was proved, and the question was, whether this was sufficient proof of the execution of the bond. It was held that it was not, as the next best evidence, where the subscribing witness is inaccessible, is proof of the handwriting of the obligor, with the additional proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witness. It will at once be seen that the rule thus laid down is manifestly inconsistent with the terms of the act of 1802, and the decisions construing that act; as it is certainly well established now that proof of the signature of the obligor, except where the defendant denies such signature under oath, is sufficient proof of the execution of the bond, and that "the additional proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witness" is wholly unnecessary. Hence it is entirely true, as Johnston, J., said, in the subsequent case of Edgar ads. Brown, 4 McC. 91, that the argument of the court (Plunket v. Bowman) proceeds entirely on the common law rule, and the provisions of the act of 1802 are wholly overlooked. This, however, is not so important to the immediate point we have under consideration, and is only adverted to for the purpose of showing that the case was not so carefully considered as to give it that weight to which it would otherwise be entitled. What is more to the point is that in the decision of the court in this case, not a single one of the decisions in this state upon the subject is referred to. Gantt, J., who delivered the opinion, rests his decision entirely upon the doctrine "that the best evidence is to be produced which the nature of the case admits," and argues that you have not got the best evidence until you have proof of the signature of the obligor, and hence he deduces the rule that to prove the execution of any instrument to which there is a subscribing witness it is necessary to prove not only the signature of such witness, but also that of the maker. He admits that Phillips, in his Treatise on Evidence, and he might have said Starkie, also, lays down the rule differently, but he undertakes to show that the two cases upon which Phillips relies, (Prince v. Blackburn, 2 East 250; Adams v. Kers, 1 Bos. & Pul. 360), do not sustain his position. It is very *true that the former case can hardly be regarded as authority for the rule laid down by Phillips, because, although the only evidence offered in that case was proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witness, yet, as no question was raised as to the necessity of proving also the handwriting of the obligor, it cannot be considered as decisive of the point. But the case of Adams v. Kers is directly in point, and fully sustains the proposition laid down by Phillips and Starkie. For, in that case, the question was distinctly made. The only proof offered was that of the handwriting of one of the subscribing witnesses, and it was insisted that it was necessary to prove also the handwriting of the obligor. Butler, J., held that it was not, saying: "In this case, one of the attesting witnesses was dead, and the other was beyond the reach of the process of the court; the best evidence, therefore, which could be obtained was given. The handwriting of the obligor need not be proved; that of the attesting witness, when proved, is evidence of everything on the face of the paper, which imports to be sealed by the party."

Judge Gantt, however, concludes his opinion by saying, that when it is impossible to prove the handwriting of the obligor and of the subscribing witness, "I will not say but that the one or the other may be dispensed with, provided it is manifest that nothing is kept back, and that the best evidence which the nature of the case admits of has been produced." So that even this case can scarcely be regarded as establishing, as an absolute rule, that the signature of the obligor must, in all cases, be proved. In Sims v. De Graffenreid, 4 McC. 253, decided in 1827, the only point that seems to have been raised was whether proof of the handwriting of one of the subscribing witnesses to a deed, who was dead, was sufficient; the witness who proved this knowing nothing of the grantor or of the other subscribing witnesses, and it was held that it was not. It is also said: "The signature of the grantor and of the other subscribing witness, if he were dead or out of the state, should have been proved." The case is, however, so meagerly reported that it is impossible to say whether this is the language of the court or only that of the reporter, for the whole case seems to be nothing more than a mere abstract. But, even if it were the language of the court, it cannot be re*garded as authority, as to the necessity for proving the handwriting of the grantor, for the only question seems to have been whether proof of the handwriting of one of the subscribing witnesses was sufficient. The question does not seem to have been what proof would be sufficient, but whether the proof offered was sufficient. The case of Trammell v. Roberts, 1 McM. 305, decided in 1841, really decides nothing on the point under consideration. The sole question raised in that case was, whether it was necessary to examine the subscribing witness to a note, who was a resident of the state, when the defendant filed with his plea an affidavit that the signature to the note was not his, after it had appeared in evidence that the defendant had admitted that his name had, under his authority, been signed to the note by another, and it was held that as the affidavit filed took the case out of the provisions of the act of 1802, under the stringent rule of the common law, the subscribing witness must be produced, if within the reach of the process of the court. Richardson, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, does use this language: "In such a case, and at common law, the subscribing witness must have testified in person, and in case he was beyond the jurisdiction of the court, then other witnesses, by proving his handwriting and the signatures of the makers of the note, would furnish legal, though secondary, evidence of the same facts," and for authority he refers to 1 Stark. 126–30. This, however, is nothing more than a dictum; and while it is sustained by the authorities cited, so far as the necessity for producing the subscribing witness, or proving his handwriting, if he is beyond the jurisdiction, is concerned, it is not only not sustained but directly contradicted by the author cited, so far as the necessity for proving the handwriting of the obligor is concerned. For, in 1 Stark. on Ev. 341, it is said: "It seems, however, to be now perfectly settled, for the reason already given, that evidence of the signature of one of the attesting witnesses alone is sufficient, as in the case of Adams v. Kers, where it was proved that one witness was dead and that the other was in Jamaica, and proof of the handwriting of the deceased was held sufficient, without proof of the handwriting of the other witness or the obligor." The next case is that of State v. Chaney, 9 Rich. 438, decided in 1856, in which it was held *that a bill of sale of personal property could not be received in evidence upon mere proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witness. But as there was no testimony as to whether such witness was or was not within reach of the process of the court, the case is of no authority upon the point in question. Then comes the case of Russell v. Tunno, 11 Rich. 303, decided in 1858, upon which the respondents in this case chiefly rely. In this case one of the questions was as to the execution of an assignment, purporting to have been executed in New Orleans, by Russell, in the presence of two witnesses, La Roque and Monaghan. To prove the assignment three witnesses were examined by commission in New Orleans, La Roque being one of them. He testified that he did not know any of the parties to the suit, one of whom, it will be observed, was the supposed assignor; that he remembered nothing whatever about the execution of the deed; signed his name as a witness; believed the signature of Monaghan to be genuine, as he was acquainted with his handwriting; did not know what was done with the deed of assignment; believed the notarial certificate attached to it to be in the handwriting of Monaghan, and the signature and seal thereto to be genuine; knew nothing whatever about Russell. The other two witnesses proved the signature of Monaghan, the notary, and that he had left New Orleans clandestinely and gone to parts unknown. Upon this testimony the Circuit judge allowed the question as to the execution of the assignment to go to the jury, and, on appeal, the court held that "some evidence was necessary in addition to what was adduced on the Circuit to show the due execution of the assignment by Russell, as proof of his handwriting or something else, to connect him with the instrument before the paper could go to the jury." This decision was by a divided court —three to two—the sixth judge being absent. In delivering the opinion of the court, Withers, J., said: "This question, also, is attended by contrariety of decision, for there is not uniformity of opinion in English or American cases, perhaps, we may say, not even among our own. We have, however, a rule prescribed in Plunket v. Bowman, 2 McC. 138, which we think it proper to follow so far forth as this, that where a subscribing witness to an instrument is dead, or beyond the jurisdiction, something more than merely proof of *his handwriting is required before the defendant shall be held connected with the paper as maker." He then proceeds to comment on Edgar ads. Brown, 4 McC. 91, in which it was held that proof of the signature of the obligor to a bond, executed in Delaware, without any proof as to the signature of the subscribing witnesses, who were not within the jurisdiction, was sufficient proof of the execution of the bond, saying that it was in conflict with Myers v. Taylor, 1 Brev. 245, but overlooks the fact that the last-named case had been overruled by Madden v. Burris, supra, and Gervais v. Baird, supra. He also cited Paisley v. Snipes, 2 Brev. 200, to show that proof of the signature of the maker was necessary, ignoring the important fact that, in Paisley v. Snipes, the subscribing witness was admitted to be a resident of the state, and that precisely the contrary had been held in the subsequent case of Shiver v. Johnson, supra, where the subscribing witness was not a resident of the state. He also relies upon Trammell v. Roberts, 1 McM. 305, quoting the language of Richardson, J., hereinbefore quoted, which, as we have seen, was not only a mere dictum, but unsustained by the authority cited to support it, so far as the necessity for proving the handwriting of the obligor, in addition to that of the subscribing witness, is concerned. The learned judge then proceeds to show that the testimony of the subscribing witness who was examined, instead of strengthening rather weakened the evidence of the execution of the assignment, for he knew nothing whatever of Russell, and nothing as to the delivery of the deed or what disposition was made of it. "He shook if he did not rebut such presumption as might have arisen from proof of his handwriting merely, where that might have been accepted." The English authorities relied upon in this case, are Parkins v. Hawkshaw, 2 Stark. (N. P.) 239; 3 E. C. L. R. 332; Nelson v. Whittall, 1 B. & Ald. 19; Whitlock v. Musgrove, 1 Exch. 511. But in Parkins v. Hawkshaw the precise question which we are considering did not arise, as there was no attempt to prove the bond by proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witness. On the contrary, such witness was himself examined, and he testified that he saw the bond executed by a person who was introduced as Hawkshaw, and though he gave some description of his person *he could not identify him with the defendant in the case. In Nelson v. Whittall, Bailey, J., expressed his dissatisfaction with the rule laid down by Phillips, that proof of the handwriting of the attesting witness is sufficient, where such witness is beyond the jurisdiction, and thought that such testimony alone was not sufficient to connect the defendant with the note, but that something more should be required. In Whitlock v. Musgrove, which was an action on a note purporting to be signed by a marksman, it was held that, while it was not necessary to prove the signature of the maker, it was necessary, in the absence of such proof, to prove "something else to connect the party sued with the instrument." The authority of these cases, however, must certainly be regarded as very much shaken by the more recent cases of Sewell v. Evans and Roden v. Ryde, 4 A. & E. (N. S.) 626. See, especially, the remarks of Lord Denman, C. J., and Patterson, J., in the latter case.

The last case among the decisions in this state which we have been able to find upon this subject is that of Jones v. Jones, 12 Rich. 116, decided in 1859, in which it was held that where the attesting witness to a note, signed with a + mark, was a free person of color, proof of his handwriting is not sufficient proof of the execution of the note, for the very obvious reason, as the court says, that "the witness could not have been called, not by reason of any intermediate disability supervening, but originally by reason of status; a fortiori, the proof of his handwriting merely was more objectionable." It is very true that the court, per Withers, J., does proceed to add these words: "But if he had been competent to attest and to prove the deed, and had died, such evidence as was offered would be insufficient. Other evidence of the defendant's signature would have been necessary still," for which Russell v. Tunno, supra, is cited as authority. But these words were not only clearly unnecessary to the determination of the question raised in the case, but the authority cited does not go to the extent of holding that "other evidence of the defendant's signature would have been necessary still," in such a case, for it is conceded in Russell v. Tunno that in case of a paper purporting to be executed with a mark, proof of the *handwriting of the subscribing witness would, under our decisions, be sufficient.

In New York the question seems to be settled, and there proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witness, when such witness is beyond the jurisdiction, seems to be sufficient without proof of the handwriting of the obligor or grantor. Mott v. Dougherty, 1 Johns. Cas. 230; Shuby v. Champlin, 4 Johns. 461; Davis v. Kimball, 19 Wend. 437.

From this review of the cases it will be seen that it cannot be said that there is any well-established rule upon the subject of universal or even general application; and while, perhaps, it would have been better to have adhered to the rule laid down by Phillips and Starkie as simple, definite and of easy application, well sustained, as it is, by high authority, we do not feel called upon to overrule the case of Russell v. Tunno, but are not willing to extend the rule there laid down beyond what that case imperatively demands. Conceding, however, the full force of that rule, we think that the testimony adduced in this case was amply sufficient to require that the question of the execution of the deed from Sarah Hane to Henry Lyons should have been submitted to the jury. For that rule does not require that the signature of the obligor or grantor shall be proved in addition to proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses, but only that something more than mere proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses is necessary; and in this case, as we have seen, there was something more than such proof. In addition to this it is conceded, as we have just said, in Russell v. Tunno, that in case of paper purporting to be signed with a + mark the rule is different under our decisions.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is set aside and a new trial ordered.

New trial granted.

WILLARD, C. J., and HASKELL, A. J., concurred.

*(Case No. 711.)

BENJAMIN SLOAN, Administrator of W. K. Easley v. EMMA M. WESTFIELD, Administratrix of John Westfield.

[1. Equity ⇐382.]

A motion on the law side of the court, before the judge presiding, for a new trial on the minutes of an issue ordered out of chancery, upon the ground that there was no evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury, is irregular and properly refused. Flinn & Hart v. Brown, 6 S. C. 209, explained.

[2. Equity ⇐381.]

A judgment entered up upon the verdict in such case, without further proceedings in the original cause in chancery, is erroneous, and upon proper motion should be set aside.

[3. Appeal and Error ⇐987.]

[In a trial at law it is only for errors at law that the case can be brought before the Supreme Court for correction, while in chancery there is a general appellate jurisdiction, and the whole matter would be subject to review, and the evidence might be examined, and the correctness of the finding subjected to the judgment of the Supreme Court.]

Before Cooke, J., at Greenville, January Term, 1878.

The facts are more fully stated in the opinion of the court than in the brief. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, whereupon defendants moved upon the minutes of the court for a new trial, upon the ground, substantially, that there was no evidence to sustain the verdict. The motion was refused, and defendants appealed.

Messrs. Simpson & Moore, for appellants.

Messrs. Earle & Wells, for respondents.

April 15th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. The appeal is from a refusal on the part of the Circuit judge to grant a new trial. Facts, which are of importance, are not clearly set forth in the statement of the case, and it becomes necessary that the nature of the original proceedings, as elicited at the hearing of the appeal, be stated. The party represented to be the plaintiff claims to be a creditor of the estate represented by the defendant. A proceeding in the nature of a creditor's bill, or of such character, it seems, had been instituted, and Benjamin Sloan, as administrator of Easley, came *in with other creditors to establish his claim. The claim was resisted in toto, and the Circuit judge made an order stating the fact in dispute, and directing a trial of that issue by a jury. Code, § 95; Rev. Stat. 587. There was, therefore, no such independent action at law as the title to the case in appeal would indicate, but the trial of an issue of fact arising out of another case of which the title is not stated. That case, although in the Court of Common Pleas, and in the form prescribed by the code of procedure, is of the nature of a case in chancery, and subject to the rules of distinction which exist between proceedings at law and in chancery under the constitution of 1868. That instrument recognizes the division of jurisdictional powers, although it confers both powers upon the same judge, and vests the Court of Common Pleas with jurisdiction in all matters of equity as well as law. The Code of Procedure, Section 92, abolishes all distinctions in form between legal and equitable proceedings. But the substantial difference, and the rules of practice essential thereto, are alike retained by the constitution. One of these instances is thus provided for in Section 95 of the code, as follows: "Feigned issues are abolished, and instead thereof, in the cases where the power now exists to order a feigned issue, or when a question of fact, not put in issue by the pleadings, is to be tried by a jury, an order for the trial may be made, stating distinctly and plainly the question of fact to be tried; and such order shall be the only authority necessary for a trial." See, also, Rev. Stat., p. 632, § 277. Such was the order in this case, viz., for a trial as under a feigned issue. The jury found for the "plaintiff," and the "defendant" moved, forthwith, before the judge who heard the issue, asking for a new trial upon the ground that there was no evidence to sustain the verdict. The motion was refused.

The first question is whether, under such circumstances, such motion was regular. The case of Flinn & Hart v. Brown, 6 S. C. 209, is in some respects different from this, but is important. "The subject matter of the [that] suit looking to the end it proposed, and the character of the relief which it claimed on behalf of the plaintiffs, constituted it 'a case in chancery,' as distinguished from one at law, and its mode of trial must be in *conformity with the rules and course of procedure prescribed for the trial of 'cases in chancery.' Sullivan v. Thomas, 3 S. C. 547." The only question which the jury could try in that case was that of fact as to whether "the additions to the deed were made by James M. Brown, Sr., after its execution." But the judge charged the jury in this way: "If the additions to the deed were made by James Brown, Sr., after its execution, under all the circumstances, it would render it void." He thus submitted to the jury the determination of the whole cause, and the jury found accordingly that the deed was void. The motion was made for new trial because of error in the judge's charge, but was refused and judgment entered up. The appeal went up, not from the order refusing new trial, but from the judgment, which was the final judgment in the cause. The decision on the appeal was not because of error in not granting a new trial by jury, but was upon the final judgment and remanding the case "to the Circuit Court for hearing." The case, so far from being authority for a motion for new trial of such issue, is, in its whole purport, to the contrary, although that point was not directly in question. The decision is founded upon the constitutional provision which distinguishes chancery from cases at law, and upon the well-recognized principle that the verdict of a jury upon such an issue is not binding, but is merely to "relieve and ease the conscience of the court," and, in fact, may be disregarded by the judge in the execution of his chancery power. The Circuit judge's error was on that point. He treated the whole matter as an action at law the moment the jury came in to the trial. It was a proceeding in equity, and the rulings on that point are all to which we refer as specially applicable to the case before us. There is an expression, however, in the opinion on which it may be well to remark to prevent misconstruction. It is said, "the verdict cannot be allowed to stand." It may be argued from those words that the court was really considering the motion for a new trial of the issue of fact. The context and the whole reasoning will show that to be a mistake, and that the court was considering not the verdict, but the adoption of it by the judge, and the reasons for his decision on that point, and his judgment based on the verdict. "It was within his power," the Supreme *Court says, speaking of the ruling of the Circuit judge, "entirely to have disregarded the verdict, and decreed in the face of it. But when he adopts it, not because it concurred with his own views of the testimony, but simply because it is the verdict of the jury, and must, therefore, control him; if he has erred in his instructions as to the law on a point made material by the effect which was given to it in his charge as an element necessary for the consideration of the jury, the verdict cannot be allowed to stand." That is to say: The first error on the part of the judge was to consider himself bound at all by the verdict, and the second was that even if he had regarded the verdict in its proper light, but had given it weight in his decision, the latter was a mistake, because the charge in the law branch of the case—the trial of the issue of fact by jury—was totally wrong, and calculated to mislead the jury, and should have deprived the verdict of all weight. To recur now to the point directly in question was the motion for a new trial proper. Could it be considered by the Circuit judge? This must be answered by reference to the rules of chancery practice. It makes no difference that whether by accident or that statute, as it then stood, the judge before whom the suit in chancery was and the judge who presided at the trial of the issue by jury, chanced to be the same person. The functions of the office are distinct, and the unity of the person only renders it the more important that the duality of those functions should be rigidly preserved. The recent change in the statute, by which the circuits are alternated among the judges, practically remedies much of the confusion which was arising under the former system. What was the practice in equity, under similar circumstances, is thus stated: "If the party against whom the verdict is found is dissatisfied with it, and wishes for a new trial, he must make application for it to this court, [viz., the Court of Chancery,] in which respect the practice upon issues differs from the practice upon actions at law brought under the direction of the court, a new trial for which must always be moved for in the court in which the action is brought. The reason for this distinction is laid down by Lord Eldon to be that if this court thinks proper to consider the case upon the record as fit to be governed by the result of a *trial, the review or propriety of which belongs to a court of law, the opinion of a court of law is sought in such a form that it is regarded as conclusive, whether the judgment is obtained upon a verdict or in any other shape; but upon an issue directed, this court reserves to itself the review of all that passed at law; and one principle upon which the motion for a new trial is made here, and not to the court of law, is, that this court regards the judge's report with a view to determine whether the information collected before the jury, together with that which appears upon the record, is sufficient to enable it to proceed satisfactorily, to which it did not conceive itself competent previously." 3 Dan. Ch. Pr. *747. It is possible, and, indeed, not unfrequent, that the latter occurs, and the reason which would demand a new trial in the court of law, upon the ground, for instance, that the verdict is directly contrary to the evidence, would render another trial of the issue totally unnecessary to the Chancellor or the judge sitting in equity. The conclusiveness of the evidence furnishes all that equity needed. Thus the strongest reason for a new trial at law is the best reason why it would be denied on an issue emanating from a case in equity. "The consequence of the principle above laid down is that there is a material difference between courts of law and courts of equity in the rules by which they are guided in granting new trials." It will sometimes be granted in equity, where the verdict is against preponderating evidence, or rather against the weight of the testimony, especially, it is said, where the judge intimates in his report that he is not satisfied with the verdict; while in law it is granted either because the verdict is against evidence or is without any evidence to sustain it, or for excessive damages, &c. But neither in point of practice nor of law is the verdict conclusive, although new trial be refused when the trial is an issue sent from chancery. Sometimes, however, it is made conclusive by the court's having made that a condition of the order granting a trial of an issue of fact. 2 Story's Eq. Jur., §§ 1478–9, note a. The practice in this state was the same as laid down by the above authorities.

"Issues to the court of law are directed by this court (that of equity) for the purpose of informing the conscience of the Chancellors, and if this purpose be achieved we do not examine the *process very narrowly. If, upon a particular issue, we might suppose that the law court was in some error as to the law, we should not grant a new trial of the issue upon this express ground, for this would imply the arrogant pretension on our part that we understood the law better than those to whom its administration was committed by the polity of the state. But we would look to the materiality or the importance of the supposed error. If the verdict were, upon the whole, satisfactory, no notice would be taken of minute departures from our notions of principle or procedure. But, if we regarded the supposed mistakes of the court trying the issue to be so material that our consciences were not satisfied as to the general result of the trial, while we should not undertake to rectify the rulings of the other court, we might order the parties to try the issue again, and request of the other court that a particular course should be pursued as to the points on which we were dissatisfied." Thomasson v. Kennedy, 3 Rich. Eq. 440.

Neither the rules nor the reasons for them are changed by the alternation in the form of procedure, or by the powers of law and equity having been vested in one court.

In the case of Railroad Company v. Toomer, 9 Rich. Eq. 270, an issue of fact having been sent to the court of law, it is said that if an action "had been ordered the appeal would have been to the law court of appeals from the trial had, otherwise when the order is of an issue or an issue in the nature of an action. In such cases the motion must be made on the return of the issue in the court from which it emanated, not by way of appeal, for another issue or a new trial, if that court is not satisfied with what has been done." For a succinct statement of the practice, and the reasons for it, see, also, Adams' Eq. pp. *377–8.

The importance of a ruling upon this point is obvious, and the more so, when we call attention to the fact that under the constitution, the question whether the trial was at law or in equity involves the rights also of the parties on an appeal to this court. For, in a trial at law it is only for errors at law that the case can be brought before the court for correction, while in cases of chancery there is a general appellate jurisdiction.

If, for instance, *the trial of such an issue is an action at law, exclusively within the jurisdiction of the judge presiding at the trial of the issue, and subject to his ruling on the question of new trial, nothing could be corrected by this court but error at law on the part of the judge; while, on the other hand, if the question had pursued its proper course, and had come up in the case from which it arose, the whole matter would have been subject to review, and the evidence might have been examined and the correctness of the finding subjected to the judgment of this court. It is unnecessary to dwell further. The motion for a new trial was entirely irregular and was properly refused.

The verdict, together with the judge's notes of the evidence, with any exceptions to his rulings on questions of law, should have been sent over to the chancery side of the court and made a part of the original proceeding. It was, however, stated by the attorneys on both sides that judgment had been entered up on the verdict as if the trial had been in a separate action. The appellants urged that they appealed to stay the execution of said judgment, and the respondent, in a preliminary motion to strike the case from the docket, urged that the motive on the part of the appellants was to retard the execution of said judgment. The matter was thus forced upon the attention of the court, and while it is not before the court for adjudication, for the appeal is not on a motion to set aside the judgment, the court, nevertheless, feels called upon to say that such practice is entirely erroneous, and that upon proper motion such judgment should be set aside. To frame an issue was never intended to be the means of giving a preference or advantage to any party in a proceeding arising on the chancery side of the court.

The appeal is dismissed.

Motion refused.

Appeal dismissed.

*(Case No. 713.)

THE CENTRAL NATIONAL BANK v. AMY G. ADAMS.

[Bills and Notes ⟸421.]

Notice of dishonor of a promissory note was sent by mail, addressed to an endorser in care of the maker, at Adams' Cut, where there was no post-office, under information received by the notary, after the exercise of due diligence, that Adams' Cut was the endorser's post-office; the post-office nearest to Adams' Cut was one of the endorser's post-offices; the notice never reached the endorser or the maker —held, that due diligence had been used, and that the endorser was not discharged.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Diercks v. Roberts, 13 S. C. 343.

For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1186, 1187; Dec. Dig. ⟸421.]

Before Aldrich, J., at Richland, July Term, 1878.

This case came up on appeal from an order of the Circuit judge, confirming the report of Hon. C. P. Townsend, special referee, to whom it was referred to hear and determine the same; he having heard the cause while a Circuit judge, without a jury, by consent, and resigned his office before rendering a decision. The judgment was for the plaintiff. The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. W. H. Wigg and J. D. Pope, for appellant.

1. What is the contract of endorsement? 1 Dan. on Neg. Inst. § 667; 1 Pars. on B. & N. 353–356; Story on Bills, § 109; Chit. on Bills *214.

"And in default of notice the party entitled to notice is at once discharged." 2 Dan. on Neg. Inst., § 970; Byles on Bills *231.

2. How can notice be effected? (1.) By mail, addressed to the party at his proper post-office. (2.) By personal service only, if the party resides in the town or city, at his residence or place of business. (3.) By special messenger, if there be no post-office communication, and the party does not reside in the town or city.

If sent by special messenger and a delay longer than by regular mail ensues, this will discharge the endorser. Story on Bills *295; Byles on Bills *220. Where notice is to be sent by gen*eral post, it should be in writing and properly directed, or it may be fatal. Story on Bills 300.

3. Has notice been given to Amy G. Adams? If it is contended that notice was sent by mail, we answer: (1) That it was not addressed to Amy G. Adams. (2) That it was not sent to her regular post-office—Grovewood. (3) That it was addressed to no post-office at all, "Adams' Cut" being no post-office. 1 Pet. 580; 1 Am. Lead. Cas. 396, note 400; 2 Rich. 339. It must be duly directed to post-office of endorser and directed to him. Story on Bills 227–382.

The notice here is fatally defective. The bank—(1.) Employed the mail, but directed the letter to no known post-office. This is fatal. (2.) The bank does not direct the notice to Mrs. Adams, at her post-office, but to the care of James P. Adams, not at his post-office even, but to a place that is not a post-office at all. This is fatal. (3.) The bank uses the mail, but addresses the letter to James Adams, at a place that is not a post-office, and then employs him as the messenger to pick up the letter somewhere, and asks the messenger to deliver the notice to Mrs. Adams. (4.) The evidence shows that Mr. James P. Adams, the bank's messenger, never received the letter. But is it diligence to direct a notice to the endorser and to use as its messenger the very person whose interest it was to destroy the letter and not deliver the notice?

The fatal error on the part of the notary is in addressing to a place, within a few miles, which place was not a post-office. Inquiry at the public post-office would have given the information; to fail to do so was negligence.

Mr. F. W. McMaster, contra.

McIVER, A. J. This was an action against the defendant as endorser of a negotiable note, and the sole question raised by the appeal is whether the plaintiff used due diligence in giving notice of the dishonor of the note. The facts are undisputed, and are as follows: On the 25th of September, 1875, James P. Adams executed his note payable to Amy G. Adams, who, as an accommodation, endorsed the same to the plaintiff. The note not being paid at maturity, it was protested, and notice of non-payment was, in due time, sent by mail, postage pre-paid, in a letter addressed to "Amy G. Adams, care of James P. Adams, Adams' Cut." There was no such post-office as Adams' Cut, but the instructions to mail agents, in case a letter is directed to a place where there is no post-office, are to leave it at the nearest post-office, and Gadsden is the nearest post-office to Adams' Cut, on the South Carolina railroad. The appellant lives equidistant between Gadsden and Adams' Cut, and letters for her frequently came to Gadsden, which were taken out by her friends and servants. The letter containing the notice in question was never received, either by Mrs. Adams or James P. Adams. The regular post-office of appellant, "until the last two years," was Gadsden, since which time Grovewood has been her post-office. Owing to the want of date as to when the testimony was taken, it is impossible to say when these "last two years" commenced to run, and as the case does not show the date of the trial, we have no means of determining when it was that appellant's post-office was changed from Gadsden to Grovewood, or whether such change had been made before or after the maturity of the note. All that we know is, that the note became payable on the 5th of October, 1875, and the original hearing before Judge Townsend, when the testimony was taken, was some time in the latter part of the year 1877. The appellant lives about a mile and a half from Grovewood and four miles from Gadsden. James P. Adams testified that he never took out Mrs. Adams' letters; that Grovewood was his post-office, but he occasionally got letters directed to him at Gadsden and Hopkins, and that he had received private letters dropped at Adams' Cut, but not through the mails. The notary who sent the notice to Mrs. Adams got *his information as to Mrs. Adams' post-office from Walter Fisher, who frequently hunted in that neighborhood; was well acquainted with the residence of the defendant, and was the person from whom the notary always got his information when he wanted to send notices of protest into that neighborhood. When the facts are undisputed the question of diligence is a question of law. Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, 1 Pet. 578 [7 L. Ed. 269]; Thompson v. Bank, 3 Hill 82 [30 Am. Dec. 354]; Bateman v. Joseph, 12 East 433. And while it is unquestionably the duty of the holder to give notice to the endorser of the dishonor of a note, except in certain cases, not necessary to be mentioned here, he is only bound to use due diligence in communicating the notice, and is not required to see that such notice actually reached the party for whom it is intended. If he employ the usual and ordinary mode of conveyance, he has done all that the law requires of him. Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, supra. The usual and ordinary mode of conveyance by which such notices may be transmitted, where the parties reside in different places, though in the same county, is the mail. Foster v. Sineath, 2 Rich. 338. And the usage of the officers employed in the various details of the operations of the post-office department, as prescribed by law and the rules and regulations of the department, are proper and important to be considered in determining a question of diligence. Dickins v. Beal, 10 Pet. 579 [9 L. Ed. 538].

Now in this case there is no doubt but that the notice to appellant was mailed in due time, there being no question raised as to that, and the only question is as to whether it was properly directed. It was not directed to any legal post-office, but by the regulations of the post-office department, it was the duty of the mail agent to leave the letter at the nearest post-office, which was Gadsden, so that the question may be considered as if the letter has been directed to Gadsden, which certainly had been the post-office of appellant, and for aught that appears to the contrary in the "case," was still her post-office at the time the notice was sent, though not her post-office at the time of the trial or at the time her testimony was taken. But we are not disposed to rest our decision upon this, and will assume that Mrs. Adams had changed her post-office before the notice was sent. Even upon this as*sumption we still think that due diligence was used. For there is no evidence whatever to show that plaintiff knew or had any reason to suppose that she had changed her post-office; and the testimony shows that the letter containing the notice was directed in conformity with information obtained from a person who was likely to know her address. The rule is, that where the holder is ignorant of the address of the endorser, he is only bound to use due diligence by inquiring of persons likely to know to ascertain such address, and if, after using such diligence, the information which he receives, and upon which he acts, proves to be incorrect, it will be sufficient. Harris v. Robinson, 4 How. 336 [11 L. Ed. 1000]; Lambert v. Ghiselin, 9 How. 552 [13 L. Ed. 254]; Chapman v. Lipscomb, 1 Johns. 294. As is said in Harris v. Robinson: "It is enough to send the notices to the place where the information received reasonably requires him to send them. If the place it reaches is the wrong one, he is not then in fault." Whether due diligence has been used in making such inquiries, is a question of fact. Bateman v. Joseph, 12 East 433; Thompson v. Bank, 3 Hill 82-3 [30 Am. Dec. 354]. And that question has been determined against the appellant, both by the referee and the Circuit judge.

In addition to this, the testimony shows that Mrs. Adams continued to receive letters from the post-office at Gadsden; and where persons are in the habit of receiving letters addressed to them at two or more post-offices, a notice addressed to either of such offices will be sufficient. It is not necessary, in such case, that it should be addressed to the office nearest to the residence of the party for whom the notice is intended. Bank v. Carneal, 2 Pet. 551 [7 L. Ed. 513]. In Saco National Bank v. Sanborn, 63 Me. 340, (18 Am. R. 224,) the endorser had lived for many years in the town of Baldwin, but at the time the note upon which the suit was brought, became payable, he lived in the adjoining town of Denmark. The notice was directed to "Baldwin," but there was no post-office of that name, there being three post-offices in the town known by the names of "North Baldwin," "East Baldwin," and "West Baldwin." The notice was sent upon information received from persons most likely to know. It also appeared that at the time of the maturity of the note, there were two directories in common use in Saco which gave the defendant's *residence as Denmark: Held, that due diligence had been used. The court uses this language, which we think, is a correct statement of the rule: "Proof that a letter containing the proper information, seasonably put into the post-office, directed to the endorser at the place where, after diligent inquiry, he was supposed to reside, will sustain the averment of notice, although, as matter of fact, the endorser did not reside there and the letter never reached him." And, again, the court says: "If the endorser changes his residence and does not give the holder notice of such change, and he does not, in fact, know it, and is not guilty of negligence in not knowing it, notice sent to his former residence is sufficient. And when nothing has occurred to suggest the idea of a change, no inquiry is necessary." These remarks apply with increased force to a change of post-office, which, of course, is not likely to be so notorious as a change of residence. If, therefore, as we have seen, by reason of the post-office regulations, the notice in this case, though in fact directed to Adams' Cut, was practically sent to Gadsden, the nearest post-office, which, to say the least of it, had been the post-office of defendant up to about the time the notice was sent, the notice was unquestionably sufficient, as there is no evidence whatever that the plaintiff knew or had any reason to suppose that her post-office had been changed.

It is argued, however, that the manner in which the letter containing the notice was directed, Mrs. Amy G. Adams, care of James P. Adams, was objectionable. We are unable to perceive the force of this argument. The usual object of that mode of address is to expedite the delivery of the letter, and so far from its being any evidence of negligence, it would seem to point to a contrary conclusion. If the letter had been directed to James P. Adams, with a request that he would forward the notice enclosed to the defendant, there might be some force in the argument used at the hearing, that the plaintiff had employed Mr. Adams as a messenger to deliver the notice to Mrs. Adams. But such was not the case. The letter was directed to Mrs. Adams, and would have been delivered to her if she had called in person at the post-office or sent an agent or servant for her mail, whereas if it had been directed to Mr. Adams it could only have been *properly delivered to him or his order. By the mode of address which was adopted, her chances of receiving it promptly were increased rather than diminished, as, doubtless, was the purpose in using that mode. Nor are we able to perceive the force of the argument that it was anything but diligence to direct a letter containing a notice to the endorser of the nonpayment of a note to the maker of such note—"the very person whose interest it was to destroy the letter and not deliver the notice." For this argument rests upon two assumptions, neither of which is well founded: 1. That the letter was directed to the maker of the note. 2. That a person who receives a letter directed to another in his care, is at liberty to open such letter and acquaint himself with the contents.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

11 S. C. 458

THE STATE, ex rel. THOMAS P. BRANCH, v. S. L. LEAPHART, State Treasurer.

(November Term, 1878.)

Under an act passed in 1873 to reduce the volume of the public debt, the state was pledged to make an annual levy of two mills, the money so raised to be kept in the treasury, and applied only to payment of interest on the bonds and stocks issued under the authority of that act, the surplus to be used as a fund for the redemption of the principal. In 1877, and in March, 1878, the legislature failed to make such specific levy, but levied in their supply acts of those dates a tax to be applied inter alia to interest on such securities issued under the authority of the act of 1873, as should be declared valid under certain proceedings then respectively pending, to inquire into and determine their validity. After the investigation ordered in act of 1877 had been completed, but pending the further proceedings directed by the act of March, 1878, the legislature, in their supply act of December, 1878, made an appropriation of the money then in the state treasury, realized under the levies of June, 1877, and March, 1878, to interest on certain unquestioned securities issued under act of 1873, and *under a subsequent act of the legislature. Upon an application for mandamus to the state treasurer to compel payment according to the directions of the appropriation of December, 1878, held—

[1. States ⊂⊃132.]

That the appropriation by the act of December, 1878, of the moneys in the treasury raised under the supply acts of 1877, and March, 1878, affected no fund derived under the act of 1873, and violated no contract of the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 130; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃132.]

[2. States ⊂⊃118.]

That the appropriation of an unexpended balance in the treasury at the close of a fiscal year is not an act of borrowing, and is not repugnant to Section 3, Article IX., or to Sections 7 and 14, Article IX., of the state constitution.

For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 117; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃118.]

[3. States ⊂⊃126.]

That this appropriation was not in violation of Section 4, Article IX., of the state constitution. McIver, A. J., dissenting as to the moneys derived from levy made under act of March, 1878.

What is the meaning of this section?

Willard, C. J., holds, that the object of a tax is sufficiently indicated by the general title of the act levying it, and when there is no law creating or sanctioning the subject matter of an appropriation, or it is no longer attainable, the moneys derived under such act may be appropriated to other objects under the same general head, if no legislative contract be thereby violated. Distinction drawn between this case and Morton v. Comptroller-General, 4 S. C. 430.

Haskell, A. J., concurs with Willard, C. J., and holds further, that the object of an appropriation under an act to defray the ordinary expenses of the government is accomplished by the close of the fiscal year, and all moneys then in the treasury under such act become an unexpended balance, requiring further appropriation by the legislature.

McIver, A. J., holds, that the object of a tax levy is the specific purpose to which the money so to be raised is applied by the act directing the levy, and that this money cannot be thereafter diverted, until such object has been accomplished, or has become impossible of attainment.

This was an original proceeding in this court, praying a writ of mandamus, commanding the state treasurer, in accordance with the provisions of the appropriation act of December, 1878, to pay to the relator interest maturing in 1879 on certain bonds, reported to the legislature in February, 1878, by the bond commission to be valid obligations of the state, and specified in Schedule 5 of their report; and also to pay interest on certain bonds and stock issued under the act of March 22d, 1878, and designated as Deficiency Bonds and Stocks.

The application was resisted in behalf of certain bond creditors whose securities were specified in Schedule 6 of the report of the bond commission, and were undergoing investigation under the *proceedings instituted in the Special Court of Claims organized under joint resolution of March 22d, 1878.

The grounds of resistance sufficiently appear in the arguments submitted in opposition to the application for the writ.

Mr. A. G. Magrath, for relator.

The money in the treasury out of which the relator asks payment was not raised under the funding act of 1873, nor by a specific levy, but by a levy for a gross amount of taxes under acts of 1877 and 1878. These acts are not in pari materia with the funding act. This money was intended to pay interest on the unrecognized debt, when recognized; under act of December, 1878, it is appropriated to pay interest on the recognized debt. The original disposition of this fund created no contract, express or implied. It was kept by the state in the hands of its own agent, and its power of disposition was uncontrolled.

The legislature never intended to regard the scheme of the funding act. And there can be no presumption of the surrender by the state of the powers which belong to it. An irrevocable disposition by the state of this fund would be equivalent to a transfer and assignment. Cases upon this point will be found collected in 3 Lead. Cas. in Eq. 363. None of the tests there given would establish the intention of the state here to part with the power to control. That control has been exercised in act of December, 1878.

An act will be declared unconstitutional by the courts, only when it is clearly so. See 6 Cr. 87; 4 Wheat. 625; 66 Penna. St. 164; 15 Rich. 66; 2 Bail. 673. This act is said to violate the constitution of the United States. What contract is violated? The state has not recognized the obligation of bonds in Schedule 6 of the report of the bond commission—only those in Schedule 5. The direction to her agent to pay interest on a bond is not a contract with the holder of the bond, which would prevent the state from directing a different disposition by her agent of her own money. It is said that it disturbs the scheme of the funding act; this the state does not acknowledge. And the opponents of this motion have abandoned all rights under the funding *act by their voluntary submission to the investigation ordered by the state.

Nor does it violate Article IX., Section 4, of our constitution. By reference to the tax act and appropriation act of March, 1878, it will be observed that revenue is to be raised only for the one fiscal year, and is to defray the annual ordinary expenditures. The operation of a supply act expires with the year. 15 Rich. 138. This is in accordance with the mode and practice which has prevailed in Great Britain. Hall Const. Hist.: 1 May Const. Hist. 478. And we have it incorporated in this section of our constitution. It was not intended to be a check upon the legislature, but to secure obedience by the agent to the directions of the legislature. To maintain that money once appropriated to any object could, under no circumstances, be disposed of by a future legislature, would lead to irrational results, and impose upon the legislature limitations at variance with the constitution and at war with the welfare of the people.

Mr. Samuel Lord, Jr., contra.

1. Sections 3, 7 and 9 of the funding act entered into and formed a material part of the contract made by the state with the holders of bonds issued under its direction and authority, and that by this contract the state obligated itself, first, to levy an annual tax of two mills upon the dollar upon the entire taxable property of the state; second, to keep the fund so created separate and apart from all other funds; third, to apply it to the payment of the annually-accruing interest upon the bonds and stocks issued under the act; and, fourth, to apply any surplus remaining in the treasury, after the payment of interest, to the purchase of the bonds issued under the act, in accordance with the provisions of the ninth section.

That these sections of the act are a part of the contract of the state with the bondholders, is settled by the following cases: 4 S. C. 430; 8 S. C. 71; 2 Otto 531.

This money, then, having been levied under a contract between the bondholders and the state, which required it to be appropriated to a certain purpose, to wit, to the payment of the coupons which matured respectively during the year for which the taxes *were levied, and the legislature having, in pursuance of the contract, appropriated it to that purpose, the attempt made by the act of December, 1878, to divert the fund to an entirely different purpose, is a violation of the contract made with the bondholder, and repugnant to Article I., Section 10, of the constitution of the United States.

Instead, therefore, of ordering the treasurer to obey the act of December, 1878, it would clearly be the duty of this court to impound this fund to prevent its diversion, and to see that it is kept separate and apart for the purposes specified in the act of 1873, and to which it was appropriated by the acts of June, 1877, and March 1878.

It is true that the legislature has annexed to this appropriation a condition, but we submit that this condition is one not warranted by the terms of the contract embodied in the act of 1873, and that so much of the act of 1878 as imposes it is unconstitutional and void.

We do not, of course, deny the right of the state to question the validity of any bond, but we do deny its right to require the holder to establish his claim in a special court, of limited jurisdiction, authorized to try only "test cases," and to which he can only have access through the "consent of the attorney-general and his associates." A law which imposes terms like these violates the obligation of the contract under the guise of regulating the remedy. 8 Rich. 81; 6 Otto 448.

It is at least clear that until the disputed bonds have been declared invalid by a competent court, the state cannot determine that question in her own favor, and dispose of that portion of the fund which has been set apart for the payment of the interest due upon them.

Even if all the disputed bonds be void, this contemplated diversion cannot be legally made, because the seventh section of the act of 1873 requires the surplus of the tax remaining in the treasury, after payment of the interest, to be applied to the extinguishment of the debt. The object of this stipulation was to add to the worth and security of the bond, and it constitutes an essential part of the contract. The act of 1878 undertakes to appropriate, to a wholly different purpose, a fund specifically *appropriated for the payment of the bonds by the very act under which they were issued, and by Article IX., Section 4, of the constitution.

The necessary effect of the proposed appropriation will be to break up the whole scheme of the funding act and destroy all the benefits anticipated from it—benefits on which those who accepted its terms had a right to rely. It was the special object of that scheme, by providing extraordinary security and sanctions for the payment of the consolidated bonds, to induce the public creditors to reduce their claims fifty per cent. and exchange them for these new securities, and thus diminish the aggregate indebtedness of the state $10,000,000. This result would enhance the general credit of the state, and enable it to meet all its obligations and engagements with more certainty and less liability to failure. The creditors who surrendered their old bonds and took fifty per cent. of the amount in new bonds, in full satisfaction, did so on the faith that the scheme should be carried into effect as a whole. It cannot be supposed that they would have made the sacrifice they did without relying, as they had a right to do, on the whole scheme being rigidly carried out. The proposal to pay the coupons on the bonds of the petitioner, which shall mature in 1879, out of the taxes levied in 1877 and 1878, not only destroys the most essential features of the scheme, but makes an unjust discrimination between one class of creditors and another. 2 Otto 540.

2. The act of December, 1878, is simply a borrowing of this fund to defray the current expenses of the state, and is therefore in violation of Article IX., Section 3, of the constitution.

3. If the payment on the interest is not an ordinary expense of the state, then the forced loan made by the act of December, 1878, must be designed to defray an "extraordinary expenditure," and comes within the provisions of Sections 7 and 14 of Article IX. Upon all above points, see Graham v. Horton, 6 Kan. 343.

4. The diversion of the funds contemplated by the act is a palpable violation of Section 4, Article IX., of the constitution. The effect of this provision is to deprive the legislature of all power of misapplication by an authoritative and imperative ap*propriation to the specific object set forth in the tax law as the ground of raising the specific tax. 4 S. C. 458.

5. Mandamus will not be granted if the interests of third parties are involved who are not before the court, even though it is averred that the claim of such parties is void. High on Man., § 39; 29 Texas, 508.

Mr. W. H. Brawley, on same side.

WILLARD, C. J. The relator asks a writ of mandamus to compel the state treasurer to pay from the treasury money appropriated to pay the class of claims to which those of the relator belong, by the nineteenth section of the act to make appropriations, approved December 24th, 1878. 16 Stat. 757. The only question presented for consideration is the constitutionality of the act making such appropriation. The various objections to this act will be noticed in the order presented in the points in behalf of the respondent.

The first objection is that it violates a legislative contract made with certain holders of bonds and stocks by an act entitled "An act to reduce the volume of the public debt, and to provide for the payment of the same," approved December 22d, 1873. 15 Stat. 518.

The object of this act was to consolidate the pre-existing bonded debt of the state, including outstanding state stocks, reduced to fifty cents on the dollar, and to re-issue the same in bonds of an uniform character, to be known as consolidation bonds and in stocks. A large number of bonds and stocks issued under this act are now outstanding, and it is alleged that the act of 1878 is unconstitutional in its operation on the rights of some of the parties holding these securities. Section 3 of the act of 1873 is as follows: "That the bonds and certificates of stocks herein authorized to be issued shall have upon their face the words 'consolidation bonds,' 'certificates of stocks,' and shall also bear upon their face the declaration that the payment of the interest and the redemption of the principal, is secured by the levy of an annual tax of two (2) mills upon the dollar upon the *entire taxable property of the state, which declaration shall be considered a contract entered into between the state and every holder of said bonds and stocks."

In order to bring the appropriation act of 1878 into conflict with these provisions, it will be necessary to show that there were at the passage of that act funds derived from the source indicated in the section of the act of 1873 just recited; that by the operation of that section such funds are secured to certain objects by the terms of a legislative contract, and that the appropriation act of 1878 has assumed to divert them from that object.

It must be conceded that the appropriation to pay the relator's demand is an appropriation for an object inconsistent with that of the act of 1873, and that it assumes to make a disposition of certain funds in the treasury.

The question then remains whether these funds were placed through the operation of a previous legislative contract beyond the reach of such legislation.

The scheme of the act of 1873, as it regards the remedy afforded for the payment of interest, (the word interest being here intended to include that covered by both coupons and interest orders on stocks) appears to have been that the legislature should annually cause to be levied a tax of two mills on the dollar on all the taxable property of the state, to be exclusively devoted to the payment of such interest.

Accordingly, at the same session and upon the same day in which the act of 1873 became a law, the general assembly, in the annual supply bill for the fiscal year 1873–74 levied a tax of one mill "to pay the half-yearly interest upon the public debt of the state (adjusted at the present session,) due and payable on July 1st, 1874." Again a tax of two mills was levied in each of the years 1874–75, and 1875–6, for the specific purposes contemplated by the act of 1873. Subsequently to the last-mentioned fiscal year the specific levy for that purpose has not been made. If it had been made to appear that any moneys collected under either of the tax levies above mentioned remained in the treasury, and were subject to being affected by the provisions of the appropriation act of 1878, a question would have been presented whether such funds were not placed, under the operation of the *act of 1873, beyond the power of the general assembly to make any other disposition of them than that contemplated by the act of 1873. But that fact is not made to appear, and cannot be assumed.

We must assume that whatever funds are in the treasury of the class here involved were derived under the supplies ordered for the fiscal years 1876–77, and 1877–78. As we shall see hereafter, there are claims for the payment of interest for both of those fiscal years outstanding, and undergoing inquiry as to their validity. The question then presents itself, whether any portion of the moneys levied and collected under the tax act for the fiscal year 1876–77, are devoted to the payment of such unpaid interest of that year by the provisions of the third section of the act of 1873 already cited. The tax act of 1876–77 was passed June 9th, 1877. 16 Stat. 286. It levies a tax of seven mills on the dollar for the following purposes, to wit: To meet appropriations. First, to defray current expenses of the government for the fiscal year ending October 31st, 1877; second, to pay interest due on January 1st, 1877, and on July 1st, 1877, upon the consolidated bonds and certificates of stock which have been issued under the act to reduce the volume of the public debt and provide for the payment of the same, approved December 22d, 1873, which shall be found valid and bona fide by the commission to investigate the same, and be approved by the general assembly at the next regular session thereof; and third, to pay such other indebtedness of the state as may be reported to be valid by the said commission, and to which it may be applied by the general assembly at its next regular session." The question then is, whether any of the moneys collected under this act are brought under the operation of the third section of the act of 1873, already recited, so that their disposition is to be governed by that section of the act of 1873 to such extent as to defeat any of the provisions of the immediate tax act, under which it was raised, inconsistent with that section of the act of 1873. This question cannot be determined by the result of an inquiry whether the legislature was bound by the act of 1873 to raise such a fund as that act called for; for if it be conceded that such is the case, that could not change the character of the fund in the treasury raised for other *purposes, even though inconsistent therewith. This case does not involve the questions of the general duty of the legislature under the act of 1873, but simply the character and destination of a specific fund in the treasury, and that must be determined by the law of its creation, not by an inquiry as to what that law should have been, but what it is. It will be found that the tax act of 1876–77 contemplates different objects from those indicated by the act of 1873, and provides no fund that can be disposed of under the last-named act without violating the law under which such fund was created.

The tax levy for 1876–77 is not such a tax contemplated by the act of 1873. That intended by the act of 1873 was a specific tax of two mills on the dollar, for the payment of interest and the redemption of the principal of the consolidated debt. The term consolidated debt is here intended to describe the class of bonds and stocks with their coupons and interest orders issued under the act of 1873. Such a tax would produce a fund of an ascertained amount, the whole of which, when realized, would be devoted exclusively to the object just stated. The tax act for 1876–77 levies a gross sum for all purposes, and sets apart no ascertainable proportion of the sums collected for either of the several objects for which it was passed. First, the current expenses of the government are provided for; next, it is to pay only such interest on the consolidated debt as should accrue during that fiscal year upon such of the consolidated bonds and stocks as should be found "to be valid and bona fide by the commission to investigate the same, and be approved by the general assembly at the next regular session thereof;" and third, on a class of obligations to which the relator's claims belong.

The provision for the payment of the interest on the consolidated debt does not recognize the act of 1873 as the test of the validity of the bonds and stocks issued under it, but contemplates an investigation by the general assembly of the validity of the issues made under that act by means of a commission, which was created at that session for that purpose, and finally reserves to itself, at its next regular session, the final determination as to the validity or invalidity of such issues. It is therefore clear that the tax law of 1876–77 cannot be regarded as intended to *carry out the objects and intents of the third section of the act of 1873.

We will next consider whether any money collected under the tax act of 1877–78, (16 Stat. 549,) is controlled by the provisions of the third section of the act of 1873. This act levies a tax of four and a half mills on the dollar, "for the purpose of meeting appropriations to defray the current expenses of the government for the fiscal year commencing November 1st, 1877, and to meet such other indebtedness as have been or shall be provided for in the several acts enacted by the present session of the general assembly for the same." It is not claimed that any appropriation was made at this session professing to carry out the objects and provisions of the third section of the act of 1873.

It is therefore clear that the conclusion already stated in reference to the act of 1876–77, has a still stronger bearing on its application to the act of 1877–78, and we must finally conclude that the appropriation under which the relator claims does not affect any fund in the treasury, derived under the third section of the act of 1873, or secured to particular objects under that section, as it regards their legal destination. Such being the case, the appropriation of these funds to other objects than those designated by the third section of the act of 1873, by the appropriation of 1878, cannot be claimed to be repugnant to any constitutional right to such funds derived under the third section of the act of 1873.

The seventh and ninth sections of the act of 1873 have been pointed out as bearing on the constitutionality of the appropriation act of 1878. Section 7 relates exclusively to the disposition of a "surplus fund," for which provision is made in Section 6, and Section 9 relates to the application of that surplus fund, after payment of accruing interest to the purchase of consolidated bonds and stocks, by way of reducing the principal of such bonded debt. It is a sufficient answer to this objection that no such fund appears to exist, nor could it be created out of funds derived to the treasury under the acts of 1876–77 and 1877–78, without violating the provisions of those acts, as it regards the destination of the funds so ordered to be raised, as we have already seen.

This *cannot be done through any operation of the act of 1873, as we have also seen.

The second point made is, that the provisions of the act of 1878 are, in effect, the borrowing of money to defray current expenses, in violation of Article IX., Section 3, of the constitution, which directs that the general assembly shall provide for an annual tax sufficient to defray the estimated expenses of the state for each year. The appropriation of money remaining in the treasury at the close of a fiscal year, unexpended for appropriations for that year, has not the slightest resemblance to an act of borrowing.

The foregoing also disposes of the third point involving the same idea, that the transaction in question is an act of borrowing.

The fourth point is, that the relator claims a direction of funds in violation of Article IX., Section 4, of the constitution, which provides that no tax shall be levied, except in pursuance of a law, which shall distinctly state the object of the same, to which object such tax shall be applied.

Much embarrassment surrounds the construction of this section of the constitution, if regarded as standing alone, without the aid of other sections; but the difficulty in the main disappears when it is stated in its proper relation to other sections.

Two cases naturally arise under this section. First, that of the annual tax levy for the support of the government of the state; and, second, special taxes laid with a view to special objects. The object of the general tax levy is fixed by the third section of Article IX. That section provides that "the general assembly shall provide an annual tax sufficient to defray the estimated expenses of the state for each year." In the next paragraph that relates to raising taxes to pay the deficiency of a preceding year, the expenses of the state are termed "ordinary expenses of the state." Ordinary expenses include the current expenses of the government and debts to mature during the current fiscal year. This must be deemed to be what is meant by the "object," as that term is used in Article IX., Section 4, where the tax law is of the general nature prescribed in Section 3. The effect of this section of the constitution, in the case of an annual tax for ordinary expenses, is to confine the proceeds of *that tax to the exclusion of objects that cannot come under that general description; in other words, to prevent the taking away of funds raised for the support of the government from that object and applying them to special objects of a different class; the manifest object being to prevent the state government from being embarrassed by the improper use of the means necessary for its support.

The other case is, where the tax is special; that is, other than such as is called for as an annual tax by Section 3. It necessarily follows that the object of such tax will be special also. In that case the declared object of raising the tax must govern the application of the fund raised thereby.

It is very clear that what constitutes the object, in the sense of the constitution, is some legal occasion that calls for the expenditure of money. That is, some obligation, present or prospective, created by law. Clearly, the constitution did not intend that the money raised under a special tax should be applied towards the purpose stated in such tax law, independent of there being any law constituting an appropriation for its disbursement.

Suppose, for instance, that money is raised to erect a public building, and no act for the erection of such building was passed during the fiscal year for which it was raised; clearly there is no authority to be gathered from that provision of the constitution that could warrant the disbursement of such fund toward such purpose without such a law. This shows clearly that the object intended by the constitution is that which is created by some law; or, in other words, some obligation, present or prospective, created and sanctioned by law.

So, if an appropriation should be made of funds raised for a special object under a special tax to some purpose consistent with such object, and the legislature should repeal such appropriation, it could not for a moment be contended that such money could be disbursed after such repeal, in the face of Section 12, Article IX., of the constitution, that declares that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in pursuance of an appropriation made by law." When for any reason the legislature could not repeal such appropriation as when it was made through the operation of the constitution itself, of course the question here con*sidered could not arise. Such a case was presented in Morton v. Comptroller-General, 4 S. C. 430. In that case it was held that it was the manifest intent of the constitution that the provisions of acts intended to borrow money should operate as legislative contracts, so that the authority for the levy of a tax to pay the interest on any such loan, which is required to be given in such acts, could not be taken away by any subsequent act of repeal. Consistently with that object of the constitution, and as a material means of rendering it effectual, independent of future legislation, it was held that Section 4 operated in that particular class of cases as a constitutional appropriation of the proceeds of such special tax. Where, however, the legislature retains its ordinary power over appropriations, not having assumed to bind itself by a legislative contract, there can be no doubt but that it can repeal the authority for the disbursement of public money, whether raised under general or special levy. And it is equally clear that when the object for which money was raised is no longer attainable, it is subject to all ordinary demands upon the treasury sanctioned by law. Such is the ordinary practical construction of the constitution, and it is the only one consistent with that flexibility of financial arrangements that can secure the practical ends of government. It will be found that the tax acts of 1876–77 and 1877–78, are each general annual taxes for the ordinary expenses of the state government, and as such the only effect of Section 4, Article IX., of the constitution, is to confirm the application of the funds raised thereunder to such purposes as properly fall within the description of "ordinary expenses of the government;" that is, to current expenses and debts maturing during the fiscal year.

The act of 1876–77 provides for the payment of the current expenses of the government and certain indebtedness matured or to mature. It is, therefore, clearly a general tax levy, and, as such, entirely subject to the control of the legislature, provided the purposes to which it is appropriated fall within the general class of "ordinary expenses." It is unnecessary to consider this act particularly, for the provisions made by it only apply to certain indebtedness that should be reported valid by the commission to investigate the public debt, and should be approved *by the general assembly, while none of the class of claims urged as the reason for withholding the mandamus were so reported or approved. The act of 1877–78 raises a gross sum of four and a half mills for all purposes, exclusive of the school tax, and its declared object is "for the purpose of meeting appropriations to defray the current expenses of the government for the fiscal year commencing November 1st, 1877, and to meet such other indebtedness as has been or shall be provided for in the several acts enacted by the present session of the general assembly providing for the same." The effect of this is the same as if the purpose had been declared "to meet appropriations for current expenses and debts." Obviously, such an act can only be regarded as a general annual tax levy for "ordinary expenses," and, as such, the legislature may control, at any time, the disposition of the funds raised under it; subject to the proviso already stated, namely, that such appropriation must be of the nature properly described as "ordinary expenses of the government."

It is unnecessary to consider the construction of Section 12 of the joint resolution providing a mode of ascertaining the debt of the state and liquidating and settling the same, approved March 22d, 1878, (16 Stat. 673,) under which arises the only possible claim on the money in the treasury that could be made in behalf of that class of claims that are urged in opposition to the mandamus, as the provisions of that section, so far as they conflict with the appropriation of 1878, under which the relator claims, are repealed by the appropriation act of 1878.

It is not necessary to consider the terms of the appropriation of 1878, for it is conceded in the argument that unless it is found to be unconstitutional it supports the relator's present claim. The act repealed all former laws inconsistent with it, and therefore, if the joint resolution of March 22d, 1878, contained anything to support the present claim in behalf of the respondent, it must necessarily conflict with the subsequent appropriation of December 24th, 1878, and thus stand repealed.

The foregoing leads to the conclusion that there is nothing in the fourth section of Article IX. of the constitution that impugns the validity of the appropriation under which the relator seeks the writ of mandamus in this case.

*The fifth and last point has no application to this case under the view that has already been presented. The mandamus should issue in conformity with the prayer of the petition.

HASKELL, A. J. The court is of one opinion on all the points in this case except as regards the meaning and application of the following provision in the state constitution: "No tax shall be levied except in pursuance of a law which shall distinctly state the object of the same, to which object such tax shall be applied." It is thought by one member of the court that this provision is violated by Section 19 of the act December 24th, 1878. 16 Stat. 765. A majority of the court, however, is of a different opinion, and I concur with the conclusion stated in the opinion delivered by the Chief Justice, but think it proper that some of the reasons for such conclusion on the constitutional point should be given more in detail, especially when a member of the court has expressed his dissent and stated his reasons. The act of March 22d, 1878, page 549, (16 Stat.,) entitled "An act to raise supplies and make appropriation for the fiscal year commencing November 1st, 1877," makes in its first section the general state levy (that is the constitutional name, Section 5, Article X.,) for the fiscal year, and in obedience to the constitution declares the object for which such levy is made, to wit: "Levied for the purpose of meeting appropriations (1) to defray the current expenses of the government for the fiscal year commencing November 1st, 1877, and (2) to meet such other indebtedness as have been or shall be provided for in the several acts enacted by the present session of the general assembly providing for the same." By reference to the acts the general object is thus divided into respective parts by specific appropriations. On page 540, (Stat. 16,) is an act of the same date as the last, "to make appropriations to meet the ordinary expenses of the state government for the fiscal year commencing November 1st, 1877." This act omits a considerable portion of the "ordinary expenses" of the government, although it does provide for many of the current expenses, including the executive and judicial departments. On page 520, same volume of statutes, is "An act to make appropriations for the payment of the per diem and mileage of the members of the *general assembly, the salaries of the subordinate officers and employés thereof, interest on the public debt and for objects herein named." The act is of precisely the same character as that (page 540) entitled "An act to make appropriations to meet the 'ordinary expenses' of the government." It (the act, page 520,) makes appropriations to meet the expenses of the legislative branch of the government, the expenses of a Court of Claims, of a commission to codify the laws, of divers other matters, such as "deficiencies" during the preceding fiscal year, and finally, by Sections 11 and 12, sums are appropriated for the payment of interest on the public debt; by Section 11, $189,340.27, "if so much be necessary," and by Section 12, $338,214.57, "if so much be necessary." The first to be applied to interest on certain bonds and stocks contained in Schedule 5 of the commissioners' report, and the second to be applied to interest on bonds and stocks enumerated on Schedule 6 of the same report. Conditions are annexed: First, that these payments must be made out of specific funds therein designated; second, that none of the money appropriated by Section 12, page 525, 16 Stat., should be paid out of the treasury on presentation of said coupons and interest orders, "either for the last or present fiscal year, until the consolidation bonds and certificates of stock on which they have accrued shall be finally adjudicated as to the validity of the said bonds and stock in favor of said bonds and stock, in the manner provided for by a joint resolution passed at this session of the general assembly, entitled 'A joint resolution to provide a mode of ascertaining the debt of the state and of liquidating and settling the same,' and none other." There is likewise an appropriation act of the same year, page 547, to pay back salaries due to several persons who had been lately professors of the University of South Carolina, and for other purposes, among the latter of which was a provision of $500 to pay the per diem and mileage of such members of the bond commission as might be summoned to attend the Court of Claims. It is needless to pursue these acts further. Several have been cited to show that although they vary in title they are all in substance of the same character, and are in effect mere component parts of the general appropriation act for the fiscal year commencing November 1st, 1877, and in fact they are so *declared by the first section of the general act of levy and appropriation for the said fiscal year, (16 Stat. 549), which has been above cited. The acts are thus presented to the view to remove confusion and to enable us to examine them in what I shall endeavor to show to be the true light as mere appropriations to meet the "estimated expenses" of the current fiscal year, composed in part of the "ordinary expenses" for that year, and "deficiencies" or past claims due but still unpaid.

The facts are that all the money levied and appropriated to meet such expenses as are provided for by Section 12, page 525, was not drawn from the treasury during that fiscal year. The reason why the money was not drawn is admitted. The legal validity of the bonds and stock had not been established during the fiscal year in sufficient amount to consume the entire appropriation. The legislature, at its regular session in December, 1878, by the nineteenth section of the act to make appropriations for the fiscal year commencing November 1st, 1878, (16 Stat. 757,) enacted that the unexpended balance of the money collected into the treasury for the payment of the interest on the public debt should be applied to the payment of interest "on bonds and certificates of stock mentioned in Schedule 5 of the report of the bond commission. * * * [and] on such of the bonds and certificates of stock mentioned in Schedule 6 of said report of said commission which have been found valid by the special court known as the Court of Claims, * * * and on such of the bonds and certificates of stock as have been issued during the past year under Sections 13 and 14 of the said joint resolution, approved March 22d, 1878," and to the payment of interest on certain other bonds and stock issued under an act approved March 22d, 1878. The question is whether that nineteenth section of the act of December 24th, 1878, is in violation of Article IX., Section 4, of the state constitution. The affirmative of that proposition is forcibly presented in the dissenting opinion delivered in this case, and as it is a question which of necessity is apt to arise at every session of the legislature, it is entitled to grave consideration. The question, in plain language, is this: When in any fiscal year a tax is levied by the legislature and appropriated to a specific object, and that object has not, or *does not, acquire legal force at any time during the said fiscal year, but it is possible that it may acquire such legal force in the future, can the legislature, in the next fiscal year, apply the fund to another purpose, or is the money tied up in the treasury by Article IX., Section 4, of the constitution, until the original object has acquired active energy or has become impossible, and in the eye of the law ceased to exist? I think that puts it fairly and in a stronger light than it can stand in this case, for Section 12 appropriates $338,214.57, "if so much be necessary," and judgment was passed on some of the bonds during the fiscal year, and they, coming within the provisions, had the right to draw the interest; and it might well be argued that the appropriation had been drawn, and that the unexpended balance, not having been necessary, was an unappropriated sum lying over to the credit of the state. But I prefer taking the question in its strongest light, that the law may be ascertained. The term "legal force," as I used it above, does not refer to this abstract legal validity of the claim, but to its legal right, under the act, of levy and appropriation. For instance, every consolidated bond may be valid, but the legislature did not, either under the stipulations of the act of 1873 or the constitutional provisions of Article IX., Sections 7 and 14, levy and appropriate to pay interest on the bonds generally. The levy and the appropriation provide for interest only on such of the bonds as may be passed upon favorably under proceedings in a specific court. Then, and not until then, does the interest due on such bonds become an object possessed of legal force by virtue of said acts of levy and appropriation. That constitutes the "legal force" used in the statement of the proposition. There is a proposition in the joint resolution establishing the Court of Claims, (16 Stat. 669, § 12,) "That the coupons and interest orders on any of the several classes of consolidation bonds or certificates of stock mentioned in the said Schedule 6 shall be paid out of the proceeds of the taxes for the last and the current fiscal years, respectively, whenever there shall be a final adjudication as to the validity of the said several classes of bonds and certificates, in the manner here provided, and none other." That section does not constitute a contract. Whatever may be its weight as a declaration or *pledge when considered by the legislature in its own proceedings, the judiciary has nothing to do with that. No obligation of contract would be impaired by its repeal, and it has been repealed by the act of December 24th, 1878, Section 20, page 765. That section, therefore, does not, in any respect, come before this court in the discussion of the present questions.

With these explanations I will proceed. The system of collection and expenditure of money for public purposes is very fully provided for in Article IX. of the state constitution. The rules therein prescribe the methods. One is to raise money for the "ordinary expenses of the state," and the other for "extraordinary expenditures." The first is by "annual tax," Article IX., Section 3; the second is by loan on state bonds, Article IX., Sections 7 and 14. The latter does not come within the discussion. Under the former, or the "ordinary expenses," are included all expenditures not provided for by money borrowed under Article IX., Sections 7 and 14. When bonds have been issued to raise money to meet an "extraordinary expenditure," they become a standing liability of the state, and the interest, as it falls due, becomes an "ordinary expense," to be included among the "estimated expenses" to make up the amount to be levied annually and appropriated annually. The only difference between the interest on such bonds and any other annual expense is that the interest is made, by the constitution, an obligatory expense, while many other expenses may be at the option of the legislature—as, for instance, the expense of the Court of Claims, the bond commission, and many other matters to which the constitution does not refer. The constitution, in its provisions on finance and taxation, appears to have two objects conspicuously in view. The first, that the state shall pay annually all the expenses of each year, and thus prevent accumulation of debt. The second is, that if "extraordinary expenditure" is deemed necessary, and the annual tax would be excessive, money shall not be raised except by bonds secured by certain laws prescribed by the constitution. To impose no more than the people were able and willing to pay each year, and to preserve the credit, were leading objects. Article IX., Section 3, undertakes to accomplish the first by ordaining that "the general assembly shall provide for *an annual tax sufficient to defray the estimated expenses of the state for each year; and whenever it shall happen that such ordinary expenses of the state for any year shall exceed the income of the state for such year, the general assembly shall provide for levying a tax for the ensuing year sufficient, with other sources of income, to pay the deficiency of the preceding year, together with the estimated expenses of the ensuing year." The direction is plain, positive and mandatory to pay as they went, each year. The tax levy is annual, the appropriation is annual, and the winding up of accounts in the treasury is of necessity annual; for otherwise the deficiencies of the last and the need of the present fiscal year could not be ascertained. Section 4 is the natural sequence of Section 3: the "estimate of expenses" would be little more than a vain form if it were not to be based upon definite objects. Taxation for indefinite purposes would unavoidably lead to a squandering of the public money, and the people are entitled to information on such points. The positive law that the taxes shall be applied to the objects for which they are collected, and the law that the tax shall not be laid until the object has been defined, alike enable the people to know of and to prevent the repetition of unreasonable expenditures, and tend to preserve the credit of the state year by year. Such law further prevents the gross injustice of preference in appropriation after the levy has been made, as the law which inhibits the drawing of any money from the treasury except in pursuance of appropriation made by law, (Article IX., Section 12,) prevents such abuse on the part of the executive in the disbursement of the public funds. But the whole tenor of this article of the constitution leads to the conclusion that all these provisions apply to the annual transactions. The tax is levied for the expenses of the current fiscal year. The objects to which the tax must be applied are the items contained in those estimated expenses. Expenses include the payment of recognized indebtedness, as well as any outlay that the legislature may deem proper to make during that year. It is a very grave question whether the legislature has the right to levy any money which it does not intend to devote to an object during the current fiscal year. That question, however, does not now arise. But, on the other hand, the presumption is that the *legislature does intend to apply the money to an object which exists or may exist during the current fiscal year. Such appears to be the scope of the fourth section, and the proper rule of construction is, that the whole annual provision is confined within the limits of the fiscal year, and that if the appropriation can, by its words or the context, be made applicable during the fiscal year, the act must be confined to that year, and must be regarded as having expired at its termination. With regard to the act in question, it was entirely possible for the Court of Claims to have heard the cases and decided upon all the bonds and stocks within the fiscal year. As if, for example, the court had convened in May, as the act directed, and proceedings had been at once commenced, and on inspection the case had been so plain either way that the court would have rendered judgment immediately, as it did with regard to some of the bonds, and no appeal being taken, the matter would have been ended. If such had been the result, there could be no question. What has been the result is wholly immaterial in construing the law. What could have been the result is the point. It is unquestionable that the legislature could levy and appropriate for the fiscal year; it is questionable whether they could levy in one year and bind over indefinitely for the future.

In this case the levy was made, the condition was executed in part, and it was not impossible that it may have been executed as to the whole, within the fiscal year. There are no words in the act directly or indirectly extending the operation of the act beyond the fiscal year. The court is obliged to presume that the act meant what in law it ought to mean, there being no words to the contrary. The operation of the act being thus confined to the fiscal year, the "object" has been accomplished. So much of the money as "may be necessary" has been or is ready to be applied to such interest demands as were settled by the adjudication of the said court of claims within the fiscal year, and the rest is an unexpended balance which reverted at the expiration of the fiscal year to furnish, with the levy and money derived from other sources of income, the fund to meet the ordinary expenses of the ensuing year, including deficiencies coming over from the last. Such is the practice, and such we think is the *law made by the constitution. For instance, take the appropriation made by the fourteenth section of the same act of March 22d, 1878, page 526, "that the sum of $7500, if so much be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to pay the salaries, clerk hire, and the expenses of the commission elected at this session of the general assembly to codify the laws, etc." Suppose, as I believe was the case, that no commission was elected at that session. The object of the levy and of the appropriation was plainly stated, and the money could not be applied during that fiscal year to any other purpose, but was held by the state treasurer under the appropriation caption in his books. It there remained until the end of the fiscal year. The object certainly was legal; indeed it is one directed by the constitution itself—Article V., Section 3. But it is hard to conceive that the money thus appropriated must be in the treasury until in some subsequent year provision may be made to revise and codify the laws, and then the money be applied. I see no real difference between that instance and the one now in hand. A construction of the constitution which would permit the legislative body at one session to levy and appropriate and extend the appropriation over subsequent years, and which would deprive the legislative body of the power to repeal such act at its subsequent sessions, and of power to use the money for any other purpose, would be sanctioned only by the plainest and most positive mandate. None such is found in the instrument itself. Such a provision would hedge in the legislature in such manner, that the representatives at a preceding session could deprive their successors of one of the most important of their powers. This would cripple the government and destroy the remedial effect of recurrent elections; for what would the relief be if the preceding body could have levied and appropriated in advance? The money would lie idle or the legislators would be obliged to carry out some design preconceived, and which perhaps their own judgment could not sanction. That would be compulsory legislation, which is contrary to the spirit of the government. The proposition is so serious in its nature and might lead to such abuse that, however virtuous the intention may be in any particular case, the principle could not be tolerated unless shown to be an unavoidable man*date emanating from the sovereign power. But, as already said, both the spirit and the words of the constitution appear to be to the contrary. The system therein prescribed is one of annual collection and disbursement, and is mandatory. The legislature, it is true, is not forbidden to do otherwise, and the power of the legislature is plenary in its nature. Direct prohibition, however, is rare in constitutional provisions. "But the affirmative prescriptions and the general arrangements of the constitution are far more fruitful of restraints upon the legislature. Every positive direction contains an implication against everything contrary to it, or which would frustrate or disappoint the purpose of that provision." Cited in Potter's Dwarris on Stat. 64, Denio, C. J. A construction of Article IX., Section 4, which would permit appropriations extending beyond the fiscal periods to bind the legislature, would frustrate the main design of annual periodical settlements of the past, and provision for the present fiscal year, which is plainly expressed in Article IX., Section 3, of the constitution, and permeates the whole financial scheme. It would also seriously affect the character of the government itself.

I concur in the opinion delivered by the CHIEF JUSTICE.

McIVER, A. J. As I am unable to concur entirely in the conclusion which has been reached by a majority of the court, it is perhaps proper that I should state very briefly the reasons for my position, without elaborating the argument in support of such position. As the funds out of which the relator is seeking payment cannot be regarded as derived from taxes levied by virtue of any of the provisions of the act of December 22d, 1873, (15 Stat. 518,) it is unnecessary to consider the effect of the provisions of that act. On the contrary, it must be conceded that the funds out of which the legislature has, by the nineteenth section of the act of December 24th, 1878, (16 Stat. 765,) undertaken to provide for the payment of the claims of the relator and others standing in like position, were derived from taxes levied by virtue of the act of June 9th, 1877, (16 Stat. 286,) and the act of March 22d, 1878. (16 Stat. 549.) According to my view the real question in the case is whether the nineteenth section of the act of December 24th, 1878, is in conflict with Section 4 of Article

*IX., of the constitution of this state. That section of the constitution reads as follows: "No tax shall be levied except in pursuance of a law which shall distinctly state the object of the same; to which object the tax shall be applied." It follows, therefore, from this express mandate of the constitution that when a tax has been levied for a particular purpose or "object," that it is beyond the competency of the legislature to divert such tax from the purpose or "object" to which it has thus been appropriated by the constitution, until such object has been accomplished or becomes impossible of attainment. For it will be observed that the section of the constitution above quoted does not contain any negative words prohibiting the legislature from appropriating the taxes to any other purpose or "object" than that for which they were levied, but only an affirmative command that they shall be applied to such "object." Hence, when the "object" is accomplished or becomes impossible, the force of mandatory terms of the constitution is exhausted, and there is then no reason why the general assembly, which is invested with all legislative power not prohibited by the constitution, may not, by legislative act, direct the disposition of funds upon which the constitution no longer acts. The practical question therefore in this case is whether the funds out of which the relator claims payment were derived from taxes levied for some other purposes or "object," and if so, whether such purpose has been accomplished or has become impossible of attainment. What, then, was the object for which the taxes raised by the act of June 9th, 1877, and the act of March 22d, 1878, were levied? The act of June 9th, 1877, in its first section declares the object of that levy to be: "1. To defray the current expenses of the government for the fiscal year ending October 31st, 1877. 2. To pay the interest due January 1st, 1877, and July 1st, 1877, upon the consolidated bonds and certificates of stock which have been issued under the act to reduce the volume of the public debt and provide for the payment of the same, approved December 22d, 1873, which shall be found to be valid and bona fide by the commission to investigate the same, and be approved by the general assembly at the next regular session thereof, and third, to pay such other indebtedness of the state as may be reported to be valid by the said commis*sion, and to which it may be applied by the general assembly at its next regular session." It will thus be seen that the taxes levied by this act were for three distinct objects. 1. Current expenses. 2. Interest due January and July 1st, 1877, on such of the consolidated bonds and certificates of stock as should be found valid and bona fide by the commission to investigate the same and be approved by the general assembly at its next session. 3. Such other indebtedness—by which I understand indebtedness other than consolidated bonds and stocks, e. g., floating debt, which, by the ninth section of the joint resolution raising the bond commission, (16 Stat. 320,) said commission were required to investigate and report upon—as may be reported valid by said commission. But as that commission, commonly called the bond commission, made no report upon any indebtedness of the state, other than that represented by the consolidated bonds and stocks, the objects for which these taxes were levied were practically the first two current expenses and interest on certain of the consolidated bonds and stocks. For it will be observed that the object of the levy was, not to pay interest on the consolidated bonds and stocks generally, but only upon those which should be reported valid by the bond commission and be approved by the general assembly at its next session. If, therefore, it be true, as is understood to be admitted, that these two objects have been accomplished—that is, if the current expenses of the government for the fiscal year ending October 31st, 1877, and the interest due January 1st and July 1st, 1877, upon such of the consolidated bonds and certificates of stock as have been reported valid, by the bond commission and approved by the general assembly have been paid, leaving a balance of such taxes in the treasury—I see no reason why the general assembly could not appropriate such balance to any other purpose it saw fit. The fact that these taxes were appropriated by the legisiature, by Section 12 of the act of March 22d, 1878, (16 Stat. 525,) to the payment of the interest on the consolidation bonds and stocks mentioned in Schedule 6 of the report of the bond commission, cannot affect this question, because that was not an appropriation made by the constitution, but only made by an act of the legislature, and therefore subject to alteration or repeal by a subsequent legisla*ture. Nor am I able to perceive how this act of March 20th, 1878, can be regarded as having the force and effect of a legislative contract, binding upon subsequent legislatures any more than any other appropriation act. It is not so declared, and there is nothing in its terms which demands that it should be so construed.

Next, as to the object of the levy made by virtue of the act of March 22d, 1878. 16 Stat. 549. In the first section of that act the object is declared to be "for the purpose of meeting appropriations to defray current expenses of the government for the fiscal year commencing November 1st, 1877, and to meet such other indebtedness as have been or should be provided for in the several acts enacted by the present session of the general assembly providing for the same." These general terms render it necessary for us to examine "the several acts enacted by the present session of the general assembly," providing for indebtedness other than current expenses, in order to determine, definitely, what were the objects of such levy. This examination shows that one portion of such indebtedness, which was provided for in the appropriation act passed at that session of the general assembly Section 12 of the act of March 22d, 1878, (16 Stat. 525,) was the interest due on January 1st and July 1st, 1878, "on the consolidation bonds and certificates of stock mentioned in Schedule 6 of the report of the commission," commonly called the bond commission. One of the objects, therefore, for which the taxes raised by the act of March 22d, 1878, were levied, was for the purpose of paying the interest due January 1st and July 1st, 1878, on the consolidation bonds and stocks mentioned in Schedule 6 of the report of the bond commission, and until that object has been accomplished or until it becomes impossible of attainment, the legislature has no power, under the constitution, to divert such taxes from such object and apply them to other purposes. It is very obvious that such object has not yet been accomplished, because by the same act it is provided "that no money appropriated by this section shall be paid on the said coupons or interest or any part thereof, either for the last or present fiscal year, until the consolidation bonds and certificates of stock on which they have accrued shall be finally adjudicated" *to be good and valid obligations of the state; and it is conceded that no such final adjudication has been had as to a large amount of such bonds and stocks, but that, on the contrary, questions relating thereto are now pending in this court. Until these questions are "finally adjudicated," it is impossible to say whether such object has become impossible of attainment.

It seems to be, therefore, that the funds now in the treasury arising from taxes levied by virtue of the act of March 22d, 1878, are, by the constitution, appropriated to the payment of the interest due January 1st and July 1st, 1878, on the consolidation bonds and stocks mentioned in Schedule 6 of the report of the bond commission, and that until that object is accomplished by the payment of such interest, or until it becomes impossible of attainment, by reason of a final adjudication against the validity of such bonds and stocks, the legislature has no power to appropriate such taxes to any other purpose.

My conclusion, therefore, is that the relator is entitled to a mandamus directing the state treasurer to apply the funds in the treasury, arising from the taxes levied by virtue of the act of June 9th, 1877, to the payment of the interest on his bonds falling due January 1st, 1879, but that he is not entitled to a mandamus requiring the state treasurer to apply the funds in the treasury arising from the taxes levied by virtue of the act of March 22d, 1878, to the payment of such interest; but that such taxes must remain in the treasury to meet the "objects" to which they have been appropriated by the constitution, until such objects have been accomplished or it becomes impossible to accomplish them.

Mandamus ordered.

(November Term, 1878.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐1022.]

An appeal from findings of fact by a referee, which were sustained by the Circuit decree, dismissed there being neither a lack of evidence to warrant such findings, nor such preponderance of evidence on the other side as would justify a reversal.

A certificate of city stock, transferable, according to its terms, only at the office of the city treasurer, by appearance in person or by attorney, was endorsed in blank by the legal owner, and delivered to one who pledged the same to a bank as collateral security for a loan; the owner died, and the certificate was, by virtue of a transfer written over his name by the cashier, transferred to the bank on the books of the city treasurer, after the death of said owner. Held, that the endorsement and delivery was an equitable assignment, and that the subsequent transfer to the bank was proper.

Before Wallace J., at Charleston, February Term, 1878.

This case, having been before this court once before on appeal, will be found fully reported in 8 S. C. 318. It is unnecessary to repeat here any portion of the case up to that time. The *subsequent proceedings are set forth in the referee's supplemental report, which is as follows:

To the Honorable the Presiding Judge of the First Circuit:

I beg leave to make to the court the following report:

Chief Justice Moses, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court on the appeal taken in this cause, filed on the 12th of December, 1876, says:

"The only question presented by the appeal arises out of the exception of the city council of Charleston, one of the defendants in the cause, to so much of the Circuit decree as established the right to certain city stock in Col. Joseph Whaley, at the time of his death, and requires the said council to account for so much of the same as it has sold and transferred;" and the case was remanded to the Circuit Court to be referred to the referee "for the purpose of allowing the city council to offer evidence of their right to the stock which, on the death of Joseph Whaley, stood in his name, or to show how he may have been divested of his title thereto: the respondents to be at liberty to offer testimony in rebuttal." And by an order of the Circuit Court of the 28th of February, 1877, the cause was referred back to me, as special referee, to take the testimony which might be offered under the provisions of the order of the Supreme Court. By the original order of reference, filed on the 12th of September, 1874, I was appointed special referee to inquire and report upon the facts, with leave to report any special matter. Under the order of the Circuit of the 28th of February, 1877, I have held numerous references, and have taken the testimony offered by the city council, defendant, and the testimony offered by the plaintiffs in rebuttal, as provided for by the said order. I have been attended at these references by counsel representing the plaintiffs, and the other creditors of the late Joseph Whaley, deceased, and by counsel representing the city council of Charleston, defendant; counsel also appearing for the executor of Joseph Whaley, deceased, co-operating with the counsel for the city council.

The testimony was carefully taken down, and is filed with the report. Photographic copies were also made of all the signatures of Joseph Whaley introduced in evidence.

*A considerable portion of the testimony was directed to the proof of handwriting and the examination of experts; and a comparison was instituted between the disputed signatures of Joseph Whaley and his acknowledged genuine signatures.

On the closing of the testimony, the points raised were very elaborately argued before me by Edward McCrady, Jr., Esq., and Samuel Lord, Jr., Esq., for the plaintiffs. Mr. Mitchell, representing the city council of Charleston, was present at the argument of plaintiffs' counsel, but declined to submit any argument himself. Mr. Mitchell took the position that the referee was not directed by the order of reference to do anything more than take the testimony and report the same to the court, and protested in advance against the argument proceeding, and against any waiver of his rights by his presence at the argument.

I proceed now, after a careful consideration of the whole case, to announce the conclusions of fact to which I have arrived.

The city stock, which stood in the name of Joseph Whaley, at the time of his death, is represented by certificates numbered 7, 12, 382, 383, 384, 386, 387, 393, 394, 395 and 396, and the object of the testimony offered by the city council was to show their right to this stock, or how the said Joseph Whaley may have been divested of his title thereto. I propose to take each certificate of stock separately, and state my conclusions as to each of them in turn.

Certificate No. 7, city stock, issue of June, 1852, for $23,000, principal sum.

This certificate, with the name of Joseph Whaley endorsed in blank, was pledged on the 5th of January, 1871, to the First National Bank, to secure a note of that date of William Whaley, endorsed Joseph Whaley, for $8000. This note was paid on the 20th of January, 1871.

On the 20th of January, 1871, this certificate was pledged to Pelzer, Rodgers & Co., to secure a note of William Whaley, for $10,000, at sixty days. The note of $8000, in the First National Bank, was paid out of this loan.

On the 3d of June, 1871, this certificate was pledged to Wm. C. Bee & Co., to secure a note of William Whaley and Joseph *Whaley of $11,500, at sixty days. The note was renewed for thirty days, and paid on the 8th of September, 1871.

On the 11th of January, 1872, this certificate, together with certificate No. 395, for $8000, and certificate No. 398, for $6000, and $6000 state bonds, was pledged by William Whaley to the People's National Bank, to secure his note of that date of $21,900. In this note were consolidated all the notes of Mr. William Whaley held by this bank. It was a "call loan," and was marked paid on the 12th of April, 1872.

On the 19th of February, 1872, this certificate, No. 7, was transferred on the books of the city treasurer to H. G. Loper, cashier of the People's National Bank, and a new certificate, No. 51, issued therefor in his name.

On the 23d of May, 1872, this stock certificate, No. 51, was bought for account of P. J. Coogan, city treasurer, by J. H. Wilson, broker.

The above-mentioned certificate, No. 398, for $6,000, had been transferred on the 13th of September, 1871, from certificate No. 385, standing in the name of Joseph Whaley, to the South Carolina Loan and Trust Company.

It does not appear from the evidence how this scrip was redeemed and became pledged to the People's National Bank, to secure the aforesaid loan to William Whaley, of the 11th of February, 1872; nor does it appear from the evidence, by whose order the sale of the stock, represented by certificate No. 51, for $23,000, in the name of H. G. Loper, cashier, was made, or for whose account.

I find that the above-mentioned certificate, No. 7, for $23,000, with the name of Joseph Whaley endorsed thereon, was in the possession of H. G. Loper, cashier of the People's National Bank, prior to the death of Joseph Whaley, and was, by virtue of a transfer, written over the name of Joseph Whaley, transferred to him, in the books of the city treasurer, after the death of the said Joseph Whaley.

I find that the signature of Joseph Whaley, endorsed on this certificate, transferring the same to H. G. Loper, cashier, is the handwriting of Joseph Whaley.

*Certificate of city stock No. 12, issue of January, 1866, for $5220, principal sum.

This certificate, with the name of Joseph Whaley endorsed thereon, was in the possession of the People's National Bank some time prior to the 11th of January, 1872, as collateral security for loan. On the 19th of February, 1872, it was, by virtue of a transfer, written over the name of Joseph Whaley, transferred on the books of the city treasurer to H. G. Loper, cashier, and a new certificate, No. 1745, issued therefor in his name.

On the 1st of March, 1872, the new certificate, No. 1745, was transferred by H. G. Loper, cashier, to William Whaley; and on the 3d of May, 1872, William Whaley transferred of this certificate $3220 to Wm. C. Bee & Co., $1000 to Robert Hunter, and $1000 to C. F. Hencken.

I find that the above certificate, No. 12, for $5220, with the name of Joseph Whaley endorsed thereon, was in the possession of H. G. Loper, cashier, prior to the death of Joseph Whaley, and was, by virtue of a transfer, written over the name of Joseph Whaley, transferred to him on the books of the city treasurer, after the death of Joseph Whaley.

I find that the signature of Joseph Whaley, endorsed on this certificate, transferring the same to H. G. Loper, cashier, is not the handwriting of Joseph Whaley.

Certificate of city stock No. 382, issue of March, 1856, for $5200, principal sum, and Certificate of city stock No. 384, issue of March, 1856, for $4000 principal sum.

I find that these two certificates, with the name of Joseph Whaley endorsed thereon, were purchased, on the 23d of April, 1872, by P. J. Coogan, city treasurer, from J. H. Wilson, broker, and were, on the same day, transferred to the commissioners of the general sinking fund No. 2, of the city of Charleston. The said certificates were consolidated, and a new scrip, No. 409, for $9220, issued therefor.

It does not appear from the evidence by whose order the sale of these two pieces of scrip was made, or for whose account.

I find that this stock, standing in the name of Joseph Whaley, was sold and the transfer made after the death of Joseph Whaley.

*I find that the signatures of Joseph Whaley, endorsed on certificate No. 382, transferring the same to the commissioners of the general sinking fund, is not the handwriting of Joseph Whaley.

I find that the signature of Joseph Whaley, endorsed on certificate No. 384, transferring the same to the commissioners of the general sinking fund, is not the handwriting of Joseph Whaley.

Certificate of city stock No. 383, for $4780, principal sum.

This certificate, with the name of Joseph Whaley endorsed, was pledged, on the 20th of October, 1871, to Wm. C. Bee & Co., to secure a note of William Whaley, endorsed Joseph Whaley, for $2300, at thirty days. The note was renewed at maturity for thirty days, and was paid on the 27th of December, 1871.

On the said 27th of December, 1871, this certificate was pledged to the First National Bank, to secure note of William and Joseph Whaley, for $23,000, payable on February 25th–28th, and was entered as paid February 28th, 1872.

On the 23d of February, 1872, it was pledged to M. Triest, with power of attorney endorsed over the signature of Joseph Whaley, to secure note of William Whaley, in favor of M. Triest, for $2300, at sixty days, and was, on the 28th of February, by virtue of said endorsement, transferred on the books of the city treasurer to the said M. Triest, and a new scrip, No. 404, issued therefor in his name.

The new scrip was transferred on the 22d of November, 1872, to C. J. Huguenin, and on the 28th of February, 1873, to the commissioners of the general sinking fund, and canceled.

I find that the above certificate, No. 383, standing in the name of Joseph Whaley, was pledged, and the transfer and power of attorney made to the said M. Triest, after the death of Joseph Whaley.

I find that the signature of Joseph Whaley, endorsed on this certificate, transferring the same to M. Triest, with power of attorney to the said M. Triest to transfer the same, is not the handwriting of Joseph Whaley.

Certificate of city stock No. 386, for $5000, principal sum, and Certificate of city stock No. 387, for $5000, principal sum, issue of March, 1856.

*These certificates, with the name of Joseph Whaley endorsed were pledged, on the 14th of July, 1871, to R. T. Chisolm, to secure two notes of William Whaley of $2350 each, at six months. The notes were renewed at maturity for six months longer, and were paid in full on the 18th of July, 1872. The stock represented by these certificates was purchased on the said 18th of July, 1872, (together with certificate No. 393, for $10,000,) from J. Frazer Matthewes, by F. J. Pelzer, for account of the commissioners of the general sinking fund No. 2.

It does not appear, from the evidence, by whose order or for whose account the sale of the said stock was made.

I find that the stock represented by these two certificates in the name of Joseph Whaley, was sold, and the transfer made after the death of Joseph Whaley.

I find that the certificates of Joseph Whaley, endorsed on these two certificates, transferring the same to the commissioners of the general sinking fund, are not the handwriting of Joseph Whaley.

Certificate of city stock No. 393, issue of March, 1856, for $10,000, principal sum.

This certificate, with the name of Joseph Whaley endorsed, was pledged on the 4th of September, 1871, to the First National Bank, to secure a note of William Whaley, of that date, for $5000. The note became due on the 3d of November, 1871, and was paid on the 8th of January, 1872.

On the 18th of July, 1872, this stock was purchased, together with certificate No. 386, for $5000, and No. 387, for $5000, from J. Frazer Matthewes, by Francis J. Pelzer, for account of the commissioners of the general sinking fund. These three certificates were consolidated, and a new certificate, No. 428, issued. It does not appear, from the evidence, by whose order or for whose account the sale of said stock was made. I find that the stock represented by the above certificate No. 393, standing in the name of Joseph Whaley, was sold and transferred after the death of Joseph Whaley. I find that the signature of Joseph Whaley, endorsed on this certificate, transferring the same to the commissioners of the general sinking fund, is not the handwriting of Joseph Whaley.

This certificate, with the name of Joseph Whaley endorsed, was pledged to the People's National Bank on the 23d of August, 1871, to secure a note of William Whaley for $5000. This note was paid on the 3d of October, 1871. On the 4th of November, 1871, it was pledged to William C. Bee & Co., to secure a note of William and Joseph Whaley of that date, for $5000, at thirty days. This note was paid on the 7th of December, 1871.

On the said 7th of December, 1871, it was pledged to William B. Smith & Co. to secure a note of William and Joseph Whaley of that date, for $5000, at sixty days. This note was paid on the 8th of February, 1872. On the said 8th of February, 1872, it was pledged to D. Ravenel, Jr., assistant cashier of the Citizens' Savings Bank of South Carolina, to secure a note of William Whaley of that date, for $5000, at sixty days. The note was renewed at maturity on the same security, to become due on the 13th of June, 1872, and was paid on the 7th of June, 1872.

This certificate was, by virtue of a transfer written over the name of Joseph Whaley, transferred on the books of the city treasurer, between the 8th and 19th of February, 1872, to D. Ravenel, Jr., assistant cashier, and a new certificate, No. 402, issued to him, and receipted for on the last-mentioned date. I find that the above certificate, No. 394, standing in the name of Joseph Whaley, was pledged to D. Ravenel, Jr., assistant cashier, and transferred to him after the death of Joseph Whaley.

I find that the signature of Joseph Whaley, endorsed on the certificate, transferring the same to D. Ravenel, Jr., assistant cashier, is not the handwriting of Joseph Whaley.

Certificate of city stock No. 395, issue of March, 1856, for $8000, principal sum.

This certificate, with the name of Joseph Whaley endorsed, was pledged to H. G. Loper, cashier, on the 30th of August, 1871, to secure a note of William Whaley, for $4000. The note was paid on the 11th of January, 1872.

This stock was again pledged on the 11th of January, 1872, to the People's National Bank, and was a part of the $37,000 *city stock, pledged to secure the loan to William Whaley, of $21,900 above mentioned, which was paid on the 12th of April, 1872. On the 19th of February, 1872, it was, by virtue of a transfer, written over the name of Joseph Whaley, transferred on the books of the city treasurer to H. G. Loper, cashier, and became a part of certificate No. 401, for $14,000.

On the 23d of May, 1872, it was purchased by J. H. Wilson, banker and broker, for account of P. J. Coogan, city treasurer.

It does not appear, from the evidence, by whose order the sale of the said stock was made, or for whose account.

I find that the above certificate, No. 395, was in the possession of H. G. Loper, cashier of the People's National Bank, prior to the death of Joseph Whaley, and was, by virtue of a transfer written over the name of Joseph Whaley, endorsed thereon, transferred on the books of the city treasurer to the said H. G. Loper, cashier, after the death of Joseph Whaley.

I find that the signature of Joseph Whaley, endorsed on this certificate, transferring the same to H. G. Loper, cashier, is not the handwriting of Joseph Whaley.

Certificate of city stock, No. 396, issue of March, 1856, for $6122, principal sum.

This certificate, with the name of Joseph

Whaley endorsed, was held by the People's National Bank, some time prior to the 11th of January, 1872, and collateral security for loan.

On the 23d of February, 1872, it was, by virtue of a transfer, written over the name of Joseph Whaley, transferred on the books of the city treasurer to H. G. Loper, cashier, and a new certificate, No. 400, issued therefor in his name.

On the 23d of April, 1872, the said stock certificate, No. 400, was sold by J. H. Wilson, broker, to P. J. Coogan, city treasurer.

It does not appear, from the evidence, by whose order the sale of the said stock was made or for whose account.

I find that the transfer of the above certificate, No. 396, to H. G. Loper, cashier, was made after the death of Joseph Whaley.

I find that the signature of Joseph Whaley, endorsed on said certificate, transferring the same to H. G. Loper, cashier, is not the handwriting of Joseph Whaley.

*I find that, by the last will and testament of Joseph Whaley, deceased, no power of sale is vested in his executor, and that no order has been made by the judge of probate for Charleston county, authorizing the sale of city stock belonging to the estate of Joseph Whaley.

Respectfully submitted.

G. W. Dingle, Referee.

January 4th, 1878.

Exceptions to Report of Referee.

Subject to the notice served on the plaintiffs' attorneys to set aside the report of the referee filed in this case, and to the motion for an order directing the referee to report the testimony of the city council in this case, and under the order of the Supreme Court and the Circuit Court, and the testimony of the plaintiffs in rebuttal thereof, the city council excepts to the report of the referee:

1. That in the report of the referee it plainly appears that in reporting, as he professes to do, conclusions of facts, such conclusions involve and depend on conclusions of law which are not in any order submitted to the referee; which he could not undertake to decide, and concerning which it would be necessary for him to have the instructions of the court upon the questions of law which were involved in and necessary for the ascertainment of conclusions of fact.

2. That the report of the referee, if it shall be considered properly filed as to the conclusions of facts therein set forth, is insufficient, because it does not report the conclusions of fact upon the testimony offered by the city council; that the testimony of the city council was positive in its character to show the right of the city council until the testimony so offered was impeached; that as no counter testimony did impeach it, and as nevertheless such testimony was discredited, it was necessary and proper for the referee to state the grounds upon which the positive testimony of the city council was, by the referee, discredited.

3. That in coming to a conclusion of facts, the referee has relied upon testimony which is wholly inferential, disregarding that which was positive and sustained the validity of the transfers, *without stating for what reason he declined to give weight to testimony which was positive and uncontradicted; and relied upon that which was merely inferential.

4. That the witnesses, Mrs. Rachel L. Whaley, Mrs. Bessie W. Seabrook and Mrs. Riordan, the last two the granddaughters of Joseph Whaley, and the parties who, if the transfer of the city stock, so far as Joseph Whaley was concerned, was not complete, were entitled to share in the same, but who testified against their own interest and to the declarations of Joseph Whaley, as having exercised absolute disposition of said stock, have been, in the findings of the referee, wholly discredited, without witnesses or circumstances to impeach their testimony.

5. That the referee, in coming to his conclusions of facts, disregarded the testimony of William Whaley, to the effect that Joseph Whaley kept the city stock himself, giving him the stock from time to time; the stock so given to William Whaley, according to the testimony of the other witnesses in the case, plainly appearing as absolutely parted with by the said Joseph Whaley, and so given to the said William Whaley for the purposes considered necessary by the said William Whaley.

6. That the referee did not report as a conclusion of fact, that the testimony offered in the case plainly proved such control of the city stock, given by Joseph Whaley to William Whaley, as would prevent the said Joseph Whaley, were he living, from asserting title to the same against a purchaser for value bona fide, and without notice.

7. That the claim of the plaintiffs to the stock depends upon the right of Joseph Whaley to the stock; and where a purchaser for value bona fide, and without notice, would prevail against Joseph Whaley were he alive, the same will prevail against all claiming to be his creditors, and whose rights are such as Joseph Whaley had. That the referee should have reported, as a conclusion of fact, that the city council being purchasers for value bona fide and without notice, the plaintiffs had no claim to the stock which Joseph Whaley was estopped from setting up against the city council.

8. That the referee should have reported, as a conclusion of fact, that the handwriting of Joseph Whaley, on all the notes *and bonds held by parties claiming an interest in the stock in question in this case, and which was in evidence, was the same as that which appeared on the city stock; and such was the testimony of E. H. Sparkman and others produced by the plaintiffs as experts. Or, that if he did not adopt that conclusion of fact from this evidence, but did adopt the conclusion that it was not, the referee should have so reported as a conclusion of fact.

9. That the referee erred in denying to the city council the right of reply to the testimony of John E. Phillips; and also in denying to the city council the right of reply generally to the testimony of the plaintiff in rebuttal.

10. That the endorsement of the name of the owner of stock in blank, or to a designated person, on a certificate of city stock, is in fact the absolute disposition of the stock by the person whose name is so endorsed; and as such cannot be impeached in the hands of a holder bona fide and without notice.

11. That the referee should have reported that the city council proved their right to the stock claimed by them by transfers of the same, the said city council being purchasers bona fide for value and without notice; and that the title of Joseph Whaley in and over the said stock, had ceased so far as purchasers bona fide for value and without notice had been extinguished by his endorsement in blank and otherwise on said stock, leaving the same in possession of William Whaley, to be dealt with as he, William Whaley, chose, and without notice on the part of Joseph Whaley of any restriction upon the use of the endorsement of his name; and that evidence being uncontradicted that the said Joseph Whaley did, during his lifetime, deliver the said stock to William Whaley.

12. That the referee erred in not reporting that the city stock scrip No. 7 was in the possession of the People's National Bank during the lifetime of Joseph Whaley, and at the time of his death, with an absolute transfer and assignment thereof to H. G. Loper, cashier of the People's National Bank; and that it was sold by the said bank to the city council, the city council being the purchaser bona fide for value and without notice.

13. That the referee erred in not reporting that the city stock scrip No. 12, was in the possession of the People's National Bank

*during the lifetime of Joseph Whaley, and at the time of his death, with an absolute transfer and assignment thereof to H. G. Loper, cashier of the People's National Bank; and that it was sold by the said bank to the city council, the city council being the purchasers thereof bona fide and without notice; and that the handwriting of the said Joseph Whaley, as it appears on the said scrip, was genuine, and the same as appears on all the notes and bonds introduced in evidence in this case as valid claims against the estate of Joseph Whaley, and to pay which it is claimed that the title of city council, as purchaser, should be set aside, and the parties holding such claims be held entitled to the said stock against the city council.

14. That in regard to scrips Nos. 382 and 384, the referee should have reported, as the only conclusion of fact, that the transfer thereof was made to the city council, a purchaser thereof bona fide for value and without notice, under an assignment and transfer thereof in blank by the said Joseph Whaley at some time in his life, when the said Joseph Whaley parted with the possession of said scrips; and that the handwriting of the said Joseph Whaley, as it appears on the said scrips, was genuine, and the same as upon all the notes and bonds introduced in evidence in this case as valid claims against the estate of Joseph Whaley and to pay which it is claimed that the title of the city council as purchaser should be set aside, and the parties holding such claims be held entitled to the said stock against the city council.

15. That the referee should have reported as a conclusion of fact in regard to scrips Nos. 383, 386, 387, 393, 394, 395 and 396, that said scrips were transferred and assigned by Joseph Whaley, in his lifetime; that the said city council became purchaser thereof bona fide for value and without notice; that the transfers thereof were made on the books of the city treasury, by parties claiming and holding under transfer and assignment of the said Joseph Whaley, in his lifetime; and that the handwriting of the said Joseph Whaley, as it appears on all of the said scrips, was genuine, and the same as it appears on all the notes and bonds introduced in evidence in this case, as valid claims against the estate of Joseph Whaley, and to pay which it is *claimed that the title of the city council as purchaser, should be set aside, and the parties holding such claims be held entitled to the said stock against the city council.

16. That the city council excepts to all that part of the report of the referee, in which he has gone into the account and narration of the history of each of the several scrips now held by the city council, and that such account and narration is not correct, and that the same in nowise can be introduced to affect the title of the city council to the scrips held by it, nor admissible in a proceeding to which the parties to be affected by it, and through whom title comes to the city council are not before the court nor parties in the cause.

I adopt the above for the executors of Joseph Whaley.

Attorney for Executors.

Decree.

The complaint in this case is in the nature of a creditor's bill, the plaintiffs in their own behalf claiming, as creditors of Joseph Whaley, to have certain city stock, at the time of the death of Joseph Whaley standing on the books of the city treasury in his name, and transferred subsequently to his death, administered as assets of the estate of Joseph Whaley. The city council of Charleston will, for the present, be considered as the defendant principally interested in the relief asked in the complaint.

A large portion of this stock was purchased by the city council for the commissioners of the sinking fund, and other portions of the stock have been transferred on the books of the city treasury to other persons. The plaintiffs ask that the city stock purchased by the city council and transferred to the commissioners of the sinking fund, and the city stock also on the books of the city treasury transferred to other parties purchasing the same, be accounted for as part of the estate of Joseph Whaley.

*Joseph Whaley died on the 26th day of January, 1872, leaving a will unrevoked, and appointed therein an executrix and two executors; of these, his son, William Whaley, named in the will as executor, only qualified. The complaint in this case has been substituted for another, filed in the name of the People's Bank, to which the city council was not a party. An order made in that case allowed this complaint to be filed in place of that, and another order directed all the claims proved in the case of the People's Bank to be transferred to this case of Fraser & Dill, and be considered as proved in this.

Under an order of reference in this case, the case was referred to G. W. Dingle, Esq., who proceeded to hold his reference in the same, and made his report.

This report was confirmed, and an appeal taken to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court, for the reasons set forth in the opinion, sent the case to the Circuit Court with directions, according to which, under the order of the Circuit Court, the reference was opened, testimony taken, and a report made to this court, to which exceptions have been filed.

According to the opinion of the Supreme Court, the real issue as to the stock was the right of ownership in it at the death of the testator.

That the plaintiffs' right to the relief asked was through the right of the testator to it at the time of his death, and its liability as his property to respond to the demands which they hold against him as creditors.

The case was then remanded for the purpose of allowing said city council to offer evidence of their right to the stock, which, on the death of Joseph Whaley, stood in his name, or to show how he may have been divested of his title thereto, the respondents to be at liberty to offer testimony in rebuttal. The Circuit Court, in its order of reference, was guided by the directions of the Supreme Court as to the scope of the reference, and the parties appeared before the referee, the defendant, the city council, to offer evidence of its right to the stock, or to show how the title of Joseph Whaley was divested.

The title set up by the city council was that of a purchaser for value bona fide, and without notice. The property of Joseph

*Whaley in the stock was claimed to have been divested by his blank endorsement on the scrip before his death, and his parting with the scrip so endorsed to third persons, to whom the transfer was made after the death of Joseph Whaley, these persons producing to the city treasurer the certificates of stock purporting to have the endorsement thereon of Joseph Whaley, and surrendered to the city treasurer, by whom new certificates were given, and from these persons the city council purchased the stock.

This is the history of the greater portion of the stock purchased by the city council. Other stock, purchased by other parties and transferred to them, different perhaps in some respects from this, but in the view now to be taken of the case it is not necessary particularly to distinguish it from that held by the city council at this part of the decree. In the argument of the case two propositions were discussed.

1st. Supposing the endorsement of Joseph Whaley to be in his own handwriting, what is the legal nature and effect of that endorsement?

2d. Is the endorsement in the proper handwriting of Joseph Whaley?

The second of these propositions is a question of fact. To this question quite a number witnesses were examined before the referee, and their testimony filed with the report. A number of the proven or admitted signatures of Joseph Whaley were also put in evidence, and these, together with the disputed signatures upon the scrip, were photographed and pasted together upon large sheets of paper and submitted to me at the hearing. After a careful review of all the testimony, my mind is forced to the conclusion that the findings of the referee are correct, and the exceptions thereto are overruled, and the report confirmed and ordered to stand as the findings of the court upon matters of fact.

It is useless to discuss the effect of an endorsement not made by Joseph Whaley. Of course Joseph Whaley was not divested of his title to scrip by endorsements not made by himself or by his authority.

This disposes of the question of the validity of the transfer by the city council of all the city stock which stood on the books of *the city treasurer in the name of Joseph Whaley at the time of his death, except scrip No. 7, for $23,000.

In relation to this scrip, the facts found are as follows: "I find that the above-mentioned certificate No. 7, for $23,000, with the name of Joseph Whaley endorsed thereon, was in the possession of H. G. Loper, cashier of the People's National Bank, prior to the death of Joseph Whaley, and was, by virtue of a transfer written over the name of Joseph Whaley, transferred to him in the books of the city treasurer, after the death of Joseph Whaley.

"I find that the signature of Joseph Whaley, endorsed on this certificate, transferring the same to H. G. Loper, cashier, is the handwriting of Joseph Whaley. This certificate, then, was in the possession of Loper before the death of Joseph Whaley, endorsed by Joseph Whaley, and transferred on the books of the city treasurer to Loper after the death of Joseph Whaley." It appears, in the report of the referee, that there was issued to Loper, by the city council, scrip No. 51 in lieu of scrip No. 7. This stock was pledged to secure a call loan to the People's National Bank, on the 11th of January, 1872.

The call loan was marked paid on the 12th of April, 1872. Scrip 51 was bought by the city on the 23d of May, 1872. How the call loan was paid does not appear. There is nothing in the testimony to show that this stock was ever in the possession of Joseph Whaley in his lifetime, or of his personal representative after his death, after it was pledged to the People's National Bank on the 11th of January, 1872. Then Loper, the cashier, holding this scrip on the 11th of January, 1872, the scrip endorsed in blank by Joseph Whaley, and nothing appearing to impeach the transaction through which he held, must be regarded as the lawful holder, coupled with an interest, and had the right to do with it all that was necessary to effectuate the purpose of his so holding, and as it appears that the certificate representing this stock was sold by him, he is entitled to the presumption that it was so sold by him to effectuate the purpose of the pledge. Baldwin v. Ely, 9 How. U. S. 600 [13 L. Ed. 266].

Up to the time of the sale, Joseph Whaley in his lifetime, or his personal representative after his death, had the right to *redeem; but by the sale in pursuance of the agreement to pledge, the right to redeem was barred and the purchaser took a good title. The purchase related to the time of the pledge, and effectually divested Joseph Whaley of all title to the stock. Whether Loper held a power of attorney coupled with an interest, and therefore had the right to cause this stock to be transferred after the death of Joseph Whaley, and thus acquire the legal title, or whether he held a mere naked power which was determined by the death of Joseph Whaley, are questions that need not be decided in this decree in the view now taken of the case.

It is admitted in the argument that a delivery of the scrip with a power of attorney to transfer endorsed, passes the equitable but not the legal title.

According to the face of these certificates of stock, they can be transferred only upon the books of the treasury upon the appearance of the owner of the stock in person, or by attorney, and the surrender of the certificate. This is manifestly a regulation designed for the security of the bank itself, and of third persons taking transfers of the stock without notice of any prior equitable title.

The general construction which has been put upon other charters of their banks containing similar provisions as to the transfer of their stock, is that the provisions are designed solely for the safety and security of the bank itself and of purchasers without notice, and that as between vendor and vendee a transfer not in conformity to such provisions is good to pass the equitable title and divest the vendor of all interest in the stock. See Black v. Zacharie, 3 How. U. S. 513 [11 L. Ed. 690], and numerous authorities there collected. If any creditor had attached the stock without notice, perhaps the property would not have passed to Loper as against the attaching creditor, but there is nothing of that kind in this case. Whether Loper could effectually cause the stock now under consideration to be transferred, and thus acquire the legal title, under the view now taken, is of no consequence to the plaintiff in this action, as Joseph Whaley was as completely divested of the title to the stock by conveying the equitable title, as he could have been by transferring the legal title, so far as the plaintiffs in this action are concerned, and the fact that this stock was *transferred after the death of Joseph Whaley, can restore no rights to his estate that had been parted with in his lifetime. In the argument at the hearing the testimony to the effect that the signatures of Joseph Whaley upon the notes held by plaintiff and other creditors were in the same handwriting as the disputed signatures upon the city scrip, was pressed upon my attention, and it was suggested that if the disputed signatures upon the scrip were not genuine, then the signatures upon said notes were not genuine, and the holders thereof had not the right to sustain the relation of plaintiffs to this action. It was said, upon the other hand that for argument sake, admitting that the signatures of Joseph Whaley upon the notes were not genuine, there were other creditors of Joseph Whaley in whose behalf this complaint would be sustained. It was further said in this behalf that the notes referred to were in judgment, and had been therefore passed upon by a court of competent jurisdiction and could not be collaterally impeached, and could only be assailed in a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. The issue thus raised is not ripe for decision in this decree, but may again arise in the subsequent progress of the cause.

As matters of law, I find that Joseph Whaley was divested of the stock represented by scrip No. 7, by endorsing the same to H. G. Loper, cashier, and the subsequent sale of the stock by Loper, in pursuance of his contract with Joseph Whaley.

I find that Joseph Whaley was not divested of the stock represented by certificates numbers 12, 382, 383, 384, 386, 387, 393, 394, 395 and 396, by any endorsement of the name of Joseph Whaley thereon, as such endorsement is not the handwriting of Joseph Whaley, or made by his authority, and that the said stock is still a part of the estate of Joseph Whaley.

It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the city stock which stood in the name of Joseph Whaley at the time of his death, except that represented by certificate No. 7, belonged to the estate of the said Joseph Whaley, and is subject to the payment of his debts.

It is ordered that the said city council do cancel, or cause to be canceled, the certificates of stock transferred to the general sinking fund, and which has been adjudged to belong to the estate of *Joseph Whaley, that is to say, certificates numbers 382, 384, 386, 387, 393, 395, 396, and do issue new certificates therefor in the name of the receiver, hereafter to be appointed in this cause, and that the said council do account with and pay over to the said receiver all dividends or interest thereon which have become due thereon since the death of the said Joseph Whaley.

3. It is further ordered that the said city council do account with the said receiver, when appointed, for so much of the said city stock which stood in the name of Joseph Whaley at the time of his death, and since transferred to other persons, that is to say, certificates of the following numbers, 12, 383, 394, and that said city council do pay to the said receiver when appointed, the market value of the said stock at the time of the said transfers, and do account with and pay over to the said receiver the amount of any and all dividends which may have become due from the time of the death of the said Joseph Whaley, up to the time of such payment.

4. It is further ordered that it be referred to G. W. Dingle, Esq., to inquire and report a suitable person to be appointed receiver in this cause, and the amount of security he should give in the same.

5. It is further ordered that said receiver have leave to institute such proceedings as he may be advised may be proper and necessary to try the validity of any claims against the estate of Joseph Whaley, and defend such proceedings as may be instituted against him.

W. H. Wallace,
April 8th, 1878. Circuit Judge.

From this degree the plaintiffs appealed, upon the grounds set forth in their argument.

The city council also appealed upon the following grounds:

First. Because there was no sufficient proof before the court that the complainants were creditors of the deceased, Joseph Whaley, and, therefore, no case was before the court in which an order could be made for an accounting with them by the *executor, or other act to be done connected with the administration of the estate and concerning which they had a standing in court.

Second. That the judgment of his Honor Judge Wallace rested upon an alleged want of proof of the genuineness of the signature of Joseph Whaley, the deceased, because of which the transfer of the scrip was held invalid. But there was the same want of proof of the genuineness of the signature of Joseph Whaley on the notes of the plaintiffs and others; and if the endorsements of the certificates of stock were invalid, the endorsements of the notes and the name of Joseph Whaley, signed to the bond, were equally so.

Third. Because his Honor Judge Wallace erred in holding that the issue as to the validity of the endorsements of the notes was not ripe for decision: that such issue was ripe for decision, and such decision should have been made dismissing the bill so far as the holders of such notes were before the court.

Fourth. Because while in the three preceding exceptions, the endorsements of the certificates of stock and of notes have been presented as equally affected by the proof of handwriting: nevertheless, in regard to the certificates of stock, there was competent and positive testimony sustaining the validity of the endorsements of the stock.

Fifth. Because his Honor Judge Wallace erred in deciding that in this case it was proper to appoint a receiver; that if exceptions were taken to one of the executors, there was before the court, in the person of W. James Whaley, Esq., an executor of Joseph Whaley, who had, subsequent to the transactions set forth in the pleadings, qualified as such executor, and against whom no charge of improper conduct could be made.

Sixth. Because if it were so that a receiver would be appointed upon the proof before the court his Honor Judge Wallace, failing to decide the question of the invalidity of the endorsements of the notes, should have ordered the receiver not to recognize the endorsements of the notes as constituting valid claims against the estate of Joseph Whaley, until so established by the judgment of a court.

*The following is a summary of the leading argument on each side, upon the law points involved:

[For prior opinion, see Whaley v. City of Charleston, 8 S. C. 344. For subsequent opinions, see 13 S. C. 533, and 19 S. C. 384].

Mr. Julian Mitchell, for city council.

The most striking fact in this whole case, and upon which the testimony is unanimous, is that, leaving out the Lathers bond and scrip No. 7, the signatures on the claims and debts of the estate held by the creditors are in the same handwriting as the signatures on all the city stock save No. 7.

We therefore say they are estopped from denying the validity of their debts, and consequently are bound by their own testimony that the scrip signatures are the same as on their debts.

It is said that estoppel is an odious doctrine, but in this case, if the view of the creditors that the signatures on the scrip are not genuine, then the doctrine of estoppel becomes one of the most just, equitable and righteous doctrines a court of equity has ever been called on to enforce. Are they, then, estopped?

1. They claim by virtue of debts of Joseph Whaley to make Joseph Whaley's estate liable; a denial of the genuineness of the endorsements creating their claims is a denial of the liability of the estate, and ends their case.

2. They claim that the endorsements are genuine; have sworn to them in order to get their judgments, and each one, in his affidavit of proof of claim, has alleged the validity of the endorsements.

3. They have introduced them as such, i. e., genuine notes, waiving the ruling of the referee; no one of them objected to their introduction; no one objected to the witnesses testifying to them. The examination of the whole book of testimony does not show a single objection made by any of the parties in the cause to the genuineness of their claims; in fact, such a thing could not have been done, because, by so doing, they would have been out of court. But it is said that Gibbon's note, Scott's bond, Davie's note and verdict of Gadsden v. Whaley, save the complaint. This cannot be so—

First. Because the parties holding these claims, being parties in the cause, raised no objection to the validity or genuineness of the signatures on the notes when presented in evidence; nor did *any one of them impeach them, and, therefore, they are, by the familiar principle of evidence, bound by their omission to object.

Secondly. Because the Gibbon note, the Scott bond and Davie's note were all given at or about the very dates when the other notes were given, and the presumption is very strong that they bear the same signature.

Thirdly. The Gadsden v. Whaley claim on their verdict has not yet reached the point of judgment upon which the court could base a decree in this case, and the court would hold those whose notes have been proved in the cause, as bound by their position as to the genuineness of the signatures thereon, and without remedy against the city council.

The law, as laid down to sustain the above doctrine, is as follows: Bigelow on Estoppel 20, 25, 584, 617, 618; Greenl. on Ev., § 535; 5 Man. & G. 131–192; 16 Q. B. 229–237; 5 Hill 183; 8 Rich. 117; 16 Q. B. 198; Stephens' Ev. 52; 8 Paige 41; 30 N. Y. 519–541; 18 N. Y. 382; 3 Hill 215.

All the creditors, therefore, in this case are estopped from denying the signatures on the notes and claims to be genuine, and their own testimony says it is the same signature on the scrip. How, then, can they recover?

While on this point I deem it best to discuss the fourth ground, to wit:

If all of the above grounds were to fail, then this stock is only liable, as the property of Joseph Whaley, for his debts, and if it appears, at any stage of the cause, that any party fails to have a valid debt, he will not be entitled to any portion of the stock or any remedy against the city council. Broom's Legal Maxims 712, 728, 734, 736; 15 Mass. 204.

But the plaintiffs insist that the city council cannot now question the signatures to the notes and obligations.

This proposition of theirs rests on two grounds:

1. That in those claims which were reduced to judgment, the judgment is conclusive as against every one, and cannot be questioned.

But the city council was no party to the proceedings. How can it then be bound by any judgment obtained therein?

The rule is unquestioned that a third person can always attack *or impeach a judgment to which he was not a party or privy when such judgment is the ground of any claim against him. Freem. on Judg., § 334; 4 Cush. 31; 1 Hill 302; 8 S. C. 262.

2. The second ground is, that all these claims having been proved in this case without any exception to their proof within the time allowed by the rule of court, they cannot now be questioned or assailed.

But it is not possible for a Court of Chancery to use these claims as a shield to protect the fraud involved in the other cases. See the powers of the equitable jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in C. J. Moses' decree, Sp. Eq. Jur.

II. The estate became divested of its title by the absolute transfer of the stock by the testator in his lifetime, of which there is no doubt as to scrip No. 7. Or by the hypothecation of the stock by virtue of a power of attorney executed during his life, and coupled with an interest, and therefore irrevocable.

The law as to the irrevocability of such powers coupled with an interest is as follows: 2 Liv. on Ag. 308; 18 How. 427; 13 N. Y. 599; 7 Wall. 415; 11 Wall. 369; Sch. on Per. Prop. 631-634; 1 Bail. 624; 12 Rich. 41; 4 E. D. Smith 440; 4 Duer 1; 1 Duer 354.

III. "The plaintiffs have no more right to the stock than that which Joseph Whaley, were he alive, could set up, and he, by parting with the control and disposition of the stock by handing the same over to his son, placed him in a position to deal with it as his own, and therefore if innocent parties are prejudiced by such action of the testator, the loss must fall upon the estate." 2 Whart. on Ev., § 1154; Rich. Eq. Cas. 246; 2 Johns. Ch. 589; 10 Ad. & El. 437, 90; 6 Ad. & El. 469; 1 Curtis 136.

1. The last ground we will notice is the first as laid down in the beginning of the argument. The city council is a bona fide purchaser for value without notice.

The endorsements on the back of all the scripts are not powers of attorney, but absolute transfers. By the scrip itself, and the ordinances of the city, they are made payable to the party or his *assigns. All the requirements of the ordinance as to the transfer of title have been complied with. The title is actually transferred by virtue of the endorsement, and there is nothing to be done as between vendor and vendee—it is not a power, for there is nothing to be executed. The mere fact of the transfer in the books of the city is for the benefit of the corporation, as a safeguard to them. The authorities all hold it is an assignment and not a power.

These scrips are also negotiable instruments, and by an examination of the authorities here given, it will be seen the Supreme Court has so held.

Bonds of municipal corporations are commercial instruments. 2 Otto 642; 4 Otto 287; 11 Wall. 377. Important on the point that these securities savor of a negotiable character. 13 N. Y. 599. The case most directly in point is 19 Wall. 477. See, too, 9 How. 580; A. & A. Corp. 543, 547; 20 Wend. 91; 2 Pick. 243; 11 Rich. 344.

The provision usual in charters that no transfer of stock shall be effectual until entered in the books of the corporation, is a regulation designed for the security of the corporation itself and of third persons taking transfers without notice of any prior equitable transfer. It relates to the transfer of the legal title and not of any equitable interest subordinate to that title; as between vendor and vendee, a transfer not in conformity to such provisions passes the equitable title and divests the vendor of his interest. 2 Cow. 777, 778; 11 Wend. 628; 10 Mass. 476; 8 Pick. 90; 3 How. U. S. 483; 23 How. Pr. 359; 17 N. J. Eq. 117; 9 Pick. 202; 11 Wend. 627; 10 Mass. 476; 7 Lans. 307; 49 N. Y. 286; 48 N. Y. 585; 40 Cal. 614; 2 S. C. 25; 57 N. Y. 616; 10 Bush 54; 53 Ga. 514; 42 Md. 384.

It may be urged that the conclusions of the referee and the Circuit judge, so far as the facts found are concerned, are final, and cannot be disturbed. In answer to this we say that in chancery cases this court has the undoubted right to review the testimony, and reverse, modify or confirm the conclusions of the court below in like manner as the old Court of Appeals in Chancery could have done. 6 S. C. 90, 379.

*The present case is one of chancery jurisdiction, and falls within the rule.

Mr. Edward McCrady, Jr., and Mr. Samuel Lord, Jr., for plaintiffs.

The Plaintiffs' Appeal.

1. From so much of the decree of his Honor Judge Wallace as holds that Joseph Whaley was divested of the city stock represented by scrip No. 7, by endorsing the same to H. G. Loper, cashier, and the subsequent sale of the stock by Loper, in pursuance of his contract with Joseph Whaley.

The city council, unable to show a power of sale under the will, or an order of the Court of Probate authorizing the sale at which they purchased, have undertaken to show that H. G. Loper from whom they bought, held the same with a blank endorsement and power of attorney from Joseph Whaley, coupled with an interest. But how have they succeeded in doing this?

We think his Honor has assumed the very point in issue. Did Joseph Whaley endorse the stock to H. G. Loper, cashier? Did Loper have any contract with Joseph Whaley? There is no evidence that Joseph Whaley had any transaction whatsoever with Loper, nor has it even been suggested in evidence that there was any such. Whatever contract there was, was between Loper and William Whaley. But first, let us inquire was this scrip No. 7 a negotiable instrument which would pass by mere endorsement.

a. Was this certificate of stock a negotiable instrument?

This stock is the creature of statute, and is governed by the provisions of the statute which authorized its issue. Its very form is prescribed by ordinance, and on its face it is announced that it is "recorded in and transferable only at the office of the city treasurer, by appearance in person or by attorney, according to the rules and forms instituted for that purpose."

His Honor the Circuit judge seems to assume in his opinion that there was not only a blank endorsement, but also a power of attorney from Joseph Whaley to transfer, and it is just here that this case differs from most, if not from all of the cases relied upon *by the city. There was in each of those cases not only an endorsement, but a power of attorney accompanying it. See 6 Rich. Eq. 334; 37 Eng. L. & Eq. 195; 11 Barb. 385; 21 How. 397; 22 Wend. 359.

A case very similar to this has recently been discussed and decided in the Court of Appeals in New York. This case is Merchants' Bank of Canada v. Livingston et al., found in The Reporter for August, 1878, p. 178.

In our case, the city council has never claimed that the People's Bank, or Loper, had dealt with William Whaley or the agent of Joseph Whaley. Their answer rests their defence upon the authority and agency of Loper.

Judge Wallace cites 3 How. 513, which undoubtedly sustains his position, but with this qualification, that Judge Story, in that case, was speaking of the legal title, and refers to the case, 2 Wheat. 393, in which he also delivered the opinion of the court.

b. The city council must stand upon the issues made in the pleadings.

It is clear that the transaction we are examining was not, as the city council allege, with Joseph Whaley, but with William Whaley, that the loan "was made to William Whaley," and the stock taken as "collateral security for money borrowed by Mr. William Whaley." The defence which the city set up in its answer is a legal one. It claims the legal title to the stock by reason of the transfer made by Joseph Whaley to Loper. The defence it has endeavored to establish by evidence is an equitable title under a blank endorsement.

The well-established rule is that a defendant must not only answer definitely, but that he can avail himself of no other defence, not even if on the trial another defence is developed by the evidence. 12 N. Y. 579. The same has been recognized and enforced by this court. 4 S. C. 52. See, too, 1 Russ. & M. 527.

But the city has not established the equitable title it would now set up.

The city council cannot put itself in the position of a stranger who is an innocent purchaser. The city knew, or at least is charged in law with the fullest knowledge, in regard to this *stock. The city is charged with the knowledge of the facts from its own books.

c. The defence of the city is in violation of the statute of frauds. (Rev. Stat. 480.)

The facts proved show that the estate of Joseph Whaley is charged for the debt of William Whaley. This cannot be done unless upon an agreement in writing, or some note or memorandum thereof, signed by Joseph Whaley, undertaking to answer for the debt of William Whaley.

d. The debt for which the stock was pledged was paid, and the stock redeemed more than a month before the city purchased it.

2. We proceed to consider the question based by the complainants' second ground of appeal, to wit, that the Circuit judge erred in directing the receiver to institute such proceedings as he may be advised are proper and necessary to try the validity of any claims against the estate of Joseph Whaley.

It will be convenient to consider, in this connection, the question raised in its appeal by the city, to wit, that there was no sufficient proof before the court that the complainants were the creditors of Joseph Whaley.

It is clear, 1. That no evidence has been introduced calculated even to cast suspicion upon the judgments held by Mary F. Davie, George E. Gibbon, R. K. Scott and Richard Lathers, or on the verdict recovered by Mrs. Gadsden, or the account proved by Mr. Ravenel, for advances made to Joseph Whaley in his lifetime.

Conceding, therefore, that all the other claims presented are spurious, these parties have offered sufficient proof before the court that they are creditors of Joseph Whaley, and, as such, entitled to maintain this action.

2. That the validity of none of the claims proved has, at any stage of these proceedings, been questioned, either by the executors of Joseph Whaley or by his legatees, or by his creditors, or by any other party entitled to raise that issue.

In support of the exceptions we are now considering, we submit the following propositions:

1. That the proper functions of a receiver, in a case like this, to which the executors are parties defendant, and the creditors *have been called in and have proved their claims, are simply to receive the funds paid into court and distribute them under the order of the court.

2. That this court has not the power to invest the receiver with such power and subject him to such obligations; that persons interested in the estate of Joseph Whaley, and not parties to these proceedings, will be bound by a judgment against him.

3. That it was competent, at the proper stage of these proceedings, for the executors of Joseph Whaley, or for any creditor, to object to any or all of the claims proved against his estate and not already in judgment. No such objection was raised by these parties, or any of them, at any stage of the proceedings. It was only raised on the Circuit indirectly in the argument of the counsel for the city, and is now only raised on appeal by the city, which had and has no right to raise it in any form or at any time, the city not being a creditor of Joseph Whaley, but simply a wrongdoer in unlawful possession of his property.

4. It is now too late for any of the parties to these proceedings to object to the validity of any of the claims reported as proved and established in the case. The referee's report was filed on the day of , 1875. Many objections were taken, but no objection was made to any of these claims. The report of the referee was confirmed by an order of court, made on the 28th of June, 1875, and the referee was directed to inquire and report in what order and rank the debts of Joseph Whaley, reported by him as proved and established in this cause, are to be paid. This decree was objected to on other grounds, but no objection was made on this ground. The only question which any of the parties to this case can now be permitted to agitate, is as to the order in which these claims are to be paid. On all other questions they are concluded. 1 Rich. Eq. 24; 7 S. C. 131.

5. If the legatees of Joseph Whaley, or other parties not now before the court have any equities, they must assert them in their own names in the mode prescribed by law and by the established practice of this court.

Even the creditors of a party defrauded have no right—though the fraud have the effect to diminish his means of paying them—*to set aside the fraud. "It is for the debtor," says the court in Pettus v. Smith, 4 Rich. Eq. 197, "to do so."

As we have already said, the city council is not even a creditor of Joseph Whaley or of his legatees. If the notes are fraudulent, the fraud was not perpetrated with a view to injure the city. It has no right, then, to raise this clamor.

Nor is it the duty of the Circuit Court, or of this court, to move in the right of those interested until they invoke the aid of the court. "Courts," says Chancellor Wardlaw, "are not the professional advisers of any portion of the community." See 7 S. C. 240.

6. As to the claims resting on judgment, we insist that the court cannot, in this case, pass upon the genuineness of the endorsements upon which judgment was obtained, because that question is concluded by the judgments rendered, and such judgments cannot be impeached collaterally, but can be set aside only on some direct proceeding before the court in which they were rendered. 4 Otto 552; Bail. Eq. 334; 2 Hill Ch. 469; 5 S. C. 8; 3 Otto, 165.

The record, in this case, discloses no ground for any imputation of fraud against any of these judgment creditors, and still less is it proved that there was any collusion between them and the executor of Joseph Whaley. If, as has been so often insinuated by the attorneys for the city, the notes held by them are forgeries, they are the innocent victims of fraud and not its perpetrators.

April 16th, 1878. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. Both parties appeal. The first, second and third grounds of appeal on the part of the city council are upon points which had either been already decided at the former trial, and not appealed from, or do not properly arise in the present case—at least at this stage of the proceeding. The fifth ground of appeal raises an objection to the appointment of a receiver. That point had been decided by the former judgment in this case and assented to by all parties, and is not a proper subject of appeal. The sixth ground is wholly without foundation. It will be time to appeal after something to appeal from has arisen. *There is no evidence that the receiver has recognized any of the notes referred to, or that their validity will be recognized except upon proper legal evidence. To set aside what has already been fixed by judgment and not appealed from, or by consent of the parties, can only be done upon proceedings for which the Circuit judge, in this case, made ample provision. The fourth ground of appeal is upon the finding of facts by the Circuit judge. This court is unable to perceive either a lack of evidence to warrant such finding, or such preponderance of evidence on the other side as would justify a reversal of the finding. The court is impressed with the force of the proposition that the hypothecation of such securities by the legal owner, or by another person with the previous consent or subsequent acquiescence of the legal owner, without endorsement or power of attorney, may constitute, by delivery, an equitable assignment, and act as an estoppel against the legal owner and creditors claiming through him. The question was not made in the court below, or, at least, has not received adjudication, and there is no appeal upon that ground. But, apart from that, the evidence does not give foundation of fact sufficient for the proposition of law to rest upon. There is no evidence to show that any of the parties to the transaction, or the officers of the city government by whom the transfers were made, were ever aware of or misled or induced by any expression of knowledge or acquiescence on the part of the testator. On the contrary, the evidence is conclusive that reliance was placed solely upon what was taken to be the signature of the testator, and there is no evidence of any negligence on his part which could be charged with contributing to the mistake on their part. In the eye of the law it is the same as if there had been no signature on the certificates of stock. The absence of signature was notice of lack of authority, and put the parties on their guard. The case would be different if the legal owner had been asked and had expressed his assent. There is no evidence that the testator knew of any of the transactions out of which these questions arise. Of course this does not refer to certificate No. 7, which is not now being considered. It is true that there is testimony of some general expressions made by him, but there is no link to connect them with the special transactions which *are before the court. He could not have acquiesced in the transfers of the legal title to the stock, for the transfers were made after his death; that, therefore, cannot be in question. The question is as to the hypothecation, and the essential fact is that the certificates, being in the possession of another person, were hypothecated or sold by him without authority in writing, but with the knowledge and consent or subsequent acquiescence, with or without previous knowledge, on the part of the legal owner. Did such fact exist, or is there any evidence to give it color? The evidence upon which it rests is parol testimony, given by members of the family and intimate friends of the testator. They testify as to language used by the testator in conversation with them severally or together at different times, but not in the transaction of business. The drift of all this testimony is, that the testator had himself assigned the certificates by proper endorsement in writing, or, as it is said by one of the witnesses, "signed away the last of his city stocks." This directly contradicts the fact on which the whole argument rests, viz., that although he had not "signed away" the certificates, he nevertheless had delivered them, and consented to, or afterwards acquiesced in, uses to which they were to be or had been applied without authority of law. The truth is that these witnesses testified to prove, by corroborative statements of the deceased, that the signature on the certificates was in his handwriting. They did not, nor did they mean to, say that he acquiesced, or made any expression of acquiescence, in assignments which he had not made. Besides, there is no evidence that any of these certificates were pledged prior to July, 1871, just six months prior to testator's death, but nearly all, certainly, were pledged within that time, and some within a very short time before his death. The brevity of time, together with the great age of the testator, speak strongly against the probability of his having become acquainted with the facts as they have been developed by the trial, and there is no evidence that any of the parties to any of these transactions communicated to him that a certificate or certificates had been pledged. Such being the circumstances, some of the statements on which stress is laid are dated by the witnesses as having been made about eighteen months prior to *the death of the testator, and twelve months prior to the time when the first of the transactions on which these statements are brought by the appellant to bear have been found to have actually occurred. With these remarks, made to prevent any impression that this court has decided upon the legal point made in the argument, but which is not involved in the case, the appeal on behalf of the city of Charleston must be dismissed.

The plaintiffs appeal from so much of the judgment as relates to scrip No. 7 of the city stock, and from so much as gives to the receiver leave to "institute such proceedings as he may be advised may be proper and necessary to try the validity of any claims against the estate of Joseph Whaley, and defend such proceedings as may be instituted against him." The prayer of the appellants' complaint asks that a receiver may be appointed to take possession of the property and its proceeds, and administer the same in the place and stead of the executor. The previous judgment in the case had granted the prayer and appointed a receiver clothed with power to administer in the place and stead of the executor, and no appeal was taken. The court had thus taken possession of the property, and is bound to see to its proper administration. The right to prosecute and defend the legal rights of an estate is absolutely essential. It could rest in no one more properly than in the officer of the court appointed to act in the place and stead of the executor. The judgment goes no further than that, and furnishes no ground for appeal. The leave to "try the validity of claims" by the institution of proper proceedings is, indeed, purely directory. If, when proceedings have been instituted, they are erroneous in any respect, objection can then be taken and judgment can be had. As the case now stands, the court sees nothing in this point that requires consideration.

The other matter of appeal is the judgment that, "as matter of law, * * * Joseph Whaley was divested of the stock represented by scrip 7, by endorsing the same to H. G. Loper, cashier, and the subsequent sale of the stock by Loper in pursuance of his contract with Joseph Whaley." Whatever may be the room to argue, generally, that power of attorney is revoked by the death of the donor, it does not affect the conclusion *arrived at in this case. If the stock had not been transferred and sold, and the bank were now to bring an action upon the facts as found, the executor would be ordered to make the transfer. If nothing has been which the court would not have ordered to be done, it is not the disposition of the court of equity to have it all undone because of immaterial informalities. The creditors have no rights which Joseph Whaley would not have had. "A creditor is not a purchaser, and cannot assert any right that could not have been enforced by the debtor. Hence an assignment which is valid as between the parties will also be good against creditors. Westoby v. Day, 2

Ellis & Bl. 605. And it has been held to follow that the delivery of a certificate of stock to a purchaser, attended with a power of attorney to transfer, will confer a right that cannot be impeached or set aside by a subsequent execution or attachment against the vendor." Ryall v. Rowles, Lead. Cas. in Eq. Part II., Vol. II., (4th ed.) 1661; Id., p. 90; Bank v. Campbell, 2 Rich. Eq. 179; Moss v. Bratton, 5 Rich. Eq. 1. The rights of a creditor are subordinate to equitable as well as legal rights against the debtor. Bank v. Campbell, supra. The testator had signed the scrip in blank, and delivered it. It makes no difference whether the sale or pledge was made in person by the legal owner or by a party to whom he delivers it with a blank power. The pledge in this case seems to have been made by the party to whom delivery had been made by the original or legal owner. There is no difference between a sale and a pledge on the point now in question. There is no question about the right to redeem; no objection to the price for which the stock was sold, and no fraud charged. The sole question is that propounded in the order remanding the case, viz., Had the testator been divested of his title, and was the right of ownership in another at the time of testator's death? If he had been divested of his title, that is an end of the matter so far as these appellants are concerned, and that is all that is before the court for consideration. The bank came honestly into possession of the endorsed certificate in the ordinary course of business, "and is entitled to hold it against him who passed it, or enabled another to pass it to him." State Bank v. Cox, 11 Rich. Eq. 344 [78 Am. Dec. 458]. There is no real difference between that case of the Bank

v. Cox and this case. *The power of attorney in each instance was blank. The fact that in Bank v. Cox there was a form of a power, and in this case nothing, is a distinction without a difference. Each was lacking until something was written by the holder over the signature of the endorser, so that in legal effect, they are the same. The death of Joseph Whaley makes no difference. The executor of Madame Szeniere would have had no more power than she possessed. All the authorities agree, though some go much further, that the delivery of the certificate of stock, endorsed with a blank power, and for value, is an equitable assignment which binds the legal owner, and that it arises from a power coupled with an interest which is irrevocable during the lifetime, and is not revoked by the death of the legal owner. The case of Hunt v. Rousmanier, 8 Wheat. 174, was decided upon the ground that the power was not coupled with an interest, and therefore did not amount to an equitable assignment. The delivery of the certificate of stock constitutes an equitable assignment, for the reason that the certificate is the muniment or evidence of title, and its delivery is symbolical delivery of the stock. Angell & Ames on Corp., § 564. The right of the bank against the creditors of the testator is the same for purposes of defence as it would have been against him in his lifetime, and the city council is entitled, as against the claims of these creditors, to any defence which the bank might have. The creditors have no interest in the stock which Joseph Whaley had not when he died. Joseph Whaley unquestionably had assigned the certificates, and that constituted an equitable assignment of the stock. The bank could have compelled the city to transfer the stock. The city has only done what the court would have ordered to be done, and has in nowise damaged the creditors, and is not amenable to them for its conduct in the matter. With regard to the regulations on the subject of transfer, it is unnecessary to add anything to the conclusions stated by the Circuit judge and those reached by the court in Bank v. Cox, supra.

This case involves only the question as to the rights of the creditors. The moment the equitable assignment has been ascertained their rights are concluded. The legal owner would have been estopped, and they have no rights which he had not *at the time of his death, or when, in his lifetime, liens were fixed upon the specific property. An equitable assignment is good between the parties; and, all having notice, the formal transfer in the mode prescribed by the charter or the regulations is binding on all parties. Sabin v. Bank of Woodstock, 21 Vt. 353, cited in 2 Lead. Cas. in Eq. 1665. The case of Merchants' Bank of Canada v. Livingston, recently decided in the New York Court of Appeals, and relied on by the appellants, is not in conflict with the principles in Bank v. Cox, supra, or in McNeill v. Bank, 46 N. Y. 325. If the attorney in that case had acted upon his power, as the real owner, the stock would have been bound; but he, in fact, claimed not to be the owner of the stock, and failed to show authority to borrow money on it for the real owner. There is no evidence that William Whaley gave notice to the bank that he was not the real owner of the stock, and the blank endorsement is direct evidence that he is the real owner by virtue of an equitable assignment. Besides, Bank v. Cox, supra, is conclusive on the point, and we feel no disposition to question its authority. The language of the Circuit judge that "Joseph Whaley was divested * * * by endorsing the same [the scrip] to H. G. Loper," &c., refers not to the actual transaction, but to the legal effect of the endorsement. When the transfer is made by virtue of a blank power, it must be treated in law as an assignment from the one who was the legal owner to the person who becomes the legal owner by transfer on the books of the corporation. There is, therefore, no material discrepancy between the facts and the conclusions of law.

It is contended by the appellants that the city council is confined to the issues made in the pleadings, and that the defence now relied on is not alleged in the answer. There is nothing in the objection. The issue on which the second trial was had, with the consent of all parties, was framed by the order of this court remanding the case for trial upon the point stated. In the answer, however, there is a denial of Section 9 of the complaint, which constitutes a general denial of the title to the stock, and under this the defence could have been made.

Other exceptions taken were not pressed in the argument, and *it seems unnecessary to state further the reasons upon which the rulings of the Circuit judge are sustained.

The judgment is affirmed. Motion refused.

Judgment affirmed.

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐119; Costs ⇐215.]

An appeal lies to this court from a judgment of the Circuit Court confirming a taxation of costs in an action at law.

Before Kershaw, J., at Pickens, June Term, 1878.

This was an action for injury to personal property, brought by plaintiff against several defendants, demanding judgment for $350, her damages. The defendants all answered, denying that they had injured the property of plaintiff at all, or that she had been in any way damaged by them. At the trial upon this issue, on March 22d, 1878, the jury rendered the following verdict: "We find for the plaintiff damages—fifteen dollars." Upon this verdict judgment was entered up, the clerk of court taxing up full costs in favor of plaintiff. The defendants' counsel was present at the taxation and objected upon several grounds, which were renewed, on appeal, to the Circuit Court at the next term, on a motion to set aside the taxation. Judge Kershaw confirmed the taxation, except as to one item, not brought before this court by the appeal.

From this order of Judge Kershaw the defendant appealed, upon three grounds, to wit: (1.) Because plaintiff, having recov*ered but $15, was entitled to no costs. (2.) If to any, then the costs should not exceed the damages. (3.) That defendant was entitled to costs.

Mr. R. A. Child, for appellant.

At the common law there were no costs, as such, and the right to them is wholly of statutory origin. The plaintiff, therefore, can claim no costs, except such as are given in one of the four subdivisions of Section 330 of the code. The first two subdivisions have no bearing upon this case. Subdivision 3 does not give costs here, for this is a case in which a court of trial justice has jurisdiction. Code, § 74, Subd. 2. For it would be strange legislation to make costs depend upon the amount a plaintiff might choose to claim, without regard to the recovery. But while a trial justice has not jurisdiction of the amount claimed, he has of this action. 3 Wait Pr. 465; 43 How. Pr. 33; 7 Abb. (N. S.) 225.

This is an action for recovery of money and comes under Subdivision 4. 3 Wait Pr. 467; 13 How. Pr. 296; 9 Bosw. 601; 28 Barb. 284. And not having recovered $20, she cannot recover costs, but must pay costs to the defendants. Code, § 331; 8 Abb. (N. S.) 17; 2 Cal. 213; 1 How. Pr. 135; 3 Wait Pr. 468. But in no event can the plaintiff recover more costs than damages; for this case was tried after act of March 4th, 1878, amending Section 330 of the code, and the statute, at the time of trial, must govern. 3 Wait Pr. 456; 15 How. Pr. 156; Id. 74; 14 How. Pr. 279; 15 How. Pr. 420; 18 How. Pr. 532; Id. 305.

Messrs. Earle & Wells, contra.

No appeal will lie on mere question of costs. It comes under none of the heads of Section 11 of the code. Not under the first, for it does not affect the merits. Nor under the second, for it is not a special proceeding. Code, § 3; 3 S. C. 417. Nor under the third. 11 N. Y. 274; 3 How. Pr. 425; 16 N. Y. 294.

The question of appeals from orders affecting costs only, has been frequently adjudicated in New York. 41 N. Y. 362; 4 Abb. (N. S.) 202; 36 N. Y. 93; 34 N. Y. 355; 32 N.

Y. 479; *24 N. Y. 505; 28 How. Pr. 470; 3 How. Pr. 426. So, too, with our own old Court of Appeals. 1 McC. Ch. 210; 1 Hill

Ch. 92; 2 Hill 554; 2 Strob. Eq. 166; 5 Rich. Eq. 5.

If appeal lies, taxation is correct. A trial justice had no jurisdiction, because the amount claimed exceeded $100. Code, § 74, Subd. 2; 6 S. C. 389. The Subdivision 4 of Section 330 of the code, with its amendment by act of March 4th, 1878, cannot apply here; for it refers in its first sentence solely to actions for recovery of money, and not to actions ex delicto; and it nowhere mentions actions for recovery of damages for injury to personal property. See, too, 2 Bail. 88; 13 Rich. 98; 2 Bail. 212.

April 16th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. This is an appeal from an order of the Circuit judge allowing costs in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants. The action was brought in the Court of Common Pleas to recover damages for injuries to personal property, in which the amount claimed exceeded the sum of $100. The case was tried on the 22d of March, 1878, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for $15 damages. The respondent raises the preliminary objection, which must first be disposed of, that an appeal will not lie from an order confirming the taxation of costs by the clerk. There can be no doubt but that appeals from the decision of the Circuit Court of Law upon questions relating to the taxation of costs were constantly heard prior to the adoption of the code, as will appear from the numerous cases to be found in our digests deciding such questions. It is very true that in the court of equity it was always held that appeals upon a mere question of costs would not be heard by that court; but it was for the reason that, in that court, the question as to which party should pay the costs was a question for the discretion of the court, and did not follow the result, necessarily, as in cases at law; and, under the rule that questions of discretion were not appealable, it followed that decisions upon such questions were not appealable. Lewis v. Wilson, 1 McC. Eq. 210; Lyles v. Lyles, 1 Hill Eq. 92; Singleton v. Allen, 2 Strob. Eq. 174; Hext v. Walker, 5 Rich. Eq. 7. We do not understand that the code *has abridged the rights of parties in this respect. By the constitution this court has jurisdiction "for the correction of errors at law," and if an error of law has been committed by the Circuit Court in allowing or disallowing costs, we see no reason why it may not be corrected. Costs form a part of the judgment, as much so as the interest which may accrue "from the time of the verdict or report until judgment be finally entered," and, like such interest, must be inserted in the judgment. Code, §§ 336–7. And if they are illegally inserted in, or omitted from the judgment, to that extent the judgment is erroneous and illegal, and may be corrected by this court. Although this question does not seem to have been distinctly decided in this state since the adoption of the code, yet this court has, in at least three instances, proceeded to adjudicate questions of costs. Columbia Water Power Company v. Columbia, 4 S. C. 402; Thompson v. Thompson, 6 S. C. 279, and Mars v. Conner [9 S. C. 70], MS. decision, filed August 8th, 1877. We are unable, therefore, to see any valid reason why we should not hear this appeal. We proceed, then, to inquire whether there was any error of law in allowing the costs in this case. By Section 330 of the code of procedure, it is declared that costs shall be allowed of course to the plaintiff upon a recovery in certain specified cases, and if this case falls within any of the classes there specified, it follows that there was no error in allowing the costs. The class within which it is claimed to fall is that designated in Subdivision 3 of that section, by words "actions of which a court of trial justice has no jurisdiction." The only question, therefore, is whether this was an action of which a court of trial justice has no jurisdiction. As we have seen, it was an action to recover damages for injury to personal property, in which the amount claimed exceeded the sum of $100. In Section 74 of the code we are told that "trial justices shall have civil jurisdiction in the following actions, and no others. * * * 2. An action for damages for injury to rights pertaining to the person, or the personal or real property, if the damages claimed do not exceed one hundred dollars, and in cases of bastardy." Hence, while the jurisdiction of a trial justice extends to certain actions for injury to personal property, by the express terms of the statute, it does not extend *to all such actions, but only to those in which "the damages claimed do not exceed one hundred dollars." We are compelled, therefore, by the express terms of this statute to say that this action, in which the damages claimed exceed $100, is an action of which a court of trial justice has no jurisdiction, and, therefore, under the provisions of Section 330, above quoted, the plaintiff, upon recovery, was entitled to costs. It may be, and doubtless is the fact, that cases can be found in other states which take a different view of similar statutory provisions, but these cases, however much they may be entitled to respect, are not binding upon us as authority, and we are unable to see how, in the face of the plain words of the code, we can put any other construction upon these words than the one we have adopted. And although it may be regarded by some as "strange legislation" to make the jurisdiction of a court to depend upon the amount a plaintiff may claim in his complaint, as has been suggested in the argument for appellants, we have only to say that it is not our province to legislate, or to supply any supposed deficiencies on the part of the law-making department of the government, even should there be no difference of opinion as to the existence of such deficiencies, but our duty is simply to declare the law as we find it written. We may add, however, that the view which we have adopted is in close analogy to the principles decided in the case of Scarborough v. Reynolds, 13 Rich. 98.

It is argued, however, that the act of March 4th, 1878, (16 Stat. 409,) amends Section 330 of the code by providing that in no case shall the plaintiff be allowed costs to an amount exceeding the amount of his verdict, and that as costs are to be regulated by the statute in force at the time the verdict is rendered, the plaintiff in this case could not be entitled to more costs than the amount of her verdict—$15—it having been rendered after the passage of said act.

Without expressing any opinion as to whether the statute in force at the time the verdict is rendered is to regulate the amount of the costs, it is sufficient to say that the act of March 4th, 1878, makes no change whatever in any part of Section 330, except in the fourth subdivision of that section, and that part of the section, to wit, Subdivision

3, under which the plaintiff claims *her costs in this case, remains as it was before, unaffected by the provisions of the act of March 4th, 1878. This is manifest from the terms used in that act. The language is: "That Subdivision 4 of Section 330 of the code of procedure, be amended by striking out all the words down to and including 'dollars' in the second line of said subdivision, and inserting the following," &c. Words could not make the intention plainer, that the sole purpose was to amend only the fourth subdivision of that section, leaving all the rest of the section as it was before.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLARD, C. J., and HASKELL, A. J., concurred.

(Case. No. 718.)

ADGER & CO. v. JOHN JULIUS PRINGLE et al.

(November Term, 1878.)

[1. Mortgages ⟸439.]

Making creditors of an ancestor parties defendant to an action brought by mortgagees of the heirs-at-law to subject the descended and subsequently-mortgaged real estate to sale, and to procure distribution of the proceeds, is a question of pleading and practice, and not of jurisdiction, and consent of parties is a waiver of objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1296; Dec. Dig. ⟸439.]

[2. Mortgages ⟸426.]

The creditors of the ancestor are proper parties to such action.

[3. Dismissal and Nonsuit ⟸59.]

After issue joined and testimony taken, the mere announcement by plaintiffs at a reference that they withdraw their claim as against some of the defendants will not operate as a dismissal of the complaint against such defendants.

[4. Payment ⟸24, 65.]

Whether a debt of the ancestor is discharged by the bond of the heirs is a question of fact depending upon intention. It is not payment, unless so accepted by the creditor, and the burden of proof is upon the party affirming it.

Before Wallace, J., at Charleston, March, 1878.

This was an action brought by Adger & Co. against the widow and children of J. J. I. Pringle, certain persons claiming to be bond creditors of the deceased, and certain creditors of the widow and children. The facts are clearly set forth in the report of G. D. Bryan, Esq., special referee. His report is as follows:

By an order of the said court, of date the day of , A. D. 1875, the above cause was referred to me to hear and determine the issues of fact and the issues of law raised therein, and report the findings thereon to the said court separately.

I find the following facts:

On the 11th of March, 1864, John Julius Izard Pringle departed this life, leaving as his heirs-at-law his widow, Mrs. Jane Pringle, his three sons, John Julius Pringle, Joel R. Poinsett Pringle and D. Lynch Pringle, and his daughter, Mary Izard Pringle (now Madame Mary Izard Des Frances); and seized of the following real estate, to wit: White House plantation, situated on the Pee Dee river, containing about two hundred and forty acres of swamp or rice land, and fifty acres of charred pine or rice land; and Greenfield plantation, situated on Black river, containing about one hundred acres of swamp or rice land, and one thousand nine hundred acres of pine or high land; and also of considerable personalty, consisting chiefly of negro slaves, which latter property was all lost by the results of the late war. By the last will of the said John J. I. Pringle, Mrs. Jane Pringle, his wife, was named as executrix, but no disposition was made of his property. Joel R. Poinsett Pringle was killed during the late war; he was unmarried and died intestate.

At the time of the death of the said John

Julius Izard Prin*gle, there was due from time to time to Alexander Robertson and John F. Blacklock, a bond in the penal sum of $7000, conditioned for the payment of the sum of $3500, and of date the 22d of January, 1856. This bond was, on the said 22d of January, 1856, assigned by the said Alexander Robertson and John F. Blacklock to Mrs. Mary C. Allston, and under her will was assigned by her executors, on the 23d of January, 1860, to Mrs. Anna J. Gadsden, one of the defendants herein. There was also due from the said John Julius Izard Pringle to Alexander Robertson and John F. Blacklock, as executors of Mrs. Mary C. Allston, a bond in the penal sum of $12,000, conditioned for the payment of the sum of $6000. Both of the bonds were destroyed or lost during the late war.

On the 10th of October, 1866, the defendants, Mrs. Jane Pringle, John Julius Pringle, D. Lynch Pringle, and Madame Mary Izard Des Frances (then Mary Izard Pringle,) being then the surviving heirs of the said John Julius Izard Pringle, made and delivered to the defendant, Mrs. Anna J. Gadsden, their joint and several bond, in the penal sum of $7000, conditioned to pay the full and just sum of $3500, in three equal annual installments, with interest from the 22d of January, 1865, which bond was given in substitution for and renewal of the bond of the said J. Julius Izard Pringle, lost or destroyed, as aforesaid. The interest on this bond has been paid up to the 22d of January, 1874.

On the 17th of February, 1867, the defendants, Mrs. Jane Pringle, John Julius Pringle, and D. Lynch Pringle, and Madame Mary Izard Des Frances (then Mary Izard Pringle,) the surviving heirs of John Julius Izard Pringle, made and delivered to Alexander Robertson and John F. Blacklock, executors of Mary C. Allston, their joint and several bond, in the penal sum of $12,000, conditioned for the payment of the full and just sum of $6000, in four equal successive annual installments, with interest payable annually—which bond was given in substitution for and renewal of the bond of the said John Julius Izard Pringle, lost or destroyed as aforesaid. This bond was thereafter assigned by the said Alexander Robertson and John *F. Flaklock, executors, to the defendants, Mary A. Lide and B. A. Lide.

After the death of the said John Julius Izard Pringle, his wife and children took possession of the plantations "Whitehouse" and "Greenfield," and planted them for the benefit of the estate, but, owing to large losses, no profits were derived therefrom. The money for this purpose was obtained from James R. Pringle, James R. Pringle & Son, and James R. Pringle & Co.

On the 31st of March, 1870, the defendants, Mrs. Jane Pringle, John Julius Pringle, D. Lynch Pringle, made and delivered to James R. Pringle, and James R. Pringle, the younger, under the firm name of James R. Pringle & Son, their joint and several bond, in the penal sum of $50,000, conditioned to pay the said James R. Pringle & Son the said sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as would repay, indemnify and hold harmless the said James R. Pringle & Son for and from any loss, for any then present, or any future loans or advances made by them to the said obligors, on their individual accounts, or on account of any then present or future loans or advances, and such interest thereon as might be agreed upon, as at that time had been or might thereafter be made, from time to time, by the said obligees, for or on account of Whitehouse plantation, Keithfield mills and Keithfield plantation, and Greenfield plantation, and the expenses, management, and cultivation of said plantations and mills, the amount of the indebtedness of the said obligors to the said obligees, whether on their individual account or on account of the said plantations and mill, to be ascertained at any time by reference to the books of account of the said obligees, James R. Pringle & Son. To secure the performance of the conditions and covenants in the said bond contained, the said obligors on the same day, to wit, the 31st of March, 1870, executed and delivered to the said James R. Pringle & Son a mortgage of all their right, title, interest and estate in and to the said Whitehouse and Greenfield plantations and Keithfield plantation and mills, which mortgage was duly recorded in the proper office.

On the same day, to wit, the 31st of March, 1870, the defendant, Madame Mary Izard Des Frances (then Mary I. Pringle,) made and delivered to the said James R.

Pringle & Son, her *bond in the sum of $5000, and thereby covenanting to save harmless the said James R. Pringle & Son from any loss which they might sustain for or on account of any then present or any future loans or advances, which they had or might make to her individually, or on account of her proportion, being two-ninths of any advances which had or might be made on account of the plantations known as Whitehouse and Greenfield—the said indebtedness to be ascertained by reference to the books of account of the said James R. Pringle & Son. To secure this bond she executed and delivered to the said James R. Pringle & Son a mortgage of all her right, title and interest and estate in and to the said two plantations, Whitehouse and Greenfield, which said mortgage was duly recorded. At the time of the execution and delivery of these two bonds and mortgages, the obligees, James R. Pringle & Son, knew that the bonds held by the defendants, Mrs. Anna J. Gadsden, Mrs. Mary A. Lide and B. A. Lide, as aforesaid, were unpaid, and were debts due by the estate of John Julius Izard Pringle. These two bonds and mortgages were, on the 11th day of August, 1871, assigned to the plaintiffs, James Adger & Co., by James R. Pringle & Son, and were taken by the said plaintiffs at a valuation of $30,000, which was about the amount of the indebtedness of the obligors to James R. Pringle & Son, as appeared from their books of account, and which was ascertained at that time by the plaintiffs, James Adger & Co. The consideration of the assignment was loans and endorsements made by the plaintiffs to and for James R. Pringle & Son. The bonds and mortgages have ever since been held by the plaintiffs.

The said James R. Pringle and James R. Pringle, the younger, continued their business under their firm name of James R. Pringle & Son, until the 8th day of May, 1872, when the partnership was dissolved by the death of James R. Pringle, the younger. At that time the obligors of the said bonds were indebted to the said firm, as follows:

Mrs. Jane Pringle	$ 1,704 10
Est. J. J. Pringle, (Whitehouse)	21,012 82
Keithfield Mills	6,186 80
Keithfield Plantation	15,435 60
	$44,339 32

*And to the credit of the said obligors, as follows:

John Julius Pringle	$ 9 78
D. Lynch Pringle	258 28
Greenfield Plantation	264 83
		$ 332 89
Leaving a balance due of		$43,806 43

of which amount $4610.66 is chargeable to Madame Mary Izard Des Frances.

James R. Pringle continued business under the firm name of James R. Pringle & Son, and on the 10th of April, 1873, the defendants, Mrs. Jane Pringle, John Julius Pringle, and D. Lynch Pringle, made and delivered to him, doing business under the said firm name of James R. Pringle & Son, their joint and several bond in the sum of $50,000, with the same conditions and covenants as were contained in their bond of date the 31st of March, 1870, to the then firm of James R. Pringle & Son, and as are above set forth; and to secure the performance of the conditions of this bond, made their mortgage of the same property as is described in this first mortgage to the said James R. Pringle & Son, of date 31st of March, 1870, and above set forth. On the same day, to wit, the 10th of April, 1873, Madame Mary Izard Des Frances, (then Mary Izard Pringle,) made and delivered to the said James R. Pringle, doing business under the firm name of James R. Pringle & Son, her bond, in the sum of $8000, with the same conditions and covenants as were contained in her bond of date the 31st of March, 1870, to the then firm of James R. Pringle & Son, as are above set forth, and to secure the performance of the conditions of the said bond, made her mortgage of all her right, title and interest in and to the said Greenfield and Whitehouse plantations. These mortgages were recorded in the proper office, and were immediately upon their execution and delivery assigned to James Adger & Co., the plaintiffs, together with the debts due thereunder, and have ever since been held by them. James R. Pringle continued business under the said firm name of James R. Pringle & Son, until the 1st of September, 1873, when the firm ceased to exist; at which time the obligees of the said bonds were indebted to him as follows:

*John Julius Pringle	$ 84	58
Est. J. J. I. Pringle	25,465	26
Mrs. Jane Pringle	768	05
Keithfield Mills	14,588	90
Keithfield Plantations	22,450	52
Greenfield Plantation	1,069	01
	$64,426	39
And to the credit of D. Lynch Pringle	131	79
Leaving a balance due of	$64,294	51

Of which the sum of $4,896.50 is due and owing by the defendant, Madame Mary Izard Des Frances.

On the 29th of December, 1870, the defendants, Mrs. Jane Pringle, John Julius Pringle, D. Lynch Pringle, and Madame Mary Izard Des Frances, (then Mary Izard Pringle,) being indebted to James R. Pringle & Son, on the books of the said firm, in the sum of $36,851.18, made their promissory note at six months, for the sum of $6,500, to Jas. R. Pringle, for the purpose of raising money, or of lightening the said account. The note was not credited on the account. On the 13th of April, 1871, this note was, with other securities, delivered by Jas. R. Pringle & Son to the defendant, A. G. Rice, as collateral to secure their note to him for the sum of $28,427.91, at twelve months from said 13th of April, 1871. The defendant, A. G. Rice, did not know of the bonds of indemnity, nor of the mortgages securing the same, nor did he know the consideration or purpose for which the note for $6,500 had been given to James R. Pringle.

Before the commencement of this action, an agreement was made by the counsel for the plaintiffs and the counsel for the defendants, Mrs. Mary A. Lide, B. N. Lide, Mrs. Anna J. Gadsden, A. G. Rice and J. M. Eason & Bro., whereby, among other things, it was agreed that they "the undersigned, creditors, claiming an interest, under or by way of mortgage upon certain plantations in Georgetown county, known as Keithfield mills and plantation and Greenfield and Whitehouse plantation, owned by Mrs. Pringle and her sons and daughter, do consent and agree, *in view of the failure during the past year to make any payment on our respective debts, that an immediate action for foreclosure and sale of the said property be commenced by Messrs. James Adger & Co., in the Court of Common Pleas for Charleston county, in which we may all be made parties or come before the court, and in which all conflicting claims may be adjudicated. * * * This agreement to be without prejudice to the rights of any party interested." A copy of this agreement, and a copy of the testimony from which the foregoing facts appear, is filed with this report.

The property which is the subject of this action, has been sold under the order of this court, and brought the following sums, to wit:

Keithfield Mills and Plantation	$10,005 00
Greenfield Plantation	4,050 00
Whitehouse	6,900 00
	$20,955 00

The proceeds of which have been applied under the orders of this court as follows:

Sheriff's commissions on Keithfield Mills and Plantation	$ 104	05
Advertising sale of same	27	20
Taxes on same	299	49
Paid B. H. Rutledge, trustee, and Mrs. Sarah Goodrich	9,574	26
	$10,005	00

Sheriff's commissions on Greenfield and Whitehouse	$ 117	00
Advertising sale of same	54	49
Taxes on same	246	83
Recording mortgage	3	25
	$ 421	48

Leaving in the referee's hands the sum of $10,528.52 and interest, from the sale of Greenfield and Whitehouse plantations.

*The following are the issues of law:

I. The defendant, A. G. Rice, claims that he is entitled to be first paid out of the proceeds of sale of Greenfield and Whitehouse plantations the sum of $6500, with interest from the 29th of June 1871, on the ground that the plaintiffs hold the mortgages as trustees for the payment of the note held by him; the transfer of the note to him by Pringle & Son, carrying with it the equitable assignment of so much of the account due by the Pringles to Pringle & Son, secured by the bonds of indemnity. The whole theory of the claim is based on the supposition that Pringle & Son were the sureties of the Pringle family (the makers of the note,) and that the defendant, Rice, is entitled to any securities which the surety might hold, upon the failure of the principal to pay the debt. The note was given either in payment of so much of the account as stood against the makers on the books of Pringle & Son, or to enable Pringle & Son to raise money. If for the payment of the account, then so much as it represented was extinguished; and if extinguished, there could have been not only no equitable assignment, but no legal assignment of the same. As matters of law, I find that if the note was given as representing any portion of the accounts due by the Pringles to Pringle & Son, it was in payment of the same, made so by the subsequent transfer to the defendant, A. G. Rice; for by this act they put the note out of their possession and beyond their control, and thereby extinguished that portion of the account which it represented. Although the receiving of a note is not payment, unless received as such, yet if the creditor place the note beyond his power and control, so that it cannot be delivered up to be canceled, the note is payment and the original cause of action is extinguished. Townsend & Arnold v. Stevenson & Walker, 4 Rich. 59. And the same rule was made in the case of Chastain v. Johnson, Adm'r, 2 Bail. 575. So, then, if the note represented any portion of the account then due, the parting with it by Pringle & Son operated as a payment. But if the note was given to James R. Pringle for the purpose of raising money, and not with reference to the account, it was an independent transaction, and in no way connected with the bonds of indemnity now held by the plaintiffs; and if not connected, *then there can be no equity by which the defendant, Rice, can maintain his claim that the bonds are held by the plaintiffs as trustees for him.

The conditions and covenants of the bonds are too plain to leave any doubt on this point, for they were solely to save harmless Pringle & Son for any moneys which they might advance to the obligors on their individual accounts, or on account of their planting operations, under neither of which could the note be placed—if an independent transaction between them—and certainly Adger & Co., the assignees, who took these bonds at a valuation obtained from the books of account of Pringle & Son (which were made the standard of value by the obligators), the equity (if any) of the defendant, Rice, cannot prevail.

Besides this, the bonds of indemnity were not given to Pringle & Son as sureties, but as principals, and they dealt with them as such when they transferred them to Adger & Co. for the sum of $30,000, since ascertained, by a sale of the property, to be three times their value. And, in purchasing the bonds and mortgages, Adger & Co. ascertained the sums due thereunder by referring to the accounts of the obligors, in all respects complying with the contract between the parties as contained in the said bonds.

The claim of the defendant, Rice, must therefore be disallowed.

The defendants, J. M. Eason & Bro., Smith & Valk, Bollman Bros., and Edwin Bates & Co. make similar claims. These claims stand on even more untenable grounds than that of the defendant, Rice, for the debts were contracted after the assignment of the bonds and mortgages to Adger & Co., and after the securities had been exhausted by Pringle & Son, and until paid, and they were not a charge by Pringle & Son against the obligors of the bonds. Wright v. Whitney, 40 Barb. 325.

These claims are therefore not allowed.

II. On behalf of the defendants Mrs. Mary A. Lide, B. N. Lide and Mrs. Anna J. Gadsden, it is claimed, that holding debts against the ancestor of the obligors of the bonds (his heirs) they have a statutory lien, which should be satisfied before the bonds of indemnity given by the heirs, and secured by the property descended, are paid.

I have been unable to find any authority for the position *taken by these defendants. On the contrary, the statute expressly provides that when the lands are bona fide aliened, set over or transferred by the heir before action brought against him, the descended lands shall not be liable to an execution issued or a judgment obtained against him on account of a debt due by his ancestor, but that the heir shall be liable to the extent of the value of the lands so aliened. This, then, is entirely inconsistent with the idea that the creditor of the ancestor has a lien, statutory or otherwise, upon his lands in or out of the possession of the heir. The creditor can, in a proper suit brought against the heir in possession, or against the executor or administrator, if the heir be out of possession, subject the real estate of the ancestor to the payment of his debt; but beyond this the law gives him no power or lien over or on the lands of his deceased debtor, and if the heir alien, before such suit is brought, the creditor can recover, not from the purchaser, but only from the heir, the value of the lands so aliened. In this case the heirs of John Julius Izard Pringle, bona fide, and for a valuable consideration, mortgaged the lands descended, and this brings us to an issue made, and upon the determination of which the claims of Mrs. Mary A. Lide, B. N. Lide and Mrs. Anna J. Gadsden depend, to wit: Is a mortgage by the heir, before suit brought against him, such an alienation of his ancestors' real estate as would prevent the same being taken on execution, on a judgment recovered against the heir in possession, upon a debt due by his ancestor?

Upon the death of John Julius Izard Pringle, the fee to his real estate passed into his heirs-at-law, his widow, two sons and daughter, and they certainly had the right (until suit brought by a creditor of his) to deal with it as their own. If they had conveyed the property absolutely, for a valuable consideration and bona fide, to Pringle & Son, there could have been no question between the defendants, Mrs. Lide, B. N. Lide and Mrs. Gadsden, and the purchasers. But by the mortgages, though the lands were not absolutely conveyed, the heirs did sell, alien and make over to Pringle & Son certain estate in the lands, which they could not again recover except upon the compliance with certain conditions. For this Pringle & Son have given a valu*able consideration, and, so far as that consideration extends, stand on the same footing as if they had absolutely purchased the land. Mortgagees are purchasers pro tanto, and as such are entitled as against the creditors of the ancestor and his legatees. Haynsworth v. Bischoff, 6 S. C. 159; Ex parte L. A. Seabrook, U. S. C. C., Dist. of S. C., April Term, 1871 [not reported]. I therefore find that Adger & Co., the assignees of the mortgagees, are entitled to be first paid out of the proceeds of the sale of Greenfield and Whitehouse plantations.

The claims of Mrs. Mary A. Lide, B. N. Lide and Mrs. Anna J. Gadsden, having been disallowed, it is unnecessary here to consider the question of jurisdiction made by the defendant, Rice, as to them.

The proceeds of the sale of Greenfield and Whitehouse plantations, and Keithfield mills and plantation, being insufficient to pay the mortgages held by the plaintiffs, the defendants, Marie Yean, Edmond Colas Des Frances, and Mary Izard, his wife, have no interest therein under the marriage settlement as set forth in the complaint in this cause.

I find that the plaintiffs, James Adger & Co., are entitled to the proceeds of sale of Greenfield and Whitehouse plantations, and after the payment of the bonds, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, held by B. H. Rutledge, trustee, and Mrs. Sarah M. Goodrich, are entitled to the proceeds of Keithfield mills and plantation.

To this report exceptions were taken by the defendant, A. G. Rice, and also by the defendants, Mrs. Lide and Miss Gadsden. The decree of his Honor the Circuit judge is as follows:

After hearing the report of George D. Bryan, Esq., referee herein, and the argument of counsel, it is ordered that the findings of facts by the referee be confirmed.

John Julius Izard Pringle, in his lifetime, executed the two bonds, described in the record as the Gadsden and Lide bonds. These bonds were destroyed by fire after the death of the obligor.

The referee finds, as matters of fact, that for these bonds other bonds were executed by all the heirs of the original obligor, and that these new bonds were in substitution of the original bonds, *and were not accepted by the holders in payment of the original bonds.

I concur with the referee in this finding. It follows that the Gadsden and Lide bonds are a charge upon the estate of J. J. I. Pringle. See Drake, Clerk, v. Mitchell, 3 East. 251; McLure v. Askew, 5 Rich. Eq. 166.

The heirs of John Julius Izard Pringle, on the 31st of March, 1870, executed a bond to James R. Pringle & Son, secured by a mortgage of all the real estate that had descended to them as such heirs. Are the Gadsden and Lide bonds postponed, in the order of payment, to this bond and mortgage?

James R. Pringle himself testifies that he knew of the existence of the bonds, both before and after the substitution of the new bonds. He certainly, therefore, cannot bring himself within the rule that protects an innocent purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. Nor is his assignee on a better footing. James R. Pringle says, "I transferred them [the bond and mortgage] to Adger & Co. because I owed them money, and because they had endorsed for me." Adger & Co., therefore, did not take the bond and mortgage for cash paid to Pringle, but to cover an antecedent indebtedness of Pringle to them, and took them, therefore, with the same rights under them that Pringle had, and no more.

I therefore find, as matter of law, that the Gadsden and Lide bonds are not postponed to the bonds and mortgages to James R. Pringle & Son, and assigned by them to James Adger & Co.

The defendant, A. G. Rice, is the holder of a promissory note, made by the same persons who executed the above-mentioned bond and mortgage to James R. Pringle & Son. This note was made payable to James R. Pringle, endorsed by him to James R. Pringle & Son, and endorsed by them to A. G. Rice, on the 13th of April, 1871, as a collateral.

At the time this note was made, the makers were lawfully indebted to James R. Pringle & Son for advances. To secure payment for these advances, the bond and mortgage above referred to had been executed on the 31st of March, 1870. The note was given to enable James R. Pringle & Son "to raise money and lighten the account" of the makers. There was no *other consideration for the note. The note therefore represented the account pro tanto, and, while in the hands of James R. Pringle & Son, was protected by the bond and mortgage, as he had his remedy either upon the account or note, as he might elect. When he endorsed the note to Rice, the account pro tanto, in a sense, was extinguished; that is, James R. Pringle & Son no longer had any remedy upon that part of the account represented by the note endorsed to Rice, simply because they had transferred to Rice a remedy to collect an amount of money represented both by the account and note, and as the debtors could be compelled to pay it only once, it would be a fraud upon Rice to allow Pringle to collect the account and leave the note in Rice's hands, valueless. It cannot be said that the account, to the amount of the note, was finally and forever extinguished in the sense of having been paid, for if Pringle & Son had paid the note to Rice, and resumed possession and ownership of it, their remedies upon the account would have instantly revived.

The account, therefore, was not extinguished in the sense of being paid, by the transfer of the note to Rice; and as the note represented a part of the debt secured by the bond and mortgage, the note is still protected by the bond and mortgage, after its endorsement to Rice, and in his hands. Wright v. Eaves, 10 Rich. Eq. 585, and authorities there cited.

Rice's equities are not altered by the subsequent assignment of the bond and mortgage to Adger & Co. The bond and mortgage were given to secure the whole account of the Pringle family. The debt to be secured was the account. The amount of the condition of the bond was to be ascertained by the books of Pringle & Son.

Suppose the Pringle family, instead of making a note, had paid James R. Pringle & Son $6000 in cash, and the credit had not been entered on the books of the firm. It will hardly be contended that, as against any assignee of the bond, the obligors would not have been allowed to set up the credit. So if the books mislead an assignee, it is the fault of Pringle & Son, and the assignee takes the bond and mortgage subject to what the books ought to show, and this is more especially so when he takes these securities to cover an antecedent debt and of the assignor.

*The debt of the Pringles to James R. Pringle & Son, being in effect part of the bond secured by the mortgage, and a part of the debt being endorsed to Rice, and the remainder assigned to Adger & Co., Rice's claim and the claim of Adger & Co. rest on the same plane. Neither has any priority of the other, and must be paid ratably out of any funds remaining after the satisfaction of the Gadsden and Lide bonds.

It is needless to discuss, in this decree, the rights of the other creditors of the Pringle family. The whole fund in court will be exhausted by the claims, the priorities of which have been above discussed. Nor is it necessary to discuss the propriety of dismissing the complaint, as to the holders of the Gadsden and Lide bonds.

They were made parties to the suit originally. The whole estate of John Julius Izard Pringle has been sold by the order of this court and by consent of parties. The fund realized from the sale is, in effect, in court. To dismiss the complaint now as to the holders of these bonds, and to divide the fund in court among the remaining parties, would be to defeat utterly the claims of parties who have the first and highest demand against the estate.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the referee, George D. Bryan, Esq., do pay out of any funds in his hands, realized from the sale of the Whitehouse and Greenfield plantations, sold as the property of the estate of the late John Julius Izard Pringle, the principal and interest due upon the Gadsden and Lide bonds. If there should not be sufficient funds in his hands to fully pay and satisfy said bonds, then they are to be paid ratably and in proportion.

If there should be any part of said funds remaining in his hands after the payment of the bonds aforesaid, then that he do pay such balance to the debt secured by the bonds and mortgages assigned to Adger & Co., that is to say, upon the note held by A. G. Rice, and the balance of the account assigned to James Adger & Co., these two demands to be paid ratably and in proportion.

From this decree the plaintiffs appealed, upon the following grounds:

*1. Because his Honor the presiding judge has erred in decreeing that the bonds of the testator, John Julius Pringle, once held by the defendants, Ann J. Gadsden and Mary A. Lide, are subsisting debts of his estate.

2. Because his Honor has further erred in decreeing that the said bonds, even if they be subsisting debts of the estate of John Julius Pringle, are entitled to be paid out of the proceeds of sale of the plantations, known as "Whitehouse" and "Greenfield," in priority to the bond and mortgage held by the plaintiff herein.

3. Because his Honor has further erred in decreeing that the note held by the defendant, A. G. Rice, is protected by the bonds and mortgages of the heirs of Pringle, assigned by Pringle & Son to the plaintiffs, and that said note is entitled to be paid ratably with the claim of the plaintiff.

The defendant, A. G. Rice, also appealed upon the following grounds:

1. From the portion of the decree which orders that the findings of fact by the referee be confirmed, because there was no evidence to sustain the finding of the referee that "the bonds held by Mary Alston Lide and Ann J. Gadsden were given in substitution and renewal of the bond of John Julius Izard Pringle, which had been lost or destroyed," and no evidence to sustain the finding of the decree that "the new bonds were not accepted by the holders in payment of the original bonds;" and also because the issue of whether said bonds were so given and accepted was not among the issues made by the pleadings or submitted to the referee by the order of reference.

2. That the conclusion of his Honor, as following from facts so assumed, "that the Gadsden and Lide bonds are a charge upon the estate of J. J. I. Pringle," has no proper basis for a decree upon pleadings and evidence, and is erroneous as a conclusion of law.

3. That James R. Pringle did not testify as a matter of fact, as stated in the decree, "that he knew of the existence of the bonds both before and after the substitution of the new bonds," and that his statement in regard to said bonds does not sustain the finding of the court below, either as matter of fact or conclusion of law.

*4. That the decree is erroneous, in finding as matter of law that the Gadsden and Lide bonds are not postponed to the bonds and mortgages to James R. Pringle & Son.

5. That the decree is erroneous, in adjudging that the claim of Rice and the claim of Adger & Co., rest on the same plane, and that the claim of Rice has not priority over that of Adger & Co.

6. That the complaint should have been dismissed as to the defendants, Lide and Gadsden; and the decree is erroneous in holding that such dismissal would put the claims of said defendants in any worse plight than they were in before the sale, or would have been in if no sale had been made.

7. That the decree is erroneous, in ordering the referee to pay the Lide and Gadsden bonds out of the proceeds of the property mortgaged by defendants, who have been in undisputed possession and ownership both prior and subsequently to their alienation of the same.

Mr. A. T. Smythe, for plaintiffs.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, for defendant, Rice.

Mr. T. M. Hanckel, for Miss Gadsden.

Messrs. Lord & Inglesby, for Mrs. Lide.

April 18th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. The first question which we propose to consider is, whether the objection raised by the appellant, A. G. Rice, to the making of Mrs. Lide and Miss Gadsden parties, can be sustained. This objection, it is to be observed, was not raised by any pleading, but was for the first time, taken in the argument before the referee. It is based upon the ground that the action was brought simply for foreclosure of the several mortgages mentioned in the complaint, and that to such an action these persons, whose only claim is that of creditors of the ancestor of the mortgagors, could not be made parties. We do not consider, however, that this position can be sustained, for the reason upon which it rests is not, in our judgment, well founded. *We do not regard the action as brought simply for the foreclosure of the mortgages. The agreement entered into by the several parties, through their attorneys, prior to the commencement of the action, the terms of which were substantially set forth in the complaint, together with the demand for relief, show very clearly that such was not the sole purpose of the action. It is very obvious that the numerous creditors of the Pringles saw that in any attempt to enforce their demands, whether against the ancestor or the heirs, many conflicting claims were likely to arise, which it would be necessary to have determined, and with a view to avoid multiplicity of suits and heavy expenses, they entered into the agreement above referred to. In pursuance of this agreement we find that the complaint states the claims of the various creditors, and prays judgment not merely for a foreclosure of the several mortgages, as in a case brought simply for that purpose, but also that the proceeds of the sales of the mortgaged property, after satisfying the costs and taxes, be applied "to the payment of the amounts of principal and interest due on the bonds and mortgages held by the plaintiffs, and the claims of the parties defendants, according to their relative priorities, and so far as the same may be established before this honorable court." Accordingly an order was granted, by consent of the attorneys of the several parties, for the sale of the mortgaged premises, in which it was provided that the proceeds of the sale, after paying costs and expenses, should be turned over to the referee, "to be distributed by him under the further orders of this court." This order also provided that until such sale should be effected the property should be placed in the hands of certain designated persons, to be planted and managed by them, and, after paying the expenses of such operations and the advances made for cultivating crops, &c., that the net proceeds be held "subject to the orders of this court, and to be distributed among the several parties hereto, as their several rights may appear."

While, therefore, one of the purposes of the action was to obtain judgment of foreclosure and sale, another was to have the various conflicting claims of the creditors adjudicated in this one action; and while these questions were in process of adjudication, the property, which was represented to be deteriorating in value *and yielding no returns, was sold by the consent of all parties, and the proceeds representing such property was retained in the hands of the court, to be distributed or applied in accordance with the judgment of the court as to the relative priorities of the several claimants. The action may, therefore, be regarded as more in the nature of a creditor's bill, though not strictly such, rather than as an ordinary action to foreclose a mortgage of real estate, and so regarded all the grounds upon which it is contended that Mrs. Lide and Miss Gadsden were not proper parties, are clearly untenable. We think, therefore, that the objection raised by the appellant, Rice, even were it originally maintainable, comes too late, for we do not regard it as a question of jurisdiction, but rather as a question of pleading and practice, and, as such, consent of parties operates as a waiver of objections, which, otherwise, might be unanswerable.

But, as the counsel for the appellant, Rice, contended so earnestly against the idea that the agreement, above referred to, should be regarded as a consent on his part to the making of improper parties, we will not rest our decision upon the effect of such agreement. We are satisfied that, even in the absence of any such agreement, Mrs. Lide and Miss Gadsden were proper, though not necessary parties to the action. There can be no doubt that all prior, as well as subsequent encumbrancers, while not necessary are proper parties to an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage of real estate, and in order that the land may produce its full value at the sale sought by such action for foreclosure, it is desirable that such encumbrancers should be made parties, for, if the prior encumbrancers are not made parties, the purchaser takes his title subject to the lien of such encumbrancers; and if the subsequent encumbrancers are not made parties, the purchaser buys subject to the right of such encumbrancers to redeem by paying off the antecedent encumbrances. Now, while a bond creditor of an ancestor cannot be said to have a lien, in the proper sense of that term, upon land in the hands of the heirs, inherited from the ancestor, yet he does have the right, by proper proceedings, to subject such land to the payment of his debt, and this right is called, in Jones v. Wightman, 2 Hill 583, "a constructive lien;" in Richardson v. Chappell, 6 S. C. 155–6, *"a charge;" and in Rogers v. Huggins, 6 S. C. 362, "an encumbrance." The same principle, therefore, upon which it has been held that a prior encumbrancer is a proper party to an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage of real estate, would seem to justify the making of a bond creditor of an ancestor a party to an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage on real estate descended, executed by the heir, the object in both cases being the same—to free the land from any lien or "charge," or "constructive lien," or "encumbrance," so that the purchaser, obtaining a perfectly clear title, may be induced to bid the full value of the land.

It is true that it has been held, in the case of Corning v. Smith, 6 N. Y. 85, "that a person who claims title to the mortgaged premises, paramount to that of the mortgagor, cannot be made a party to an action to foreclose the mortgage in order that the validity of such title may be tried in such action." But whether this decision rested upon the idea which at one time prevailed, that even under the code it would be improper to unite in one action an application for legal relief with one for equitable relief, which, however, has since been repudiated, (see comments on Reuben v. Joel, 13 N. Y. 488; in the subsequent case of New York Ice Company v. Northwest Insurance Company 359, and Pomeroy on Remedies 95, § 76,) it is necessary for us now to inquire, as the persons who are objected to here as improper parties do not claim title to the mortgaged premises adverse to that of the mortgagor, but only claim a right to subject such premises to the payment of their debt, by reason of the fact that it has descended to the mortgagor, subject to a charge for such debt. In other words, they only claim as prior encumbrancers, as it were, by virtue of their constructive lien, as it has been called. We think, therefore, that, aside from any agreement among the parties, Mrs. Lide and Miss Gadsden were proper parties to this action.

The fact that the plaintiffs, after the commencement of the action, announced at one of the references that they "withdrew their claim as against Mrs. Mary A. Lide, B. N. Lide and Miss Anna J. Gadsden," cannot, in our opinion, have the effect contended for, of dismissing complaint as to these parties. This announcement was, doubtless, designed as nothing more than an *admission of the validity of the claims of Mrs. Lide and Miss Gadsden, and a declaration that they declined further to contest them, and it can have no other effect, so far as the question we are considering is concerned. What the effect may be, if, as is contended, they are trustees for Rice, so far as their duties and liabilities to their cestui que trust are concerned, we are not now called upon to consider. The plaintiffs certainly could not, of their own motion, at that stage of the case, probably after the land had been sold, dismiss the complaint as to these parties, and thereby imperil, if not defeat, their right to go either upon the land or the proceeds of the sale for the satisfaction of their debts.

The rule in equity is that it is within the discretion of the court to refuse a plaintiff permission to dismiss his bill if the dismissal would work a prejudice to the other parties; and whenever, in the progress of a cause, a defendant entitles himself to a decree, either against the plaintiff or a co-defendant, and the dismissal of the bill would subject him to the expense and trouble of bringing a new suit and making his proofs anew, such dismissal will not be permitted. Bank v. Rose, 1 Rich. Eq. 292; Ancker v. Levy, 3 Strob. Eq. 210.

We propose next to inquire whether the bonds held by Mrs. Lide and Miss Gadsden are mere renewals of the original bonds of the ancestor, or whether such original bonds have been paid or extinguished by the taking of the bonds of the heirs. This, in our judgment, is mainly a question of fact. The rule of law is well established that where a creditor takes an obligation of inferior or equal rank, it does not extinguish, ipso facto, the prior obligation, as that only is payment which is intended and accepted as payment. Hence, when a creditor takes a new bond, "in substitution or renewal" of a bond previously held by him, which has been lost or destroyed, the original debt or obligation is not extinguished unless it is made to appear that the creditor accepted such new bond in payment, and the burden of proof is upon him who asserts the fact that the new bond was taken in payment. This doctrine is so fully supported by the authorities in this state that it is only necessary to refer to a few of the cases: Kelsey v. Rosborough, 2

Rich. 244; Fraser v. Hext, 2 Strob. Eq. 258. These cases are entirely consistent with the *subsequent cases of McLure v. Askew, 5 Rich. Eq. 162, and Kirkland v. Cureton, 4 S. C. 122, for, though the substituted securities were, in both of the last-named cases held to have operated as a satisfaction or extinguishment of the original debts, yet in both of them the decision was placed distinctly upon the ground that the evidence showed that the papers substituted were accepted in payment of the original debts. So that so far from weakening, they strengthen the authority of the preceding cases.

The question of fact having been decided by the referee, and his decision having been confirmed by the Circuit judge, their decision must be regarded by us as conclusive, unless it is without any testimony to sustain it, or is manifestly against the weight of the evidence, neither of which is the case in the present instance.

The Lide and Gadsden bonds must, therefore, be regarded as representing the debts of the ancestor, and, as was decided in the recent case of Simons v. Bryce, 10 S. C. 354, are entitled to priority of payment out of the funds now in the hands of the court arising from the sales of the Whitehouse and Greenfield plantations. As it appears, from the report of the referee, that these funds will not be sufficient to pay these bonds in full, it is scarcely necessary to consider the questions raised between the plaintiffs and the defendant, Rice, as they are not now of any practical importance. We may say, however, that we are disposed to agree with the Circuit judge in the view which he has taken of these questions.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Before Mackey, J., at Oconee, March, 1878.

The opinion of the court states the whole case.

Mr. J. J. Norton, for appellant.

Messrs. W. C. Keith and S. P. Dendy, for respondent.

April 18th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. This was an action on a sealed note assigned to the plaintiff for value. The note was admitted, but payment pleaded, it being alleged in the answer that the original payee, the assignor, had given a receipt in full to one of the defendants, but that the receipt had been lost, mislaid or destroyed. At the trial Robert Powell offered to prove that he had in his "possession a receipt signed by E. Hughes, the payee of the note, who was dead at the time of the trial, in full thereof, but that the receipt was now lost. Plaintiff objected to the competency of the witness to testify in regard to the receipt. The court overruled the objection and plaintiff excepted." That is the case as stated by the appellant. If Robert Powell had in his actual possession, at the time of the trial, a receipt in full from E. Hughes, it cannot be for a moment contemplated that he would have been prevented by Section 415 from putting it in evidence, but he would have been obliged to prove the handwriting by another person, or by other testimony than his own. But the paper, after being proved, would testify in regard to itself. If, however, such receipt had been lost, Section 415 has nothing to do with proof of the loss. Proof of the loss is no evidence of the contents of the paper, and, therefore, cannot be evidence "in *regard to any transaction or communication." And, by the law of evidence, as it stood prior to the admission of any parties in interest to testify in their own behalf, a party in interest was generally allowed to prove the loss of an instrument in writing, after due notice, &c., and after proof of its previous existence, because, by the nature of things, he alone could prove such a fact, when, as was usually the case, the loss was out of his own custody. 1 Greenl., § 349. The law is unchanged in this respect by the code. That is to say, it is returned to the condition in which it was prior to the act of 1866, excluding no witness on account of interest. The defendant, therefore, had a right to testify as to the loss of the receipt, but he had no right to be a witness to prove the contents of the receipt. The object of the proof of the loss is to let in secondary evidence of the contents of the paper, which, if in possession of the owner, would speak for itself; such secondary evidence cannot be given by a witness to whom Section 415 of the code will apply, for a receipt is unquestionably a transaction between the parties interested in it, and there would be no difference between proving the contents of such a paper lost, and amplifying or explaining the contents of such a paper in existence. In fact, the reasons against the former are much stronger than against the latter. In the case before us, however, the exception was taken even to the proof of the loss of the paper, and not solely to the proof of the contents, or, to say the least, the distinction is not clearly drawn, the words being "plaintiff objected to the competency of the witness to testify in regard to the receipt." Certainly the witness was competent to prove several important facts with regard to the paper. The demand was that he should be excluded altogether. If objection had been made to his proving the contents of the paper, (after proof of the loss,) such objection to the witness may have been sustained by the judge. The point, however, was not made. It is possible that after proof of the loss the defendant may have been able, had he been excluded, to produce other and admissible secondary evidence.

Under the circumstances the judgment must be affirmed.

Motion refused.

(November Term, 1878.)

[1. Guardian and Ward ⇐43.]

A guardian has no power to sell a bond and mortgage belonging to the estate of his ward. Cases reviewed.

The court will not confirm a sale of a ward's property made by his guardian without authority, which has not proved advantageous to the ward, and where it appears that the purchaser paid in part with a debt due to him by the guardian individually, and there is no evidence to disprove the suspicion reasonably suggested by the attendant circumstances that the whole amount was to be used by the guardian, then largely in debt, for his own purposes.

Before Townsend, J., at Marion, July, 1875.

This was an action by A. Q. McDuffie, as assignee of R. H. Reaves, against R. C. McIntyre, Knight Gibson and his wife, Eliza E., (formerly Eliza E. Black) and H. McClenaghan, administrator of C. H. Black, deceased.

The case is fully stated in the Circuit decree, which is as follows:

This is an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage. The plaintiff in his complaint alleges the execution of the bond and mortgage, certain payments made thereon, the assignment of the bond and mortgage to him, and the breach of the condition of the bond, and prays for a sale of the mortgaged premises. The plaintiff further alleges that he is informed that certain parties claim that the assignment to him of the bond and mortgage was wrongful and should not be sustained, and that they are entitled to the property or the proceeds of the sale. He asserts that the claim is unfounded, and has brought the parties before the court, and asks for an adjudication of their rights.

The defendant, R. C. McIntyre, has made no answer to the complaint.

The answer of Knight Gibson and Eliza E., his wife, by N. S. Gibson, guardian ad litem, admits the execution of the bond and mortgage, the assignment of the same to R. H.

Reaves as guar*dian, and the death of Charles C. Black, leaving as his heirs-at-law, C. Henry Black and Eliza E., wife of Knight Gibson, and the death of C. Henry Black, and the granting of letters of administration upon his estate to Horatio McClenaghan.

The defendants further say that they have no knowledge respecting the amounts paid on the bond, or whether the assignment to the plaintiff was for full value, and submit, if such arrangement was made, R. H. Reaves, as lawful guardian, had no lawful authority to do so, and deny that the plaintiff is the lawful owner and holder thereof.

They further allege that at and before the date of the alleged assignment, it was known to the plaintiff that R. H. Reaves held the said bond and mortgage as the property of Eliza E. Gibson, and he received the same with full notice of the trust attaching thereto.

They further insist that the property and title of Eliza Gibson and Charles Black in and to the said bond and mortgage was not divested, or any way affected by such transfer and assignment. The defendants do not object to a foreclosure of the mortgage and a sale of the land, but insist that they are entitled to the proceeds.

The answer of Horatio McClenaghan is substantially the same as that of Knight Gibson and his wife, Eliza E.

At the hearing of the cause, a judgment of foreclosure and sale was rendered. The question who will be entitled to the proceeds of sale, was submitted for the decision of the court, and this is the only one remaining for consideration.

Testimony was offered, and argument of counsel heard on the question.

For a proper understanding of the case, the facts as admitted and proved should be stated.

In December, 1856, the bond and mortgage in question were executed by R. C. McIntyre to secure the payment of the purchase money of land sold by the then commissioner in equity, in pursuance of an order of the court, belonging to the defendants Eliza E. Gibson and her brother, Charles C. Black, both of whom were minors. Robert H. Reaves was soon after duly appointed guardian of the minors. On the 13th day of February, *1857, an order was made by the court of equity, directing the commissioner in equity to pay over the proceeds of the sale to R. H. Reaves, general guardian of the infants. On the 27th day of March, 1860, after the first installment due on the bond had been paid by R. C. McIntyre, C. D. Evans, commissioner, assigned and transferred the bond and mortgage to R. H. Reaves, in the following words: "For value received, I transfer the following bond and mortgage to R. H. Reaves." On the fifth day of June, 1860, R. H. Reaves assigned and transferred the said bond and mortgage for value received to A. Q. McDuffie. The bond of R. C. McIntyre was dated on ——— day of December, 1856, and payable in four equal annual installments, with interest payable annually from the 5th day of May, 1856. The first installment and interest was paid to C. D. Evans, commissioner, and by him turned over in money to the guardian.

From the testimony heard by the court, the following conclusions of facts have been reached:

1. That the plaintiff, A. Q. McDuffie, had full knowledge, at the time of the purchase of the bond and mortgage by him, and the assignment of the same to R. H. Reaves, that the bond and mortgage were held by him as the property of the minors, of whom he was the guardian.

2. That the plaintiff, McDuffie, paid the full value for the bond and mortgage.

3. That of the consideration paid by him, as much as $700 were paid in a debt due by R. H. Reaves, in his individual capacity, to McDuffie.

4. That at the time of the assignment of the bond and mortgage, R. H. Reaves had abundant means and good credit, and could have easily and conveniently paid the debt of $700 due McDuffie, without using the funds of his wards.

5. That at the time of the transfer of the bond and mortgage, the guardian bond of R. H. Reaves was abundantly good, and R. H. Reaves was universally considered solvent.

6. That R. H. Reaves is now insolvent, and has been for some time, and was rendered so by the late war; and that the guardian bond is worthless.

The defendants, in their answer, first submit that R. H. *Reaves, the guardian, had no lawful authority to transfer and assign the bond and mortgage, and deny that the plaintiff is the legal holder thereof. The first question for consideration is, did the guardian have the legal power to sell and assign the bond and mortgage to the plaintiff?

It has been settled in this state by the decisions of the court, that a guardian has no right to sell the chattels of his ward. In the case of Bailey v. Patterson, the court set aside the purchase of a slave from a guardian. It has been held that, in general, guardians cannot change the nature of infants' estates, but they may do that under particular circumstances, and the court will support their conduct, if the court would do it under the same circumstances.

But in the case of Field v. Schieffelin, 7 Johns. Ch. 151, it is decided by Chancellor Kent, "that a guardian has legal control over a bond and mortgage held for his ward, and the right to collect and receive the money due thereon, and a legal right to sell and assign the same in the due exercise of his discretion as guardian. If the bond is not due, and the money is wanting for the purposes of the trust, either for discharging encumbrances, or for making more advantageous investments, or for payment of debts and for the maintenance and education of the ward, or for any purpose whatever connected with the faithful discharge of the trust and beneficial to the infant, the guardian has just right and lawful authority to raise the money by the assignment of the bond and mortgage. The necessity and expediency of the measure rests entirely in the judgment and discretion of the guardian."

This doctrine is sustained in the case of Long v. Cason, 4 Rich. Eq. 64, although it is distinctly stated in the case that it would be hazardous to recognize the doctrine as to the chattels of wards. In this case the court says: "That guardians are entitled to the possession and management of all the property of their wards, and the collection and disbursement of all their income. Their authority extends to bind the infants by all such acts as appear to be for their advantage. I apprehend that a guardian has plenary right to receive moneys coming to his ward, and to prosecute, compound and acquit any debt or liability to the ward. *But a stranger dealing with the guardian as to the choses of the ward, may rightfully presume that he is acting for the benefit of the infant, and in absence of any evidence of collusion does not partake of the guardian's responsibility. It appears to me highly important to the interests of infants and to the repose of the community, that guardians should have such power over the rights and credits of their wards."

In this same case the doctrine laid down in Field v. Schieffelin, as to the sale of bond and mortgage by the guardian, is recognized in the opinion of the court. It is said that "the views above stated have strong support from authority," and the words are quoted in Field v. Schieffelin, "the sale and assignment by a guardian to a stranger, of bond and mortgage belonging to an infant, were held valid."

The case of Long v. Cason draws a distinction between the sale of a chattel, such as a slave, and the collection of a debt or the sale and assignment of a bond and mortgage, or a chose of the ward, and seems to recognize the legal power of the guardian to sell and transfer a bond and mortgage belonging to an infant, and considers the guardian as always acting under responsibility to his ward for the faithful and judicious performance of his trust, and liable for any fraud, gross negligence, or other breach of trust. The bond in this case was due, or at least two installments of it, and the last nearly so, at the time of the assignment, and if the obligor had tendered payment, the guardian would have been bound to accept it. He clearly had a legal right to do this. This bond and mortgage were not intended by the court as an investment of the funds of the minors, for the proceeds of the sale were ordered to be turned over to the guardian, and the commissioner in equity turned over the first installment of it in money, and transferred the bond to R. H. Reaves, and not to R. H. Reaves as guardian. The form of the assignment would look as if the parties intended it as a payment of so much money as the bond represented to R. H. Reaves. The court seemed to have contemplated that money should go into the hands of the guardian, which should be securely invested by him. For aught that is known by the court, the proceeds of such sale were invested, after the sale of the bond and mortgage, by the *guardian. Under the authorities on this point and the points in this case, I conclude the guardian, R. H. Reaves, had the right and the legal power to sell and assign the bond and mortgage in question to the plaintiff.

Suppose I am mistaken in this view of the law, and the guardian had no legal power to sell the bond and mortgage, still it has been held that he may change the nature of the infant's estate, under particular circumstances, and the court will support him in the act, if the court would have directed the change under the same circumstances. Would the court have authorized the sale of this bond and mortgage under all the circumstances? I think so. The guardian, R. H. Reaves, had a good bond, was a man of means, and the bond was almost due as to all the installments. The plaintiff was offering the face of the bond and all the interest due on it. The court had ordered a change of the property of the minors from real estate into money. By authorizing a sale of the bond and mortgage for money by the guardian, it would have accomplished this object instantly. The order of the court, directing the payment of proceeds of sale to the guardian by the commissioners in equity, would seem to be authority in itself for the guardian to have converted the bond and mortgage into money, after the transfer to him. Under this order the commissioner paid to the guardian the first installment of the bond in money collected by him. This case thus resolves itself into the question, whether the guardian committed a breach of trust in the assignment of the bond and mortgage; and whether the plaintiff was a party to that breach of trust. If there was any fraud or collusion between the guardian and the plaintiff, the transaction will be vitiated and the sale invalidated. Any concert between the parties by which the bond and mortgage were obtained at a nominal price, or at a fraudulent undervalue, or any arrangement by which a violation of trust was committed, would amount to fraud. But on this point there is evidence to show that full value was paid for the bond and mortgage, and that there was no collusion. At the hearing it was distinctly stated that no such charges were made, or that such a ground was relied upon.

But if there was no fraud or collusion, and the plaintiff knew, *or was sufficiently informed, when he accepted of the bond and mortgage, that the guardian had in contemplation a breach of trust and intended to misapply the moneys, then the plaintiff must be deemed to have taken the bond and mortgage in trust for the infants. Field v. Schieffelin, 7 Johns. Ch. 153. "In general, a purchaser of personal property from an executor, administrator or guardian, in good faith, and having no knowledge of any intended breach of trust, is not responsible for a misapplication of proceeds." Hill on Trustees 166, note.

In Long v. Cason, 4 Rich. 67, it is held "that a stranger, dealing with the guardian as to the choses of the ward, may rightfully presume that he is acting for the benefit of the infant, and in the absence of any evidence of collusion, does not partake of the guardian's responsibility." Was there any breach of trust committed by the guardian, R. H. Reaves? It appears that a fair and valuable consideration was paid for the bond and mortgage. There is no evidence that the guardian has misapplied or wasted the money of the infants. The fact of the present insolvency of the guardian appears, but there is no proof that the money received by him was not duly invested in other property, and was left untouched amidst the destruction of his own property. It will not do to assume a breach of trust from the mere circumstance of the sale of the bond and mortgage, or to conclude there was one from a presumption to arise from the present insolvency of the guardian. But it may be said that the use of several hundred dollars of the proceeds of the bond and mortgage in the extinguishment of his own private debt, amounted to a violation of his trust. At the time, the proof is that he was solvent, in good credit, and had ready means. If such was the case, and the payment of his private debt out of the proceeds of the bond and mortgage, was merely to avoid the form of paying over money of his own and immediately receiving it back, then this transaction would not be a breach of trust. Sanders v. Rogers, 1 S. C. 460. There is no proof to show that this amount of money was not converted by him with the remainder received by the plaintiff. The amount used in extinguishment of his own debt was small when compared with the entire amount for which the bond and mortgage were sold. But if the pre*sumption of a devastavit is to be admitted, or the misapplication of the fund at the time amounted to a breach of trust, there is no evidence that the guardian had any abuse of trust in contemplation at the time; or if such was his intention, there is no sufficient proof that the plaintiff knew or had information of that intention, or of any purpose inconsistent with his duty.

The plaintiff had every reason to believe that the guardian was acting fairly and faithfully in discharging his trust. The guardian was a substantial and prosperous man, was abundantly solvent, and had given a good bond, and had command of ready money at all times. The bond of McIntyre was due in part, and he knew it could be enforced and collected by the guardian. He knew of the payment to guardian of the money collected by the commissioner, under the order of the court. There was nothing to cause even a suspicion on the part of the guardian intended to misapply the proceeds of the bond, with the exception of the payment of his individual debt, to the extent of $700, apparently out of the proceeds. Was this sufficient to make the plaintiff a participant in the violation of a trust by the guardian, or to furnish grounds for a knowledge of a design on the part of the guardian to misapply the money? The doctrine is, that a purchaser buys at his peril, when he knows that the proceeds are applied by the guardian to the payment of his own debts. But this applies when he uses the whole in extinguishment of his own debts, and there is no proof of his means to replenish or acquire an equal sum from other sources.

In this case, the proof is, the guardian had ready ability to pay the debt of $700 to the plaintiff; and the payment of this sum amounted, in effect, to the same thing as if he had first paid his debt to the plaintiff, and then received from him the same money in part payment of the bond and mortgage. I see nothing to warrant the conclusion that the plaintiff had any knowledge or information that the guardian was misapplying the funds at the time of the purchase, or had any such design. There is no ground for an inference of fraud. There was nothing in the transaction that rendered it the duty of the plaintiff to make inquiry. The plaintiff, therefore, had a right to presume, from all the facts before him, and the circumstances attending the *transaction, that the guardian was acting for the benefit of the infants. The plaintiff, in my judgment, acted in good faith, and is not responsible for a misapplication of proceeds.

It is adjudged, ordered and decreed, that the plaintiff is the lawful owner of the bond and mortgage in question, and is entitled to receive the proceeds arising from the sale of the mortgaged premises, and to any balance that may be due on the bond, after the application of said proceeds, as a credit thereon.

It is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the sheriff do pay over the proceeds of said sale to the plaintiff, after deducting therefrom the costs and disbursements of this action.

From this decree the defendants, Gibson and wife, and H. McClenaghan, administrator, appealed, upon the grounds that the appellants were entitled to the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises, or, at least, to so much thereof as had been used by the guardian in the payment of his own debt.

Messrs. W. J. Kerall, A. L. Evans and C. A. Woods, for appellants.

Mr. W. W. Sellers, for respondent.

April 19th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. The facts of the case are simple. Real estate belonging to infants was sold under an order of the court, and a bond and mortgage taken by the commissioner in equity to secure the payment of so much of the purchase money. A guardian was subsequently appointed, and the commissioner turning over to him, under an order of the court, the proceeds of the said sale, assigned to him the said bond and mortgage. The guardian sold and assigned the bond and mortgage, on which there was a balance still unpaid, to the plaintiff in this action. The purchaser paid the larger portion in money, but to the extent of about $700 he paid by a debt due to himself by the guardian personally. He (the purchaser) has now brought an action to foreclose the mortgage, and the question has arisen whether he or the infants are the legal owners of the bond and mortgage. The infants claim that they are legally entitled. The foreclos*ure has been had, and the money is now in the hands of the court awaiting decision upon the point. The guardian has entirely failed to account, and is now insolvent, as are his sureties also. The Circuit judge has decided, first, that the guardian had the legal right to sell the bond and mortgage as if it had been his own; and, secondly, that even if he had not the legal right, the sale would have been made by the court under the circumstances, and should now be confirmed.

The first conclusion of law is regarded by this court as entirely erroneous, and the second as based upon a presumption of facts which the evidence in no wise sustains. The cases of Bailey v. Patterson, 3 Rich. Eq. 156, and Moore v. Hood, 9 Rich. Eq. 311 [70 Am. Dec. 210], are conclusive on the point that a guardian has no legal title to the personal property of his ward, and that a sale by him is voidable, at the option of the infant, when he comes of age. In the former the purchaser was made to deliver up the property, while in the latter case the court said: "It is not intended to be intimated that the purchaser in this case could not have been successfully pursued if he and the slaves had been found within the jurisdiction." Page 327. The appellants only ask against the purchaser the proceeds of the judgment of foreclosure. They are entitled to that relief. The bond and mortgage have been held by the purchaser in trust for them, and must now be turned over to them as the legal owners. The remedy for the purchaser, if he has any, is against the guardian. This case is stronger, if anything, than that of Moore v. Hood, where the sale was made under an order of a court, but in a proceeding to which the ward was not a party. The Circuit judge, however, seems to rely on the case of Long v. Cason, 4 Rich. Eq. 60, and claims that the decision in that case "draws a distinction between the sale of a chattel, such as a slave, and the collection of a debt, or the sale and assignment of a bond and mortgage and chose of the ward, and seems to recognize the legal power of a guardian to sell and transfer a bond and mortgage belonging to an infant." We can find nothing in the case or elsewhere to justify such an inference, but, on the contrary, the whole tendency of the discussion in that case is the other way. What the case really does decide is thus plainly stated by the court in its con*cluding words: "It is not necessary, in this case, to determine what may be the operation of the statute [of limitation] against an infant with guardian as to legal demands standing in the name of the infant. Our judgment is limited to the case presented. We hold that as to a chose of the infant not assignable at law, and peculiarly within the power and duty of the guardian, the laches of the guardian, in the absence of collusion, by operation of the statute of limitations, bars the infant as to strangers, and leaves him to his remedy against the guardian." The court does discuss what is "within the power and duty of the guardian," and in so doing distinctly recognizes the authority of Bailey v. Patterson, and disavows any recognition of the doctrine intimated in Field v. Schieffelin, 7 Johns. Ch. 150, and held in Bank of Virginia v. Craig, 6 Leigh 399, "that guardians have the same title to the personal estate of their wards as executors have to the personal assets of their testators." The decision of Long v. Cason was concurred in by the Chancellor, whose decree was adopted by the court in Bailey v. Patterson, and although another Chancellor (Dargan) dissented, it was upon grounds totally different.

Examination of both opinions will show that the whole court assented to the proposition of law that "the guardian is not possessed of any legal estate in his ward's chattels or choses." This fact in law is the very difficulty which the dissenting Chancellor cannot surmount; for, to his mind, the statute could only run against the guardian if the legal title was in him; while, to a majority of the court, it appeared that the possession of the right of action, with the power to receive and acquit, was sufficient. That such is the meaning is put beyond doubt by remarks in Moore v. Hood, by Chancellor Wardlaw, who delivered the opinion in both cases. In discussing "the rule requiring beneficiaries to be parties, * * * although the trustees have the legal title," and, a fortiori, where they have not the legal title, as in the case of guardians, he says, "It was adjudged in Bailey v. Patterson, 3 Rich. Eq. 156, and recognized in Long v. Cason, 4 Rich. Eq. 60, that a guardian has not the legal title of his ward's chattels, and that his sale of them is voidable at the option of the ward. Long ago it was decided, in Inwood v. Twyne,

*Amb. 419, 2 Eden 148, that a guardian could not change the character of his ward's estate without the authority or sanction of the court, and this doctrine was recognized in Capehart v. Huey, 1 Hill Ch. 409." The authorities upon the point are conclusive, and the judgment of the Circuit Court that the guardian had the right and the legal power to sell the bond and mortgage in question must be reversed.

But the Circuit judge goes further, and comes to the same conclusion, in the results at least, upon the additional ground that such sale was a mere "change of the nature of the infant's estate," which would have been directed by the court under the circumstances, and which the court should afterwards confirm. The doctrine upon that subject is thus well expressed in Long v. Cason: "In general, guardians cannot change the nature of infant's estates, but they may even do that, as is said by Lord Hardwicke in Inwood v. Twyne, Amb. 419, 2 Eden 148, under particular circumstances, and the court will support their conduct if the court would do it under the same circumstances. They are entitled, however, to the possession and management of all the property of their wards, and to the collection and disbursement of all the income, profits and credits arising therefrom. Their authority extends to bind the infants by all such acts as appear to be for the advantage of the infants, and for which the guardians are liable to account. I apprehend that a guardian has plenary right to receive moneys coming to his ward, and to prosecute, compound and acquit any debt or liability to the ward. He always acts under responsibility to his ward for the faithful and judicious performance of his trust, and is liable for any fraud, gross negligence or other breach of trust. But a stranger dealing with him as to the choses of the ward may rightfully presume that he is acting for the benefit of the infant, and in the absence of any evidence of collusion, does not partake of the guardian's responsibility." What is meant by "possession and management of all the property of their wards" is thus defined and limited in Moore v. Hood, supra: "Management of an estate implies its administration in its existing state, but the order here affected the corpus of the estate and changed its nature." It will be seen that such was the effect of the "man*agement" in the present case. The Circuit judge relies on the opening and concluding sentences of the portion above quoted, and omits to take any notice of the intervening expressions. The remarks with regard to strangers dealing with guardians are in no sense connected with the sentence of Lord Hardwicke. That part refers to transactions which are in their nature voidable at the option of the ward, but confirmable by the court if, under the circumstances, they seemed really wise and proper, though the guardian had not the legal power; while the latter portion, in speaking of strangers dealing with guardians, relates only to those transactions which flow out of the exercise of the properly legal powers of guardians, for which, while the guardians are responsible, strangers are not liable where there was no collusion. For instance, if the mortgagor had satisfied the bond and mortgage by paying the money to the guardian, and the guardian wasted the money, the mortgagor would not be liable because of the waste. But if, on the other hand, the payment had been made by means of a debt due by the guardian personally to the mortgagor, or the money had been paid with the understanding that it would be loaned back to the mortgagor without security, or for other purposes of misapplication, there would be fraud or collusion on the part of the stranger, and he would be liable. That a stranger is not protected, either at law or in equity, in the purchase of property to which the vendor has neither legal title nor power of sale, is too obviously a general proposition to need authority, and that is just the case where a guardian sells the property of his ward without authority from the court. The only grounds upon which such sale can be confirmed are those which would have induced the court at the time to order the act to be done, together with the other, that it has turned out to the advantage of the ward. The evidence produced in the case will not permit such a conclusion. The sale of the bond and mortgage was for, in part, money, and in part a debt owed by the guardian personally to the purchaser. It cannot for a moment be said that the court would have ordered such a proceeding. The change of the nature of the estate was practically from a bond secured by real estate into a loan to the trustee without any security. It was, in law, a fraud on the part of the *trustee, and the mode of payment was notice to the purchaser, for it was, per se, a misappropriation of the ward's money, and gave him full warning that he was proceeding entirely at his own risk, relying upon the guardian and his sureties to account to the ward. The evidence is conclusive that the character in which the guardian held the bond and mortgage was known to the purchaser, for it was upon the instruments themselves. The part payment by debt past due, and owed by another than the guardian as guardian, was in itself a misapplication, and the circumstantial evidence that the whole amount was to be put by the guardian to his own use, and that the purchaser ought to have suspected it, (if he did not know it,) is very strong. Such being the case, the burthen of proof is entirely upon the purchaser. Neither he nor the guardian have produced a tittle of proof that the whole amount was not misapplied, nor anything to justify such use of the property of the ward. It was, in substance, a loan without security to a party against whom there were at the time judgments to large amounts unsatisfied, and his circumstances at best embarrassing. And, as has been so well said in Spear v. Spear, 9 Rich. Eq. 184, by way of comment upon the case of Sweet v. Sweet, Speers Eq. 309, the guardian's bond is not to be regarded as the security required by law for investments of money belonging to the estate. "It is proper," says the court, "for the security of his [the guardian's] beneficiaries and his own sureties, and for the avoidance of litigation of a particularly disturbing character, that the trust estate should be secured doubly: first, by stock or bonds, in which it may be invested, and then by his own bonds." Thus, a trustee who gives his bond for the faithful performance of his duties, is bound to treat the trust funds exactly as a trustee who has not given such a bond, to act with the same diligence and to obtain the same security on his investments. The conclusion of the court is, therefore, that the sale was without authority of law: that the evidence shows no grounds which would justify the court in confirming the sale: that, on the contrary, the circumstances are such as would have rendered the purchaser liable, (Rhame v. Lewis, 13 Rich. Eq. 269,) if the legal title in the vendor had been proved, and only the breach of trust with collusion on the part of the *purchaser had been the question; that therefore the sale is void as against the wards, and they are legally entitled to the benefit of the proceedings in foreclosure to which they have been made parties.

The case is remanded, that such proceedings as may be necessary may be had, in conformity with the views herein expressed.

Motion granted.

JAMES A. LANIER, Trustee, et al., v. JAMES B. GRIFFIN, Guardian, et al.

(November Term, 1878.)

[1. Guardian and Ward ⇐146.]

A suit for foreclosure of a mortgage, given by guardian, as additional security for the use of his ward, is no bar to an action for an accounting against the guardian and the sureties on his bond.

[2. Limitation of Actions ⇐28.]

The demand of a creditor of testator against the legatee, who has received his legacy, leaving a debt of the testator unpaid without available assets for its payment, is, in equity, in the nature of an action for money had and received, and the statute of limitations is applied in the same manner as to simple contract debts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 134; Dec. Dig. ⇐28.]

The estate of a deceased surety on a guardianship bond was duly settled up in 1858, without knowledge by executors or others in interest of this liability. The ward married in 1866, and by ante-nuptial settlement her property was assigned to a trustee; in 1867 she attained her majority; in 1868, an action was commenced by the trustee and herself, against executors, legatees and devisees of the surety, demanding payment by them of her claim. Held, that the action was not barred as against any of them by the statute of limitations. Before Carpenter, J., at Edgefield, August, 1876.

This action was commenced by bill in the court of equity for Edgefield district, in April, 1868, by James A. Lanier, trustee under marriage settlement, Margaret Cornelia Brunson (formerly Hollingsworth) and Robert D. Brunson, her husband, against James B. Griffin, her guardian, Julius Day, a surety on the guardianship bond, John H. Hollingsworth and John H. Walker, executors of Diomede F. Hollingsworth, deceased, who was also a surety on the bond, and also against the legatees and devisees of said D. F. Hollingsworth, and the alienees of the devisees.

It will be unnecessary to state any facts, as they are fully set out in the Circuit decree; except that it is deemed proper to report all of the testimony which bears upon the mortgage given by the guardian for the use of his ward, in 1865.

Z. W. Carlisle.—Witness was the former commissioner in equity for Edgefield district. * * * [A mortgage was shown witness]—It was given December 26th, 1865; it was given at the instance of James B. Griffin himself; he gave it to secure that much of his property for the benefit of his ward; so far as witness knows, none of the plaintiffs in this action had any agency in procuring the mortgage; the land was sold under a decree of foreclosure. * * * The lands sold under decree of foreclosure brought $3800.

John H. Hollingsworth.—Witness had no agency in procuring the mortgage; before James B. Griffin left this country, witness told him that he ought to make some arrangement to secure his ward's estate; witness was prompted to do so, by the interest he felt in the ward of James B. Griffin.

*There was also testimony to show that the executors of D. F. Hollingsworth made public advertisement, calling upon all creditors of their testator's estate to present and establish their demands. That the claim of Mrs. Brunson, then Cornelia Hollingsworth, was not presented, and that the executors had no knowledge that their testator was a surety on the bond of James B. Griffin, as guardian, until 1868. This testimony was not contradicted.

The Circuit decree is as follows:

John Hollingsworth, Diomede F. Hollingsworth and Mansfield E. Hollingsworth, were brothers, living near the village of Edgefield, each the owner of considerable property. Eliza Ann Walker, a sister, had children—John H. Walker, Caroline E. W. Freeman, A. Spann Walker, Herbert W. Walker, Oliphant P. Walker and Milton S. Walker.

Mansfield E. Hollingsworth died in the year of our Lord 1853, intestate, and Diomede F. Hollingsworth became the administrator of his estate.

Cornelia Hollingsworth, daughter of M. E. Hollingsworth, was an heir-at-law and distributee. Upon the settlement of M. E. Hollingsworth's estate, James B. Griffin, a defendant, whose sister D. F. Hollingsworth had married, became the guardian of M. C. Hollingsworth. He gave the usual guardianship bond, bearing date the 24th day of November, A. D. 1854, executed by himself, D. F. Hollingsworth and Julius Day, to A. Simpkins, commissioner in equity, and his successors, in the penalty of $20,000. James B. Griffin received in A. D. 1854, a small part of his ward's estate, the greater part in 1855, after payment of his ward's expenses, which were comparatively small. The money received, with accumulation of interest, amounted, on the 1st of January, A. D. 1875, to the sum of $22,173.31. There seems to be no question as to the amount of indebtedness. M. C. Hollingsworth (now Brunson) the plaintiff in interest, was born on the 20th day of August, A. D. 1846, and after the second marriage of her mother lived with her step-father at Abbeville. As a fact she knew nothing of the management of her estate, and for many years never saw her guardian. On the 10th day of August, A. D. 1866, she was married to Robert D. Brunson, of Edge*field. An ante-nuptial settlement of her property was executed, of which her step-father, Thomas Thomson, was the trustee after the marriage, under a power contained in the settlement. The office or duty of the trustee was transferred to James A. Lanier. Suit was commenced on the 17th day of April, A. D. 1868, by the trustee, James A. Lanier, R. D. Brunson and his wife, M. Cornelia, for an account of her estate, for settlement and relief. Two of the obligators to the guardianship bond are living—the guardian, who is now in Texas, and Julius Day, in Edgefield county. The question as to their liability is free from difficulty. The points of chief litigation arise from the death of D. F. Hollingsworth, and the disposition made of his estate. D. F. Hollingsworth died in February, A. D. 1857, leaving a will, of which he appointed his brother, John H. Hollingsworth, and nephew, John H. Walker, the executors. The testator gave to his wife, Eliza Ann, the homestead tract of land, the carriage and horses, the household and kitchen furniture, over and above one-half of his estate. This devise and these specific legacies were not appraised, and as devisee and legatee, she received the property under the will. The proof was that when the widow, Eliza Ann, received the carriage and horses they were worth $1000; the household and kitchen furniture was worth $2000; that she sold a part of the homestead to E. Mims for $800; after her intermarriage with William H. Harrington she sold to P. A. Eichelberger, on the 8th day of January, A. D. 1860, the remainder of the homestead for the sum of $6000. The amount of these sums is $9800. The executors proceeded to convert the estate of their testator into money. They sold the tract of land on waters of Horns creek to John C. Porter, for the sum of $17,450, and made a deed to him of the same, bearing date the 18th day of December, A. D. 1857; John C. Porter, in A. D. 1867, sold the land to E. J. Miller and W. H. H. Butler, and these vendees are made defendants in this suit.

The value of the estate of D. F. Hollingsworth (omitting the value received by his wife as above) was, on the 15th day of December, A. D. 1858, the sum of $63,057.14. Of this sum the widow received in money and personal property taken at appraisement one-half, namely, the sum of $31,528.57; the other half, *$31,528.57, was divided—one-fourth to John H. Hollingsworth, namely, the sum of $7882.14, which, as executor, he retained in his hands; the three-fourths of the one-half, namely, the sum of $23,646.43, was divided among the six children of Mrs. Eliza Ann Walker above named, giving to each the sum of $3941.07.

Oliphant P. Walker died during the war, and after payment had been made by the executors to the legatees or their guardians, his heirs and distributees, (his mother being one of the number,) have become or are entitled to his part as above.

James B. Griffin, in A. D. 1866, made preparations to remove to Texas, and before his removal he gave a mortgage of certain lands to Z. W. Carwile, then commissioner in equity, for the plaintiff, M. C. Brunson's, use. These lands were afterwards sold, under decree of foreclosure, for the sum of $3800. The proceeds of this sale should be applied as a credit on the amount reported by the referee as due the plaintiff. The guardian and Julius Day both filed answers, insisting that the taking of the mortgage discharged them from liability.

The court could not take this view of the transaction, and is of opinion that judgment must go against these obligators for the whole amount due the plaintiff, M. C. Brunson.

The devisees and legatees under the will of D. F. Hollingsworth are liable to plaintiff for the amount that each received from the estate of D. F. Hollingsworth, testator.

Eliza Ann Harrington received, in property and cash, the sum of $41,328, and, as against her, the plaintiff should have a decree for the whole sum due her, less the credit of the foreclosure sale against John H. Hollingsworth. There should be a decree for the sum of $7883.04, with interest on this sum from the 17th day of April, A. D. 1868, the time of the commencement of this suit.

Against three of the legatees, children of Mrs. Walker, viz., John H. Walker, Caroline E. W. Freeman (now Williams) and A. Spann Walker, there should be a decree for the sum received by them respectively, namely, the sum of $3941, with interest from the 17th day of April, A. D. 1868.

It appears, from the report of the referee, that the sums to which three of the children of Mrs. Walker were entitled as *legatees were paid to their guardians. How much in fact was realized by those who were minors does not appear; the sums with which they should be charged may depend on facts not disclosed to the court.

It appears, from the pleadings and testimony, that Eliza A. Harrington received payment in full for the parcel of homestead sold to E. Mims. She received payment in part for the balance of homestead sold P. A. Eichelberger. Payment was arrested on the part of Eichelberger by the notice of the plaintiffs' claim. Said Eichelberger made answer, and died pending suit, leaving a widow and child, who, being parties, have adopted his answer in substance.

The referee reported the testimony of Mrs. M. Eichelberger as to a conversation or agreement which P. A. Eichelberger said he had with W. H. Harrington; from that it appears that the sum $1800 was to be paid in full of balance due on land. The statement is brief and not minute. P. A. Eichelberger when living, and since his death his heirs-at-law, have had the use and occupation of the premises. The vendee and his heirs have been undisturbed, and their title and rights of possession not disputed. It would be no more than equitable that interest should be allowed on the balance due, at least from the commencement of the suit.

It appears, however, that the estate of P. A. Eichelberger is insolvent, and that M. Eichelberger's right of dower has accrued in the premises. She is therefore entitled thereto as provided by law. Subject to this right of dower, the court is of the opinion that the unpaid purchase money should be applied to plaintiffs' debt. The plaintiffs' claim reaches what can be identified as once pertaining to the estate of D. F. Hollingsworth. His widow took as a volunteer, and her equity must yield to the plaintiffs' superior and older right.

The sale of land by the executors of D. F. Hollingsworth to John C. Porter did not exceed the power vested in them, nor was the vendee in such case bound to see to the application of purchase money.

The court finds the following facts:

1st. That James B. Griffin as guardian,

Diomede F. Hollings*worth and Julius Day, executed to A. Simpkins, commissioner in equity, a bond for the guardianship of M. C. Hollingsworth, a minor, as set forth in the proceedings, in the penalty of $20,000.

2. That said James B. Griffin received as such guardian, during the minor's infancy and at an early period of time, large sums of money, which with interest, amounted on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1875, to the sum of $22,173.31.

3. That the sum of $3800 was realized in A. D. 186 , from the sale of mortgage premises to Z. W. Carwile, for the use of M. C. Hollingsworth.

4. That except the above there have been no payments or credits allowed on said bond.

5. That Diomede F. Hollingsworth, one of the obligators to said bond, departed this life in February, A. D. 1857, leaving in force his last will and testament, and thereby disposing of a large estate.

6. That he devised and bequeathed to his wife, Eliza A., a large property, of which the value was, on the 15th day of December, A. D. 1858, the sum of $41,328, all of which she received.

7. That the testator bequeathed to John H. Hollingsworth, one-fourth of one-half of his estate (less certain bequests and devises to his wife,) the value of which on the 15th of December, A. D. 1858, was the sum of $7882.-04, which the said John H. Hollingsworth received and retained in his hands.

8. That said testator gave and bequeathed to John H. Walker, Caroline E. W. Freeman,

A. Spann Walker, Herbert W. Walker, Oliphant P. Walker and Milton S. Walker, children of his sister, Eliza A. Walker, in like manner as above, three-fourths of one-half of his estate, which, divided among them, would give to each one the sum of $3941.07, on the 10th day of December, A. D. 1858.

9. That John H. Walker, Caroline E. W. Freeman and A. Spann Walker, each received the sum of $3941.07 on the 15th day of December, A. D. 1858.

10. That John F. Burns, guardian of Milton Walker, received the said share of his ward on the 19th day of October, A. D. 1858; and that Charles Hammond, the guardian of Herbert W. Walker *and Oliphant P. Walker, received the like share for each of his wards at the same time.

11. That the sums of money which were actually received by said wards of their bequests are unknown to the court.

12. That the executors of the will of D. F. Hollingsworth did sell the land on the waters of Horns creek to John C. Porter, and that he sold the same to E. J. Miller and W. H. H. Butler.

13. That Eliza A. Hollingsworth (widow) sold a parcel of the homestead to E. Mims, and that E. Mims sold the same to J. F. Kenney.

14. That she (Mrs. E. A. Harrington) sold the balance of the homestead to P. A. Eichelberger in 1860; that part of the purchase money was paid by P. A. Eichelberger, and the balance, to wit, $1800, remains unpaid, with interest.

15. That P. A. Eichelberger has died pending this suit, leaving his widow, Margaret Eichelberger.

The court finds the following conclusions of law:

1. That Margaret C. Brunson is entitled to recover against the defendants, James B. Griffin and Julius Day, the whole sum due her, namely, the sum of $22,173.31, with interest on $10,297, less the sum of $3800, which will be the sum of $18,373.31, with interest on $10,297.67 from January 1st, 1875.

2. That said plaintiff is entitled to recover against the defendant, Eliza A. Harrington, the like sum of $18,373.31, with interest on $10,297.67 from the 1st day of January, 1875.

3. That said plaintiff is entitled to recover judgment against John H. Hollingsworth for the sum of $7882.14, with interest thereon from the 17th day of April, A. D. 1868.

4. That the plaintiff is entitled to recover judgment against John H. Walker for the sum of $3941.07, with interest thereon from the 17th of April, 1868.

5. That the plaintiff is entitled to a like recovery for the sum of money and interest against Caroline E. W. Freeman (now Williams.)

6. That the plaintiff is entitled to the same recovery against A. Spann Walker.

*7. That the plaintiff is entitled to recover against the heirs-at-law and personal representatives of P. A. Eichelberger, deceased, the sum of $1800, with interest thereon from the 17th day of April, 1868, and have payment of the same from the sale of the homestead.

8. That Margaret Eichelberger is entitled to have her dower admeasured in the homestead.

9. That the bill or complaint should be dismissed as to John C. Porter, E. J. Miller and W. H. H. Butler, the vendees of the land on Horns creek; also as to John F. Kenney, the vendee of E. Mims, purchaser from the devisee.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed, That Margaret Cornelia Brunson, the plaintiff, do recover and have judgment against James B. Griffin for the sum of $18,373.31, with interest on the sum of $10,297.67 from the 1st day of January, A. D. 1875, and have leave to enter and docket her judgment therefor; and that the plaintiff recover the same sum and like interest against Julius Day, and have leave to enter and docket judgment therefor.

It is also ordered, adjudged and decreed, That plaintiff, M. C. Brunson, do recover and have judgment against Eliza A. Harrington for the like sum of $18,373.31, with interest on the sum of $10,297.67 from the 1st day of January, 1875. That said plaintiff recover and have her judgment against John H. Hollingsworth for the sum of $7882.04, with interest on said sum from the 17th day of April, 1868. That said plaintiff do recover and have judgment against John H. Walker, Caroline E. W. Williams and A. Spann Walker, each for the sum of $3941.07, with interest on these sums respectively from the 17th of April, 1868.

Also ordered and decreed, That the plaintiff recover and have her costs and disbursements against the said James B. Griffin, Julius Day, Eliza A. Harrington, John H. Hollingsworth, John H. Walker, Caroline E. W. Williams and A. Spann Walker.

It is ordered and decreed, That the plaintiffs bill or complaint be dismissed, with costs, against John C. Porter, E. J. Miller, W. H. H. Butler and J. F. Kenney.

Also ordered and decreed, That a writ for the admeasurement of dower to the widow of

P. A. Eichelberger, viz., Margaret *Eichelberger, be issued by the clerk of the court according to law, and her dower laid off and admeasured, if the same can be done according to law without injury or injustice to one or more of the parties having an interest in the premises; and if said dower be actually admeasured and meted out to M. Eichelberger in realty, then the sheriff of Edgefield county is hereby ordered and directed to sell, at Edgefield C. H., on sale-day in December next, or on some convenient sale-day thereafter, at public outcry, after notice of such sale, according to law, of at least twenty-one days, to the highest bidder, the remainder after the estate assigned to the dowress for life, and all the residue of the land not embraced in the admeasurement of dower. The sale shall be one-half cash and one-half credit of twelve months from day of sale, interest at seven per cent., credit portion secured by bond and mortgage of the premises sold. If dower shall not be actually admeasured, the sheriff shall proceed to sell the whole of the homestead upon the terms and in the manner above ordered, and shall, within ten days after such sale, made in either way as above, return all the papers and money (his own costs excepted) to the clerk of the court, who shall pay one-sixth of the purchase money, when received and collected, to M. Eichelberger for her dower, and the sum of $1800, with interest from the 17th day of April, A. D. 1868.

The case came before the Supreme Court upon exceptions to this decree, taken by several of the defendants, as follows:

The defendants, Julius Day and John H. Hollingsworth, except—

1. To the decision and decree of his Honor R. B. Carpenter, judge of the fifth judicial circuit, herein, and especially to that portion of the decree which says that the question of the liability of Julius Day is free from difficulty, and that judgment must go against him for the whole amount due plaintiff, M. C. Brunson.

2. To that portion of the decree which says that the devisees and legatees under the will of D. F. Hollingsworth are liable to the plaintiff for the amount that was recovered from the estate of D. F. Hollingsworth, testator.

*3. To so much of the conclusions of law as finds Margaret C. Brunson is entitled to recover against Julius Day.

4. To the third conclusion of law, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover against John H. Hollingsworth the sum of $7882.14, with interest from the 1st day of April, A. D. 1868, or any sum whatsoever.

5. To so much of said decree as orders, adjudges and decrees that Margaret Cornelia Brunson recover and have judgment against Julius Day for $18,373.31, with interest on $10,297.67 from the 1st day of January, A. D. 1875, and have leave to enter and docket her judgment therefor.

6. To so much of said decree as orders, adjudges and decrees that said plaintiff recover and have her judgment against John H. Hollingsworth for the sum of $7818.14, with interest from the 17th day of April, A. D. 1868.

7. To so much of said decree as orders and decrees that plaintiff have her costs and disbursements against Julius Day and John H. Hollingsworth.

8. That the decree is erroneous in charging John H. Hollingsworth individually with any liability whatever, he never having been made a party or been charged or any relief sought against him individually, but only made a party, charged and relief sought against him as executor; and in this, that said decree fails to find that John H. Hollingsworth, as executor of D. F. Hollingsworth, made a final settlement on the estate of his testator and received his legacy on the 19th day of October, A. D. 1858, from which time the statute of limitation, and the lapse of time in analogy thereto, ran in his favor, thereby barring all relief as against him.

Exceptions of Eliza A. Harrington, one of the defendants, to the judgment of his Honor R. B. Carpenter, the presiding judge, pronounced herein:

1. The said defendant excepts to so much of said judgment as holds the said defendant liable to any extent for the debts or liabilities of her testator, Diomede F. Hollingsworth, because his estate was duly and legally disposed of by final settlement *thereof, in the office of Ordinary for Edgefield county, when all the parties in interest were represented.

2. The said defendant excepts to so much of said judgment for the debts or liabilities of her said testator, because the said defendant's liabilities were barred by the statute of limitations.

3. The defendant excepts to so much of the said judgment as holds the lands of P. A. Eichelberger liable for the debts of the said testator, thereby denying the liability of the land of an alienee of a devisee for the debts of the testator.

4. That the said judgment is erroneous and incomplete, because there is no adjudication of the defendants' liability among themselves, and should be re-committed without prejudice for that purpose.

Please take notice that J. L. Addison, administrator de bonis non of the personal estate of Philip A. Eichelberger, deceased, and Margaret A. Eichelberger, widow of the said deceased, appeal from the judgment entered herein, September, 1876, on the grounds following:

1. That his Honor R. B. Carpenter erred in holding that the special devise of the tract of land to Mrs. Eliza A. Harrington, under the will of Diomede Hollingsworth, is liable to the payment of the claim of plaintiffs.

2. That he erred in not holding that all the legacies and remaining devises under said will should be exhausted before resort had to said special devise.

3. That he erred in finding as a fact in Paragraph 14 of his decree that the sum of $1800, and interest, or any other sum, by the estate of the said Philip A. Eichelberger as balance due on homestead of Mrs. Eliza A. Harrington—the testimony of Mrs. Margaret A. Eichelberger being too slight and general, as altogether inadmissible and illegal.

4. That he erred in Paragraph 7 of his conclusions of law in holding "that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover against the heirs-at-law and personal representatives of P. A. Eichelberger, deceased, the sum of $1800, with interest thereon from the 17th day of April, 1868, and have payment of the same from the sale of the homestead."

*5. That he erred in giving priority of lien on balance due on said homestead to plaintiffs, to the injury of the rights of the creditors of the said P. A. Eichelberger.

6. That he erred in directing the clerk to pay one-sixth of the proceeds of the sale of the said homestead to Margaret A. Eichelberger for dower, instead of one-sixth of the assessed value of said homestead at the time of the death of the said Philip A. Eichelberger.

I adopt the above grounds for my client.

M. L. Bonham,
Attorney for Walter Eichelberger.

Mr. J. A. Sheppard, for J. H. Hollingsworth.

The executors having made due advertisement and then made settlement of their accounts, without knowledge of this liability, are discharged. 5 Stat. 106, § 27; Gen. Stat. 457, §§ 1, 2; Bail. Eq. 439; 2 Bail. 105; Rice Eq. 110; 5 Sm. & M. 651; 3 Yerg. 1; 3 Hill 165. And the executors being absolved from liability, the legatees are also. Bail. Eq. 439. Where there are provisos and saving clause in a statute, all persons not excepted are affected by the provisions of the statute. Hence, this statute affects minors, particularly when represented by guardian. 12 Wheat. 438; 12 Johns. 290; 15 Johns. 391. When creditors fail to present their demands, executors are justified in paying legacies. Rich. Eq. 347; Rice Eq. Cas. 130.

This bond was payable to the commissioner, who is the administrative officer of the court, and, as such, a supervisor of guardians. 11 Stat. 112. The bond is payable to him, and the sureties are liable only on the bond. This is a legal claim; and is none the less so because action thereon may be brought in the court of equity. 1 Story's Eq. 425, 432, 438, 442. The commissioner alone may sue on the bond (11 Stat. 112), and, as a creditor, is affected by act of 1789. If executor is protected by failure of the creditor to present his demand, so is the legatee. Rich. Eq. Cas. 347; 2 Hill Ch. 466–7. The executors are protected by statute of limitations, running from time they made settlement of the estate. Bail. Eq. 198; 4 Strob. Eq. 196, 203; Speers Eq. 382; 2 Hill 522;

2 Hill Ch. 457, 496; 1 McC. Ch. *176; Bail. Eq. 437; Rice Eq. 385; 4 Rich. Eq. 101; 7 Rich. Eq. 411.

That the minor is barred, see 4 Rich. Eq. 61. That a guardian has the right to receive for his ward, results from principle decided in 2 Hill Ch. 284. See, too, 2 Hill Ch. 490; 3 Pr. Wil. 309; 12 B. & B. 75; 1 Cox 145; Lewin on Trusts 604.

The remedy against the executor, as such, is lost. See Gen. Stat. 457, and Circuit decree. The remedy on the bond, as such, has also been lost, especially against the legatees. See 10 Rich. Eq. 438. By parity of reasoning, the statute of limitations must be regarded quoad the executor and not quoad the creditor, and hence infancy of creditor is not to be considered.

A legatee, if liable at all, is only liable for his proportion of the claim, and is not to make good the insolvency of his co-legatees. 3 Rus. 130; 1 Roper on Leg. *459; 1 Desaus. 112; Dud. Eq. 173. Messrs. M. W. Gary and Samuel McGowan, for respondents.

April 19th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the Circuit decree in order to understand the bearing of the exceptions to that decree. J. Day was one of the sureties for the guardian, J. B. Griffin, and J. H. Hollingsworth is the executor of the other surety, D. F. Hollingsworth. They except to so much of the decree as holds Day answerable as surety with D. F. Hollingsworth, and awards judgment for the whole amount found due from his principal to the trustee of the ward. The judgment against Day, as surviving surety, was properly allowed, unless there is force in the objection that such judgment is precluded by a former recovery in a previous suit brought by the plaintiffs to foreclose the mortgage given by the guardian as security, in part, for the amount of his indebtedness to his ward at the time he left the state. It is contended that that fact bars the present action against Day as surety on the bond. We do not see any ground for holding such foreclosure proceeding a bar to the present action. It was founded on the mortgage given by Griffin, and *not upon the guardian's bond or his general accountability, an entirely different cause of action. It does not appear that a general accounting by the guardian was had under it. How that judgment could be reached without an accounting by the guardian is a question that could only become important with reference to the validity of that judgment, which is not in question here. Its effect is determined by the fact that a general accounting was neither sought nor had. Day, as guardian's surety, was interested to have as much as possible realized from the Griffin mortgage, and the suit in that case was in harmony with the equities in the present suit, and, therefore, the sureties have no cause of complaint, and, certainly, no technical bar. Whether Day was a necessary or proper party to that suit cannot be questioned here. This exception should be overruled.

The next exception is to the finding of the decree that the devisees and legatees under the will of D. F. Hollingsworth are liable to the plaintiff for the amount that was received by them as such from the estate of their testator, one of the sureties on the guardian's bond. This exception is also raised by the appeal of Mrs. Harrington. J. H. Hollingsworth and Mrs. Harrington are the only persons standing in the relation of legatees who appeal from the decree as charging the plaintiff's debt against the assets of the estate of D. F. Hollingsworth in the hands of his legatees. Mrs. Harrington stands in the case in the additional character of specific devisee of realty; but the questions growing out of that fact will be considered under the objections raised by her appeal. The question that will be now examined relates to the liability of the legatees of D. F. Hollingsworth to respond to the amount of assets received by them in payment of their legacies. It is contended that the executors of D. F. Hollingsworth having settled the estate of their testator many years prior to the commencement of this suit, the statute of limitations, as applied to simple contract debts, is a bar to any suit against them by a creditor neglecting to present his demands in due time, and that this circumstance affords a reason why the plaintiffs should be held to be barred as against the legatees. It is true, that in the present case no ground appears for a decree against the executors of D. F. Hollingsworth. Had the plaintiffs sued them on *their legal liability as personal representatives of the testator, a plea of plene administravit could have been established by showing that they had paid out all the assets of the estate in due course of administration, by satisfying all creditors who came in and proved their debt on the usual notice, and distributing the balance. Walker v. Gill, 2 Bail. 105. In such an action, if the executor relied on the statute of limitations, he would have to show such a bar as would be appropriate to the nature of the plaintiff's demand, for the object of the bar would be to destroy the right of the plaintiffs to establish their debt as against the assets of their debtor, and not merely to shield the executor from personal liability. If, however, the executor is directly pursued for his personal wrong, as in the case of a devastavit, he can interpose a bar personal to himself, such as the lapse of the ordinary time for barring actions on simple contract debts after final accounting and distribution. But an action at law on the guardian's bond against the personal representatives is not subject to the statute bar. Mobley v. Cureton, 2 S. C. 140. Equity applies the statute of limitations to strictly legal rights brought within its jurisdiction in the same manner as the courts of law apply it. Van Rhyn v. Vincent, 1 McC. Eq. 310. The demand of the creditor of the testator against a legatee, who has received his legacy, leaving debts of the testator unpaid, without available assets for its payment, is, in equity, in the nature of an action for money had and received, and the statute of limitations is applied in the same manner as to simple contract debts. Brewster & Dickson v. Gillison, 10 Rich. Eq. 435; Buchan v. James, Speers Eq. 375. In applying the bar the court looks to the time when the cause of action accrued to the plaintiff, and counts the statute time accordingly, allowing the same effect to disabilities that prevail at law. In McMullin v. Brown, 2 Hill Eq. 457, the legatees had been in possession of their legacies from 1816 to 1817, and the bill which was brought by the creditor of the testator against the legatees was not filed until 1829. It was held that the suit had been brought in due time, as the cause of action did not arise until judgment had been recovered against the executor, and a deficiency of assets established, so as to enable the legacies to be followed. In that case the question whether the creditor was *barred as against the legatee was considered independently of the question whether such a suit by the executor would have been so barred. It is doubtless true that the equity of the creditor to go against the legatee is through the executor, who primarily has the right to call in assets commensurate with the rights of creditors to have such assets applied to their debts; and it would seem a natural inference that a bar that would affect the executor would equally affect the creditor who pursues his rights through the executor. But the executor may lose his recourse to the legatee by delay to prosecute or some act of wrong committed by him, without destroying the right of the creditor to pursue the legatees. In Fripp v. Talbird, 1 Hill Eq. 142, it is said "there is no doubt about the general rules that if an executor or administrator proves insolvent, creditors may follow the assets in the hands of a legatee or distributee, and compel them to refund, even although the executor may have retained sufficient assets to pay the debt, and wasted them." In such a case, if the executor was compelled to pay, he clearly could not go against the legatees to make good the assets wasted by him. Although the creditor has no original equity against the legatee, as standing in his own right, and holds only an equity derived from that of the executor, yet, under the authorities, it is necessary to conclude that it is an independent equity, for otherwise the creditor would be barred wherever the executor is barred, which, as we have seen, is not the case. Though derivative in its origin, yet that it is direct in its character, as between the creditor and the legatee, is clearly to be implied from the view presented in Brewster & Dickson v. Gillison, 10 Rich. Eq. 435, defining it as in the nature of an action by the creditor against the legatee for money had and received to his use. Without an equitable priority between the creditor and the legatee, whether original or derived through some other equity, no foundation for the application of the principles of indebitatus assumpsit would exist. If the executor has assets, or their deficiency has been occasioned by his wrong, the creditor must go against him in the first instance, and exhaust his remedy, before he can go against the legatee, as was held in McMullin v. Brown. This shows that the creditor's right against the legatee does not depend on the co-operation of the executor, but that it is inde*pendent even of any misconduct that the latter may have committed. If, then, the executor has improperly lost the right to recall legacies, by delay or otherwise, the creditor is not prejudiced thereby. In the present case, the complainant was enabled to go against the legatee with the executors, because it appeared that no assets existed in the hands of the executors, and no ground appeared for charging the executor personally with the debt, as in case of devastavit. We must, therefore, look to the plaintiff's cause of action to see whether this action was commenced in due time. The plaintiff, M. C. Brunson, who was the ward of Griffin, did not arrive at majority until 1867. She married in 1866, and the trust deed under which the plaintiff, Lanier, as trustee, claims, was executed in the last-named year. The action, the primary object of which was an accounting by or in behalf of the guardian, was brought in 1868, within four years after the execution of the trust deed and the appointment of a trustee, and within one year after the plaintiff, M. C. Brunson, attained majority. It is therefore clear that the action was commenced in due time after the statute commenced running on the removal of the disability of minority as it regards the ward and as it regards the title of the trustee within four years next after the cause of action accrued. The plaintiffs have established a bond debt against the personal representative of D. F. Hollingsworth, and have shown that there are no assets in the hands of such personal representative for the satisfaction of such debt, and no remedy available against the personal representative; also, that the legatees have received their legacies, thus entitling them to a decree calling upon the legatees to refund their legacies. Newman v. Bartin, 2 Vern, 205; Miller v. Mitchell, Bail, Eq. 437; Fripp v. Talbird, 1 Hill Eq. 142.

It is contended that the bill makes J. H. Hollingsworth a party defendant only as executor of D. F. Hollingsworth, and, therefore, so much of the decree as charges the said J. H. Hollingsworth as legatee is erroneous. The bill charges the fact that J. H. Hollingsworth was a legatee as well as executor, and prays an account on the part of the legatees of the estate of D. F. Hollingsworth. The defendant, J H. Hollingsworth, in his answer, admits the fact of distribution according to the terms of the will, *and the decree is in accordance with these admissions. The objection is of a purely technical character, and does not appear to have been urged in objection to the proofs establishing the liability of J. H. Hollingsworth. It is, therefore, too late for advantage to be taken of such objection, if it ever had any force. Independent of the provisions of the code of procedure, objections that may be cured by amendment should be taken before decree. But the provisions of the code are applicable to the decree which was pronounced in 1876 (Section 465), and the decree cannot be reversed for any such technical defect. Section 197. It is not material to inquire whether any such alleged defect existed in the bill as originally filed, or in the amendment; J. H. Hollingsworth is in the same situation as the other legatees as it regards the bar of the statute of limitations. As executor he is not brought into liability by the decrees.

The appeal of Mrs. Harrington, will be next considered. The first and second exceptions taken by her have been disposed of so far as they relate to her rights as a legatee receiving her legacy, leaving unpaid debts of testator outstanding. Mrs. Harrington was, in addition to being a legatee, a specific devisee of certain lands of the testator. As it regards the realty specifically devised, the statute of limitations is inapplicable. The action against the devisee by the creditor of the testator is under the statute of 3 and 4 W. and M., and is upon the bonds of the ancestor, with which the devisee has privity by reason of assets devised. Mobley v. Cureton, 2 S. C. 140. The plaintiff might have sued Mrs. Harrington at law as devisee without joining the executor, and could have recovered to the extent of assets devised and actually received by her. Vernon v. Valk, 2 Hill Eq. 257. In equity the executor or administrator is a necessary party when assets can be reached that should be applied to the relief of the devisee, and the reason assigned is "that full justice may be done without resort to a second suit." Vernon v. Valk. In Alexander v. Williams, 2 Hill 522, it is held that in the case of a creditor seeking to subject legacies after assent by the executors, the remedy is in equity as against all the legatees for contribution. It is clear, therefore, that the decree is erroneous in not having adjusted the recovery so as to reach, in the first instance, assets *primarily applicable to the payment of the plaintiff's demand. Legacies are liable to respond before lands specifically devised can be applied. Duncan v. Tobin, Dud. Eq. 161. The decree, however, establishes an absolute liability against Mrs. Harrington to the extent of assets devised by her both as legatee and as devisee. This was clearly erroneous, as it permits the plaintiffs to go at once against her to the full extent of her possible ultimate liability without exhausting the remedy against legatees.

For the foregoing reasons the fourth exception of Mrs. Harrington, to the effect that this decree is erroneous and incomplete because there is no adjudication of the defendants' liability among themselves, is well taken. The decree does not pursue the legacies in the lands of all the legatees within the reach of the court in accordance with the bill, and in this respect fails to give the full measure of justice due as between the defendants. It appears by the decree that the guardians of three infant legatees received the shares of their wards, and that the sums that were actually received by said wards of their bequests are unknown to the court; no decree is made for contribution on account of such infants' legacies, although Milton and Herbert Walker, two of such infant legatees, are made parties to the bill, the remaining infant, Oliphant, appearing to have died before the suit was commenced. It is necessary, if not already done, that there should be a representation of the estates of these infants, and such proceedings had as to bring such estates into contribution pro rata with the other legatees.

It appears that part of the premises specifically devised were alienated by Mrs. Harrington to P. A. Eichelberger, and that the sum of $1800 and interest remained due on account of the purchase money in such alienation. The decree holds the personal representatives of Eichelberger, who is deceased, liable for the sum of $1800 and interest, and orders the sale of the lands specifically devised and thus alienated for its payment, making provision for the allowance to the widow of Eichelberger of dower out of said lands. The bona fides of the alienation is not impeached. Such alienation reduced the demand of the creditor of the testator to a money demand against the devisee for the value of the devised assets.

No legal or equitable right to follow *the lands exists under the statute. The question then arises whether the claim for the purchase money due from the estate of Eichelberger can be regarded as assets of the estate of D. F. Hollingsworth, so as to be reached in the hands of Mrs. Harrington and enforced against the personal representatives of Eichelberger.

D'Urphey v. Nelson, 4 McC. 129, note. In this case it was held that, under the 5th Statute of George II., Chapter VII., "lands of the debtor are made liable for all his debts, and are made assets for satisfying the same in like manner as such estates are liable in England," and that "they are liable though devised by the debtor," and when alienated by the devisee or heir, he is answerable for their value. It is also held that "the lands of the debtor are made liable for all his debts, and are made assets for satisfying the same, in like manner as such estates are liable in England by specialty," and that "they are liable though devised by the debtor," and when alienated by the devisee or heir he is answerable for their value. It is also held that "the lands of the debtor are made subject to like remedies for seizing and disposing thereof for his debts, in like manner as personal estates in the plantations are seized and disposed of for satisfaction of debts, that is to say they are made liable to be taken by a writ of fi. fa. in all cases when chattels are so liable and sold, &c., or to whatever other remedies chattels are liable to in the respective colonies of America. Being made liable in like manner as personal estates, the act cannot be construed to make any distinction between lands and personal chattels, but they must be construed as equally liable for satisfaction of debts and to be assets for that purpose in the hands of the personal representative of the debtor." The question in that case was whether such lands could be seized and sold under execution against the personal representatives of the debtor as against the heir entitled to them by descent, and it was held that they could be so seized and sold. Much discussion has arisen as to the limits of the doctrine of this case, but it has been conceded that the case must stand as a sound exposition of 5th George II., and, also, that it does not apply to the lands descended or devised where they have been bona fide alienated before suit brought by the heir or *devisee. The features of that case that are still open for discussion have no bearing on the present question. Martin v. Latta, 4 McC. 28; Vernon v. Valk, 2 Hill Eq. 257; Jones v. Wightman, 2 Hill 579; Bird v. Houze, Speers Eq. 250; Gilliland & Howell v. Caldwell, 1 S. C. 194. It is clear that the doctrine of that case includes the proposition that such assets may be followed in equity in like cases in which personal assets could be followed, and subject to the same rules as it regards the remedy for such assets when they have become converted into some form different from that they originally possessed, but can be traced in such new form. It must be contended that while the lands were in the hands of the devisee they were to be regarded as assets capable of being reached as such, in equity by the personal representatives or by creditors of the testator. There can be no doubt but that when the lands are alienated by the heir or devisee, the proceeds of their sales can be pursued in the hands of the heir or devisee as assets. It would follow from familiar principles that a chose in action or an obligation held by the heir or devisee for the recovery of the purchase money of the lands devised and alienated, might, at the election of the creditor or personal representative of the testator, as the case might be, be held to represent the assets of the testator's estate, and be specifically pursued as such. That is the present case, for the plaintiffs seek to reach, specifically, the right of action possessed by Mrs. Harrington for the unpaid purchase money. It is true, as already held, that such claim for the purchase money of the lands specifically devised takes the place of the lands themselves, and, as such, cannot be reached until the remedy against the legatees is exhausted. The plaintiffs, therefore, cannot have an absolute decree as against the devisee, Mrs. Harrington, as to the demand for such purchase money remaining unpaid, but a contingent right for that purpose depending on the insufficiency of the funds derived from the legacies. In this respect the decree is erroneous, and must be modified accordingly. But in the event that it is necessary to go against the lands specifically devised, a decree against Mrs. Harrington, as it regards the unpaid balance of purchase money, would be ineffectual to obtain full relief, and would necessitate subsequent proceedings against the estate of Eichelberger. As an asset of the estate, the claim for the unpaid balance purchase *money can be enforced in this suit as against the personal representative of Eichelberger by a proper accounting, should that course become necessary for the satisfaction of the plaintiff's debt, the representatives of Eichelberger being a party. That enforcement must be dependent on the insufficiency of the assets primarily liable for such purpose, and the decree must be modified accordingly.

The remaining question is as to the right of the plaintiffs to have the devised lands in the hands of the persons claiming under Eichelberger sold for payment of the amount of purchase money due. It does not appear that Mrs. Harrington holds any special lien on the land sold to Eichelberger by way of mortgage or otherwise that is capable of being enforced in her right. If the lands are general assets for the payment of Eichelberger's debts, they must be applied in a course of administration according to all legal priorities. If such a remedy can be had in this case, it can only be obtained through an accounting of Eichelberger's personal representatives and due proceedings thereunder, to which the creditors of Eichelberger should be made parties, and for this purpose application may be made to the Circuit Court in the event that it should become necessary for the plaintiffs to resort to the specific devises. As no appeal has been taken from the order assigning dower it must stand as between the present parties.

The appeal of Mrs. Eichelberger must be denied as it regards the mode of assigning dower. It appears that the land has been sold by consent under an order of the court, and it must be assumed that the intent of such consent was that the amount for which it should be sold should be the test of the extent of dower. All other questions growing out of the actual sale of the land must be reserved for further consideration by the Circuit Court, on the due ascertainment of the rights of the various parties in respect thereof.

The decree must be modified in accordance with the foregoing conclusions, and set aside where inconsistent herewith, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court for further proceedings in conformity herewith.

Decree modified.

Before Aldrich, J., at York, September, 1878.

Plaintiff was a passenger upon defendant's train in November, 1877. While the train was crossing the south fork of Fishing creek, the trestle gave way, and the coach in which plaintiff sat was precipitated into the stream below. Plaintiff jumped through one of the windows, and his leg was broken, and he was otherwise bruised and injured. He brought this action against the defendant for these injuries laying his damages at $15,000. There was much testimony on both sides, but it is not material to the question decided by this court. The jury found a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $10,000. Defendants moved upon the minutes for a new trial:

1. Because the verdict was contrary to the legal preponderance of the testimony.

2. Because the damages are excessive.

The motion was refused, and an exception noted; and from such refusal an appeal was taken to this court.

[For subsequent opinion, see Steele v. C., C. & A. R. Co., 14 S. C. 324.]

Mr. J. H. Rion, for appellant.

We are met on the threshold of this appeal by the decision of this court, published since the trial of this case, in Brickman v. South Carolina R. R. Co., 8 S. C. 173. Unless the court will reverse that ruling, this appeal is nugatory.

I maintain that the Supreme Court has power in a case like this. Compare Article IV., Section 4, of the constitution, with Section 11, Subdivision 2, of the code. No provision of the code *excepts from the jurisdiction of this court, a case like this. On the contrary, there is Section 288, Subdivision 4. This court has the power, and therefore the duty of exercising it co-exists.

But can this court refuse to interfere with "the discretion" of the Circuit judge? If so, then it is a Court of Appeals not contemplated by the constitution or laws.

The error, which I respectfully submit was made in the decision of Brickman v. South Carolina R. R. Co., arose from not bearing in mind that the code of South Carolina vests in the Supreme Court all the powers vested by the New York code in the "Court of Appeals" and "the General Term of the Supreme Court." In New York an order "involving any question of discretion" can not be reviewed in the appeal court. Section 11, Subdivision 4, N. Y. Code. In South Carolina there is no such restriction on this court. If, then, our appeal could be heard at a "General Term of the Supreme Court" of New York, this court has the power to hear this appeal.

Could our appeal be heard at a general term of the Supreme Court in New York? I will cite simply one case, as it is a late one, and illustrates the working of the restriction above mentioned upon the appeal court of New York, which is not copied in our code. It is Peck v. N. Y. Central and Hudson River R. R. Co., as it is successively reported in 4 Hun 236, 8 Hun 286, and 70 N. Y. 592. The position of the New York appeal court is justified by the words of the statute denying the power; while in South Carolina our statute expressly gives the Supreme Court the power; our Supreme Court having all the appellate powers of both the New York appellate courts. (Remainder of argument is upon the merits of the case.)

Mr. W. B. Wilson, for respondent.

April 23d, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. The appeal is from the refusal by the Circuit judge to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial. The motion was upon the following grounds:

*1. Because the verdict was contrary to the legal preponderance of the testimony.

2. Because the damages are excessive.

The Circuit judge states no reasons for the refusal. The presumption is, however, unavoidable, that he refused the motion because, in his opinion, the verdict was not contrary to the legal preponderance of the evidence, and the damages not excessive. On each of the points his conclusion is final and cannot be reviewed by this court. Const., Art. IV., § 4; Brickman v. South Carolina R. R. Co., 8 S. C. 173; Earle & Co. v. Hutchinson, MS., filed January 28th, 1879.

The court renders this opinion with reluctance and from necessity, in view of the limit of its jurisdiction. It appears to the court that to apply the measure of damages adopted in this case to the numerous cases that are liable to occur, will lead to injustice and tend to impair the usefulness of an important industry intimately affecting the public convenience. But, as already decided, the relief in such cases can only be had in the Circuit Court.

The appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Before Johnson, C., at Pickens, July, 1866.

This was a bill quia timet, filed in the court of equity for Pickens district, in the year 1866. The bill was taken pro confesso against the defendant, Sitton. The other matters of pleading and evidence are sufficiently stated in the Circuit decree, which is as follows:

On the 17th day of July, 1863, Samuel Reid, as principal, and Joseph J. Norton, as surety, executed their joint and several single-bill for $3073.05, payable on demand to John B. Sitton or bearer, "with interest compounded from the 27th day of July, 1863," and delivered the same to the said Sitton.

On the 21st day of May, 1866, the complainant filed his bill against the principal to the said single-bill and the payee of the same, alleging that, when it was executed, the defendant, Samuel Reid, was in affluent circumstances, but that he now fears that so much of his fortune was swept away by the disastrous termination of the late war that he will not be able to pay his debts; and that he has paid no part of the single-bill on which he is surety, although he has often requested him to pay the same, and thereby discharge him from all liability on the same.

The prayer of the bill is, "that the said

Samuel Reid may be *required to perform, specifically, his contract, and be decreed to pay to the said John B. Sitton the said sum of money in the said single-bill specified, according to the tenor and effect thereof," with a prayer for general relief.

Samuel Reid, in his answer, pleads to the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground that the complainant has a plain and adequate remedy at law; and further answering, admits that his losses have been very heavy, but insists that, if he is not unnecessarily annoyed by over-anxious creditors, he will be able to pay all debts in a short time. From the evidence there is no great danger of the complainant's having to pay any portion of the single-bill, but his fears on that subject cannot be regarded as groundless.

The practice in this state, in similar cases, has been for the surety to pay the debt to the payee, and then proceed against the principal in the law courts, and there is no reason assigned in the pleadings for not pursuing that course. But Chancellor Harper, in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Pride v. Boyce, Rice Eq. 275 [33 Am. Dec. 78], recognizes the doctrine that it is not necessary for the surety first to pay off the debt to entitle him to a remedy against his principal; and, further, "that a surety may, in equity, compel the creditor to sue, proffering an indemnity against costs and expenses." In the case of Hayes v. Ward et al., 4 Johns. Ch. 562, Chancellor Kent remarks: "It is now considered a settled rule that a surety may resort to chancery if he apprehends danger from the creditor's delay, and compel the creditor to sue the principal debtor, though, probably, he must indemnify the creditor against the consequences of risk, delay and expense."

It is stated in many of the elementary books, in the most general language, that a surety has the right to come into the court of equity for the purpose of compelling the creditor to sue the principal; but, upon an examination of the cases referred to as authority on the subject, it is found that the point was not properly involved in their decision. 2 Amer. Lead. Cas. 1301. Had the bill, however, been filed for the purpose of forcing the defendant, John B.

Sitton, to proceed at law against the principal, from the numerous dicta of the most eminent judges, I would *not have felt myself at liberty to refuse the relief, but I can find no authority whatever in our laws that would justify me in making the decree prayed for in the bill, though there are authorities supporting the practice. Story's Eq. 850; Brown's Eq. 581, and note 5. There are similar cases in which there are equities that can be properly protected only in this court, but it would be productive of much litigation for the court to give decrees for the payment of money where there are no other or stronger equities than there are in this case. It is ordered and decreed that the bill be dismissed, with costs.

Wm. D. Johnson.

November 19th, 1866.

From this decree the complainants appealed on the following grounds, to wit:

1. Because the surety is not bound first to pay off the debt to entitle himself to a remedy against his principal. Tankersley v. Anderson, 4 Desaus. 44; Taylor v. Heriot, 4 Desaus. 227; Ramsay v. Gervais, 2 Bay 145 [1 Am. Dec. 635].

2. Because the surety, although he has not been sued by his creditor, may apply to a court of equity and compel the principal to relieve him of his liability by paying off the debt. Story's Eq., § 327; Mitf. Ch. Pl. 148; Pride v. Boyce, Rice Eq. 275.

3. Because, it is respectfully submitted, the decree of the presiding Chancellor is contrary to the law, the equity and the evidence in the case. Story's Eq., §§ 730, 849; Ranelaugh v. Hayes, 1 Vern. 189.

Mr. James H. Whitner, for appellant.

Messrs. McGowan & Adams, contra.

May, 1867. The opinion of the court was delivered by DUNKIN, C. J. In Antrobus v. Davidson, 3 Mer. 577, Sir Samuel Romilly remarks: "It is nothing to say that such a bill as the present may have been seldom filed, or that no instance can be produced of such a decree as is prayed by it, if it can be shown by analogy to decided cases, that it is according to princi*ples upon which the court usually acts, and which are completely established."

Grave doubts were for a long time entertained as to the right of the surety to require the creditor to prosecute his demand against the principal debtor. The difficulties are considered by Lord Eldon, in Wright v. Simpson, 6 Ves. 714. It is an interference with the legal rights of the creditor and may disturb his arrangements. He may have looked more to the surety than to the principal debtor. "He may have had so good an opinion, (says he) of Sir James Wright's personal responsibility, that he would take a personal contract," &c., (p. 732,) and again, "But the surety is a guarantor; and it is his business to see whether the principal pays, and not that of the creditor," (p. 734.) But he admits that, in the late cases, and on the weight of authority, "provided there was no risk, delay or expense, the surety has a right to call upon the creditor to do the most he can for his benefit." Chancellor Kent, in Ward v. Hayes, 4 Johns. Ch. 132, traces this right of the surety to the civil law. By the Justinian code, "sureties were allowed to require that before they were sued, the principal debtors should, at their expense, be prosecuted to judgment and execution." But he says he cannot find any sufficient authority in the equity jurisprudence of England to lay down any such general rule, although special circumstances would justify the application of it. Mr. Justice Story (2 Eq. Jur., § 849,) comments on these cases without adopting any positive conclusion. In Wright v. Simpson, he says Lord Eldon admitted the right under some circumstances. "But, then, in such case the surety is compellable to deposit the money in court for the payment of the creditor." So that, in fact, it is but an indirect subrogation to the right of the creditor upon a virtual payment of the debt by such deposit.

It is now well settled, that upon payment of the debt by the surety, he may have his action against the principal without the aid of this court. [Fraser v. Goode] 3 Rich. 199: [Stinson v. Brennan] Cheves 15. Such aid is only necessary when he seeks to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor whose debt he has satisfied—to stand in his place, or avail himself of his securities.

But the surety, as is said in Hayes v.

Ward, guarantees the *performance of the contract by his principal—"it is his business to see whether the principal pays." From a very early day the right of the surety to invoke the aid of this court has been sanctioned, without challenge, by the masters in the law. In 1683 Lord Keeper North speaks thus familiarly of the principle and the reason of it: "He compared the case before him to the case of a counter-bond, where, although the surety is not troubled or molested for the debt, yet at any time after the money becomes payable on the original bond, this court will decree the principal to discharge the debt; it being unreasonable that a man should always have such a cloud hang over him." Runelaugh v. Hayes, 1 Vern. 189. So, in Nesbil v. Smith, 2 H. Bl. 579, the principal debtor and the surety had joined in the same bond, but the evidence showed that the plaintiff was merely surety for the principal debtor (Maynard.) "What is the equity," said Lord Thurlow, "in respect of the surety in the bond? That a surety, generally speaking, may come into this court, and apply for the purpose of compelling the principal debtor, for whom he is surety, to pay in the money and deliver him from the obligation. But this case differs from the common case, which forces the surety into this court to be so relieved," &c.

In Lee v. Rook, Moseley 318, Sir Joseph Jekyll, Master of the Rolls, is reported to say: "If I borrow money on a mortgage of my estate for another, I may come into equity (as every surety may against his principal) to have my estate disencumbered by him."

The cause of action in the principal case is a sealed instrument for the payment of a sum certain on demand, and the character of the plaintiff as surety appears on the face of the instrument. In Antrobus v. Smith, 3 Mer. 569, Sir William Grant, Master of the Rolls, says: "It is true that a surety may come to compel the principal to relieve him of his liability by paying off the debt." But he declined to apply the rule to the case before him, (which was that of a bond of indemnity,) "because there was no evidence that any sum of money in particular was, at that time, actually due by the principals." In Pride v. Boyce, Rice Eq. 386 [33 Am. Dec. 78], Chancellor Harper, speaking for the Court of Appeals, says: "It is sufficiently settled that to entitle himself to a *remedy against his principal, the surety is not bound first to pay off the debt." He refers to the foregoing opinion of Sir William Grant as stating accurately the principle, to wit, that the surety may compel the principal to relieve him by paying off the debt. "The complainant," proceeds Chancellor Harper, "comes for this purpose in the present case, and his right to do so is not questioned." Looking to these authorities, the principle is thus announced by Mr. Justice Story, Section 849: "Another case of the application of the remedial justice of courts of equity by a bill quia timet, is in cases of sureties of debtors and others. If a surety, after the debt has become due, has any apprehension of loss or injury from the delay of the creditor to enforce the debt against the principal debtor, he may file a bill of this sort to compel the debtor to discharge the debt or other obligation for which the surety is responsible."

It is not enough to say that, in case of danger, the creditor would be sufficiently vigilant for his own sake. He may rest satisfied with the security, or he may have interests antagonistic to those of the surety, and may not be unwilling to indulge the principal creditor, if those interests can be subserved. But, whatever may be the reasons, the principle, as declared by the court in Pride v. Boyce, is "sufficiently settled."

This court is therefore of opinion that there was error in the decree of the Circuit Court dismissing the plaintiff's bill, and the same is reversed, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court.

Decree reversed.

WARDLAW and INGLIS, A. J.'s, concurred.

JANE CHILDERS v. VERNER & STRIBLING and ELIZA A. EARLE.

Before Mackey, J., at Oconee, March, 1878.

The complaint is as follows:

*The plaintiff, complaining against the defendants, John D. Verner and William J. Stribling, doing business as merchants in the towns of Walhalla and Westminster, in the state and county aforesaid, under the name, firm, and style of Verner & Stribling, and Eliza A. Earle, shows to the court as follows:

1. That on or about the day of , 1876, one John C. McFall and James W. Earle, agent of Eliza A. Earle, entered into a written contract of lease or rent, by which McFall obliged himself to cultivate a portion of Mrs. Earle's farm, situate in the county and state aforesaid, and lying on Changer creek, waters of Tugaloo river; and thereupon entered upon the execution of his said contract.

2. That on the 10th day of February, 1876, the said John C. McFall entered into a written contract with plaintiff and her family to work the land leased or rented from Mr. Earle, in words and figures following, to wit:

"An agreement between John C. McFall, on the one part, and Jane Childers on the other: I, John C. McFall, agree to give the said Jane Childers one-third of every part of the crop they may raise, after the rent is paid.

The said McFall agrees to be at all expense for mule, tools, &c. Also, if necessary, to advance some for the said Jane Childers. Jane agrees to do the said McFall's cooking and washing extra of wages. The said Jane Childers agrees to pay for one-third of fertilizers used in making the crop. Witness our hands and seals, this February 10th, 1876.

"John C. McFall, [L. S.]

"Jane X Childers, [L. S.]

mark

"Witness: J. W. Earle."

3. That on the day of June, 1876, McFall abandoned the place he had leased or rented, and thereby imposed the burden of working the crop on plaintiff and her family.

4. That on the day of , 1876, James W. Earle, as agent of Eliza A. Earle, after the abandonment of the crop by McFall, agreed verbally to and with plaintiff to give her, in addition to her contract with McFall, a sufficiency of the crop to *make her share of the same one-half of the whole amount grown on the said premises. And plaintiff alleges that as a laborer she has a prior lien on the entire crop made on the land rented by McFall to secure her one-half thereof, as provided by the "Revised Statutes of the State of South Carolina," page 491.

5. That on the day of , 1876, defendants, Verner & Stribling, secured from McFall a lien for supplies to make his crop, and advanced to him more or less thereon—the amount and particulars of which are unknown to plaintiff.

6. That on the 10th day of October, A. D. 1876, defendants, Verner & Stribling, improperly and illegally entered the premises rented to her by McFall, gathered and hauled therefrom about one hundred bushels of corn, worth $75, and two thousand pounds of seed cotton, worth $60, making altogether $125; and to her damage beside the sum of $300.

Wherefore, plaintiff demands judgment against Verner & Stribling for the sum of $125, with interest from the 10th day of October, A. D. 1876, the value of the crop illegally taken away by them; and $300 damages sustained by her in the improper and illegal removal of the crop as aforesaid, and for the costs of this action.

The defendants, Verner & Stribling, demurred, upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The defendant, Earle, answered. The demurrer was sustained, and plaintiffs appealed to this court.

Messrs. McGowan & Thompson, for appellant.

Facts stated are sufficient. 8 S. C. 103; 7 S. C. 290. Having no warrant from the clerk, Verner & Stribling were mere trespassers. Gen. Stat. 539. But even with warrant, they could not seize crop of sub-tenant upon which their supplies were not expended. And if they could take crop of McFall's sub-tenant, they could not take crop of one who had no connection with McFall, but held original lease from the land-owner. It is of no concern to defendants, mere outsiders, whether plaintiff's contract was verbal, or in writing. 6 S. C. 297; 8 S. C. 68. Plaintiff, under any view, had lien for one-third of the crop.

*Messrs. J. J. Norton and J. S. Verner, for respondents.

1. Having no privity of contract with plaintiff, these defendants could not be, and are not, sued in assumpsit, but are sued in tort, as we suppose trespass on real estate, the severing, taking and carrying away of the crop, showing merely the amount of actual damage sustained, the ungathered crop being part of the freehold. If so, then being merely a laborer, hired to work on the premises, she cannot maintain this action. She does not even allege possession. Chit. Pl. *170, 175.

2. Nor can she maintain trespass against us in reference to the crop, if personalty. Its ownership was in defendant, Earle. 2 Bail. 581; 1 Hill 364. Plaintiff does not even allege, and the law will not imply, that she was in possession as bailee. Stephens N. P. 2637.

3. Plaintiff has no lien. She has abandoned the McFall contract. The contract with defendant, Earle, was not in writing. 8 S. C. 63.

4. If she has a lien, her remedy is not personal against the persons who may at some time have been in possession of the crop, but on the crop itself. Bail. 237; Rev. Stat. 491.

5. Plaintiff does not allege that defendant, Earle, has not paid her, and as she asks no judgment against that defendant, it is fair to presume that she has been paid, and this view is further strengthened by the answer of Earle, alleging that plaintiff is indebted to her.

April 23d, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. The defendants, Verner & Stribling, demurred, on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained by the Circuit Judge, and from that order the appeal is taken. The complaint is defective, but the question is whether the defect is substantial. The objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action like that to the jurisdiction of the court, may be taken at any time. Code, § 171; Rev. Stat. 605. The defect, therefore, must be of a kind that cannot be cured except by allegations in the answer, which, together with the complaint, may serve to make up a cause of *action. It is argued that the rule is that pleadings must be construed strongly against the pleader. Such a rule is expressly forbidden by Section 182 of the code, (Rev. Stat. 608,) which directs that "in the construction of a pleading for the purpose of determining its effect, its allegations shall be liberally construed, with a view of substantial justice between the parties."

The generally adopted rule is thus stated: "The true doctrine to be gathered from all the cases is that if the substantial facts which constitute a cause of action, are stated in a complaint or petition, or can be inferred by reasonable intendment from the matters which are set forth, although the allegations of these facts are imperfect, incomplete and defective, such insufficiency pertaining, however, to the form rather than to the substance, the proper mode of correction is not by demurrer nor by excluding evidence at the trial, but by a motion before the trial to make the averments more definite and complete by amendment. * * * Thus, if instead of alleging the issuable facts, the pleader should state the evidence of such facts, or even a portion only thereof, unless the omission was so extensive that no cause of action at all was indicated, or if he should aver conclusions of law in place of fact, the resulting insufficiency and imperfection would pertain to the form rather than to the substance, and the mode of correction would be by a motion and not by demurrer." Pom. on Rem. 592–4.

The sixth paragraph of the complaint in this case is as follows: "That on the 10th day of October, A. D. 1876, defendants, Verner & Stribling, improperly and illegally entered the premises rented to her (the plaintiff) by McFall, gathered and hauled therefrom about one hundred bushels of corn, worth seventy-five dollars, and two thousand pounds of seed cotton, worth sixty dollars, making altogether one hundred and twenty-five dollars, and to her damage beside the sum of three hundred dollars." This is followed by the usual demand for judgment as against Verner & Stribling, there being no demand for judgment against the other defendant, E. A. Earle. If the sixth paragraph had been all, except the first or introductory portion of the complaint and prayer for judgment, the cause of action could have hardly been questioned. The complaint would have been to the effect that *the defendant unlawfully entered upon the plaintiff's premises and took therefrom, or rather "gathered" and removed therefrom, so much of the crop of corn and cotton, worth so much, and to the damage of the plaintiff. Those facts, certainly, constitute a cause of action. If it should be objected by the defendant that the description of the premises is not sufficiently particular, that must be done by motion, and the plaintiff be requested to amend. Code, § 183; Rev. Stat. 608. But the defendants argue that the plaintiff cannot claim to be the tenant in possession of the premises mentioned in the sixth paragraph, for the reason that in the preceding paragraphs she has described the land as the property of E. A. Earle, and that it was leased to McFall, and that she sets up no lease from McFall to herself; that the contract between her and McFall (made part of Paragraph 2) gives her no right in the land, and that in Paragraphs 3 and 4 the ownership and possession are both admitted to be in E. A. Earle. All that might be so, but it is not alleged in Paragraph 6 that the premises therein mentioned are the same lands as those before described, and when parties make technical objections they may be technically met. But such is not the spirit of the new mode of procedure. Pleadings are not to be technically or rigorously construed, but with a view of substantial justice between the parties. The plaintiff, in this case, has stated facts in the sixth paragraph which constitute a sufficient cause of action. She has further, in other paragraphs, made recitals which are entirely unnecessary, but which lay open her case fully to the defendants. The demurrer seems to have been allowed upon the ground that the allegations in these other paragraphs negative the allegations in the sixth paragraph. But that proposition cannot be sustained. As evidence, those paragraphs may not be sufficient to establish the sixth; that, however, is no evidence that the plaintiff has no other proof. But it is proper to consider those paragraphs in the light of allegations of facts to constitute causes of action, and they constitute imperfect statements of several different grounds. The plaintiff claims judgment on any of the grounds that she may establish, either as part owner of the crop, under her contract with McFall, or as laborer *in the employ of Earle, or as a bailee, or as a tenant of the premises and owner of the crop.

The defendants might have demanded separate and more distinct statements, but their demurrer cannot be allowed.

Judgment reversed. Motion granted.

WILLARD, C. J., concurred.

McIVER, A. J. As I am unable to concur in the conclusion which has been reached by a majority of the court, I will proceed to state, briefly, the reasons for my dissent.

I do not regard the objection raised by the demurrer as a technical but rather as a substantial objection. It seems to me that giving to the various allegations of the complaint the most liberal construction, as is required by the provisions of the code, it is impossible to conclude that sufficient facts are stated to give the plaintiff a cause of action. On the contrary, the facts stated show not only that the plaintiff has no cause of action, but that, assuming those facts to be true, the right of action is in the defendant, Mrs. Earle, or in McFall, if he has not abandoned his lease. If the action be regarded as an action for damages done to real estate, there is no allegation that the plaintiff had title to or possession of such real estate. So if the action be regarded as an action for damages for taking the personal property mentioned in the complaint, there is a like absence of any allegation that the plaintiff had possession of or was entitled to such personal property. On the contrary, the allegations in the complaint show clearly that the real estate and personal property referred to was the property of Mrs. Earle or of McFall, and if any wrong was done by the defendants, Verner & Stribling, it was done to Mrs. Earle or McFall, and not to the plaintiff. By the express terms of the written agreement between the plaintiff and McFall, set out in the complaint, which was afterwards adopted by Mrs. Earle, the only change being an increase in the amount to be given plaintiff, the plaintiff was a mere hireling for wages, the amount of which was fixed, not in money, but in a certain proportion of the crop, and she had no interest in or authority over the land or the crop, but only a right to claim a certain pro*portion of the crop, or its value, as a compensation for her labor. The land, as well as the crop, was Mrs. Earle's or McFall's, and for any trespass committed upon either, the right of action was in Mrs. Earle or McFall, and not in the plaintiff. Rogers v. Collier, 2 Bail. 581 [23 Am. Dec. 153]; State v. Gay, 1 Hill 364; Holcombe v. Townsend, 1 Hill 399.

The subsequent case of Burgess v. Carpenter, 2 S. C. 7 [16 Am. Rep. 643] is not in conflict with these cases, because, although the Circuit judge, in that case, did rest his decision upon the ground that "the contract to pay Henry Burgess a share in the crop made him a copartner and not a servant," the Supreme Court does not place its decision upon any such ground, but upon the ground that the common law gives no right of action to the master for any injury done to the servant, except where the servant is a menial one; and that as Henry Burgess was "exclusively concerned in the cultivation of the soil and the products arising therefrom, and there being no domestic caste in the nature of his service, (which, it had been argued, was the test of menial service,) he does not fall within the class to which the term 'servant' can in any sense be applied." The case does not touch the question as to whether a person employed to cultivate a crop under a contract that his services shall be compensated by giving him a certain portion of the crop instead of a specific amount of money, is a partner or a mere employé.

I do not think the allegations contained in the sixth paragraph of the complaint, can be regarded as stating a separate cause of action. The rule is, that while a plaintiff may combine in one complaint several distinct causes of action, under certain restrictions, not necessary to be adverted to here, yet these different causes of action must be stated separately, in order that the defendant may plead to them separately, if necessary or desirable. Indeed, I do not suppose that the plaintiff intended the statement in that paragraph as an allegation of a separate cause of action, or as an allegation of facts at all, but rather as a statement of the legal conclusion which the plaintiff drew from the facts previously stated than a statement of independent facts.

I think, therefore, that the demurrer was properly sustained, and that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

Judgment reversed.

1. Richardson v. Chappell, 6 S. C. 146, and Haynsworth v. Bischoff, 6 S. C. 159, explained.

[2. Descent and Distribution ⟸134.]

A mortgage by the heir-at-law of land inherited is not such an alienation within the meaning of 3 and 4 W. & M., 2 Stat. 533, as will defeat the claims of the decedent's creditors, so long as the mortgagor retains the possession. See Simons v. Bryce, 10 S. C. 354.

But where, upon condition broken, the mortgagee takes possession of the land, under a power given in the mortgage, the mortgage thereupon operates as an alienation.

A power of sale, in case of default, contained in such mortgage, but unexercised, would not be an alienation; but a sale under decree of foreclosure would be.

[6. Mortgages ⟸497.]

A decree, from which no appeal was taken, directed a foreclosure and sale at a future day, unless a specified sum was previously paid, with the privilege to plaintiff, in case of deficiency, to enroll his decree and issue execution for

[This case is also cited in Freer v. Tupper, 21 S. C. 75, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Wallace, J., at Charleston, March, 1878.

This was an action commenced in January, 1876, by the plaintiff, a bond creditor of Mary Raymond, deceased, against H. H. Raymond, her son and sole heir, defendant, and to which action several other parties were made defendants, some being creditors of Mary Raymond, and others holding mortgages executed by H. H. Raymond, after his mother's death, upon lands descended. The complaint prayed judgment for plaintiff's debt, a marshaling of Mary Raymond's assets, sale of property, application of the proceeds, first, to Mary Raymond's debts, and remainder to H. *H. Raymond's debts, and the appointment of a receiver. All of the defendants answered.

The plaintiff held three bonds, made and executed to him by Mary Raymond and H. H. Raymond, in 1852, 1854 and 1855, respectively. B. J. Whaley, trustee under marriage settlement of H. H. Raymond and wife, held a joint and several bond of H. H. Raymond and Mary Raymond, dated in 1859, which was in the possession of H. H. Raymond from 1864 to 1875, placed there by the trustee for safe keeping. The executors of Charles Astor Bristed held bond of Mary Raymond and H. H. Raymond for $10,000, secured by mortgage of Mary Raymond, duly recorded, on two lots of land in Charleston. These lots were sold under proper proceedings subsequent to death of Mary Raymond. These two lots of land are not affected by this action, and this claim was not made the subject of exception to the referee's report or to the Circuit decree. The only other claim proven against Mary Raymond is the judgment in favor of W. M. Thomas—all the facts connected with which are fully reported in Thomas v. Raymond, 4 S. C. 347, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, in 1 Otto 712. Upon the rendition of Chancellor Carroll's decree in that case, and before the time for sale as therein ordered, Thomas enrolled a money decree in Greenville district for the whole amount found by the decree to be due him, and upon such enrolled decree issued his execution and lodged it in the sheriff's office in Greenville, January 9th, 1868, and in the sheriff's office in Charleston, December 14th, 1868.

In February, 1869, Mary Raymond died intestate, possessed of several valuable improved lots of land in the city of Charleston, and leaving her son, H. H. Raymond, her sole heir-at-law. She left very little personal property, and no administration has been had on her estate. After the death of Mary Raymond, the said H. H. Raymond entered into the possession of all his mother's real estate, and enjoyed the rents and profits of the same.

From June, 1870, to July, 1875, H. H. Raymond executed several mortgages upon this descended real property, to secure debts due by himself, individually, some of them being second *mortgages. At the time these mortgages were given, none of the mortgagees had any knowledge or notice of the existence of the debts due to plaintiff and to Whaley, trustee, and none of them, except Rice and Gayer, had any knowledge of the judgment or claim of W. M. Thomas.

Some of the mortgages contained a power of sale in case of default, and some were foreclosed under order of court before this action was brought. In the mortgage to A. G. Rice there was a covenant that in case of failure to pay principal or interest of the bond secured by this mortgage, or to pay bonds secured by prior outstanding mortgages upon the same property executed by H. H. Raymond, or to pay taxes, that the mortgagee might "peaceably enter into, have, hold, use, occupy, possess and enjoy the said premises above mentioned, and collect all rents, issues and profits of the same, and of every part thereof, and apply the money arising therefrom to the payment," &c. Under this power Rice entered and took possession of the premises in January, 1876.

The tenants of the property mortgaged to W. J. Gayer were required by H. H. Raymond to pay over the rents thereof to Gayer.

Judgments entered up against H. H. Raymond, and unsecured debts due by him, were also presented and proven in this cause. Mary Raymond having died before confirmation of sale of the land mortgaged to W. M. Thomas, the action was renewed against H. H. Raymond as one having in possession the estate of Mary Raymond. He appeared and resisted the confirmation; but the sale was confirmed by order of Judge Orr, and judgment given against H. H. Raymond for balance due, after crediting the net proceeds of sale. A transcript of this judgment was lodged in Charleston, and it is one of the judgments proven in this cause.

The issues of law and fact were referred to G. D. Bryan, Esq., as special referee. After setting out fully the facts, his report concludes as follows:

The following are the issues of law. It is claimed by the plaintiff, John D. Warren, by B. J. Whaley, trustee, and Wm. M. Thomas, that holding claims against Mary Raymond they *are entitled to be paid out of the property owned by her at the time of her death, before the mortgages made by her heir, Henry H. Raymond, can be paid. So far as John D. Warren and B. J. Whaley are concerned, they had no lien on the property descended, and if the mortgages by Henry H. Raymond to the several mortgagees above named are such alienations of the property as is required by the statute, then they, the said John D. Warren and B. J. Whaley, trustee, cannot take precedence of the said mortgagees. This question is settled by the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of this state, in one of which (Richardson v. Chappell, 6 S. C. 146,) it is held that under the Stat. 3 and 4 W. & M., and 5 Geo. II., ch. VII., lands purchased from a devisee are not liable for the debts of the devisor when the purchase was bona fide for valuable consideration and without notice; and in the other (Haynsworth v. Bischoff, 6 S. C. 159), it is held that a mortgagee of lands is a purchaser within the meaning of the statute which protects a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. I therefore find as matter of law, that John D. Warren and B. J. Whaley, trustee, are not entitled to be paid as against the mortgagees. The judgment of W. M. Thomas, as against Mary Raymond, stands on a different footing. The real estate of Mary Raymond descended to Henry H. Raymond, bound by the lien of the execution against her lodged in the sheriff's office for Charleston county in December, 1868, and any subsequent alienations by Henry H. Raymond could not divest the lien of this execution. It has been urged by the counsel for the mortgagees, that the decree upon which this execution was issued was improperly and irregularly enrolled.

This may be true as a matter of fact, but it cannot be questioned or set aside in this collateral action, and until set aside by the court in which it was obtained and entered, is binding upon the estate of Mary Raymond, and is entitled to be paid in preference to the mortgages made by Henry H. Raymond, beginning with those last given by him.

The defendant, Wm. M. Thomas, also claims that his judgment of the November, 1873, should take precedence of the mortgages of A. G. Rice and Wm. J. Gayer, and the claims of Warren and of Whaley, trustee. This judgment is against H. *H. Raymond individually, and the only question is, does such a judgment constitute an alienation which would defeat the claims of creditors of the ancestor? There is no precedent by which to be governed or guided, but it seems to me that something more is required to divest the heir of the estate by inheritance to defeat the claims of the ancestor's creditors—and though Thomas is entitled to recover under his judgment against Mary Raymond, he must be, under this judgment, postponed to the claims of Warren and Whaley, trustee, who were the creditors of the ancestors, and the same rule should be applied to the other judgments set forth above. As the judgment of Thomas v. Mary Raymond will absorb the entire proceeds of sale of the premises covered by the mortgage to Wm. J. Gayer, it is unnecessary to consider the question between him, the said Wm. J. Gayer, and the other judgment creditors.

The judgment held by Samuel Lord, Jr., assignee, and the People's Bank of South Carolina, having been released in favor of A. G. Rice, they have nothing upon which to operate, as all of the property, with the exception of that mortgaged to Wm. J. Gayer, was mortgaged before the entry of the said judgments.

Having found that the afore-mentioned mortgagees are purchasers bona fide for a valuable consideration, and without notice of any claim except that held by Wm. M. Thomas, of the estate received by Henry H. Raymond from Mary Raymond, the proceeds of the sale of the said estate should be applied as follows, to wit: * * *

The mortgages held by Maria S. Hopkins, Douglas Nisbit and the executors of Bristed having been foreclosed and the property sold thereunder, should not be disturbed, as they stand on the same footing with the other mortgages; and further, even if the claims of Warren and Whaley, trustee, had been allowed, would not be affected thereby.

I have already stated as matter of fact, that the judgment held by Thomas is claimed by his assignee in bankruptcy, A. Blythe, Esq., and as the question between them is pending in another and proper tribunal, I have not thought it proper to report upon this matter in this proceeding.

*The mortgagees of H. H. Raymond excepted to the findings of fact and law upon the judgment claim of W. M. Thomas. The plaintiff and Whaley, trustee, also excepted, upon the ground that there was error in postponing debts due by Mary Raymond to the mortgages executed by her heir after her death.

The decree of the Circuit judge is as follows:

On hearing the report of the referee herein and the argument of counsel, it is ordered—

1. That so much of the report as states matters of fact be confirmed.

2. That so much of the report as finds as matters of law that the claims of John D. Warren and B. J. Whaley, trustee, are postponed to the claims of lien creditors of Mary Raymond and mortgage creditors of H. H. Raymond, is confirmed and ordered to stand as the judgment of the court.

3. That so much of said report as finds that the judgment creditors of H. H. Raymond are postponed to the creditors of the estate of Mary Raymond, so far as funds realized from that part of the estate of Mary Raymond that went into the hands of H. H. Raymond are concerned, is confirmed.

In the year 1863, Mary Raymond purchased from William M. Thomas a house and lot in the town of Greenville, and executed her note, secured by a mortgage of the premises, for the purchase money.

In 1866, Thomas filed his bill in the Court of Equity for Greenville county, for foreclosure of the mortgage and the enforcement of the payment of the note.

Some proceedings were had in the cause before Chancellor Johnson, which are reported in the case of Thomas v. Raymond, 4 S. C. 347.

In the month of January, 1868, the cause came on to be heard before Chancellor Carroll. On the 16th of that month the commissioner of the court reported that there was due upon the note on the 16th January, 1868, the sum of $3371.24, including costs. On the 22d of the same month Chancellor Carroll signed a decree, confirming the report of the commissioner, directing the mortgaged property to be sold on sales-day in March ensuing, and the equity of redemption to be barred and *foreclosed, unless the mortgaged debt was paid before that time, and directing the distribution of the proceeds of the sale, and granting leave to issue execution for the balance of the debt, if the proceeds of the sale should prove insufficient to pay and discharge it.

Did Thomas have the right to enroll this decree and issue execution upon it? The A. A. 1840, (11 Stat. at Large 116, 23,) * * "Provided, nevertheless, that any party in whose favor a decree or order for the payment of money, may be made, may cause such order or decree to be enrolled at any time within a year and a day after making the same;" and the proviso goes on to prescribe the way in which this shall be done. Then if this was a money decree, Thomas had the right to enroll it.

Was it a money decree?

In Blake v. Heyward, Bail. Eq. 208, Judge O'Neall, with the concurrence of Judges Johnson and Harper, says: "The decree in the case before us establishes a sum of money to be due by the defendants in the original bill, and not only subjects the land in dispute to the payment of it, but also directs that the balance, if any, after the sale of the land, shall be paid out of the estate of their testator. It is, therefore, a decree for the payment of money, and has a lien from the time it was pronounced, on all his real estate."

This is exactly what Chancellor Carroll's decree did. It is therefore, a money decree, and could be properly enrolled under the A. A. 1840.

The decree in Blake v. Heyward, was pronounced in 1831. The act of 1840 made enrolling necessary to bind third parties by the lien of a money decree.

The Chancellor having pronounced a money decree, had no power to suspend Thomas' right to enroll it, when to enroll it was necessary to give to it the virtue of a lien upon the estate of the defendant, and when his right to enroll was derived from a statute of the state. The purport of the decree amounted to this, that if Thomas chose to delay enrolling his decree until after the sale, then he might require the commissioner to issue execution for a sum different from that adjudged due by the *court and ascertained by deducting the amount realized by the sale from the amount fixed by the decree.

To say that the effect of the decree was to prevent Thomas from enrolling his decree until after the sale, is to say that the Chancellor could suspend a statutory right, and thus by allowing other rights to intervene, defeat Thomas' lien upon the balance of defendant's estate.

Thomas, then, could properly enroll his decree immediately upon its being signed.

Did he enroll it?

There is in evidence a paper purporting to be a copy of the decree of Chancellor Carroll. The paper also contains an abstract of the decree signed by Messrs. Perry & Perry, Solicitors for Thomas.

Upon the copy of the abstract are written the words, "Abstract of decree to be enrolled." "Filed 30th January, 1868, J. P. Moore, C. E. G. D." There is also the certificate of the clerk of the court for Greenville county, that the paper is a correct copy of original, on file in his office. It therefore appears that an abstract of the decree was filed in the proper office, and it is to be presumed that all the steps necessary after the filing, to make the paper an enrolled decree, were regularly and properly taken and done until the contrary is made to appear.

"And no order or decree for the payment of money shall, as to third persons, without express notice, have any effect as a lien on the estate, real or personal, of any person or estate intended to be bound thereby, but from the day when the said abstract shall have been delivered or lodged with the said register or commissioner as aforesaid," &c. See A. A. 1840, 11 Stat. at Large 116.

The decree having been enrolled became a lien upon all the property of defendant, from the 30th day of January, 1868, in Greenville county. Blake v. Heyward, Bail. Eq. 213; Woddrop v. Price, 3 Desaus. 203.

Decrees for the payment of money bind land in the same manner as judgments at law. They have a lien from the date of enrollment upon all the real estate of defendant in the county where enrolled.

*Now that an enrolled decree constitutes a lien on land, because the party in whose favor it was pronounced has the right to enforce it by execution, is too well settled to be discussed now. If he did not have the right to issue execution upon it, it would not be a lien. Decrees of the nature of the one under discussion are money decrees; when enrolled execution may issue. Therefore, the enrolled decree is a lien. Now, Thomas having a lien upon the property of defendant in Greenville, desired to establish his lien against her property, in Charleston. Under the A. A. 1789, he could have given to his decree a lien all over the state by filing his decree in the clerk's office at Charleston, and issuing and lodging his execution there. He did not do that, but issued and lodged there an execution upon his decree enrolled in Greenville.

Did this execution bind the defendant's real estate in Charleston county?

The A. A. 1849, (11 Stat. 582), enacts "That from and after the passage of this act, no judgment nor any execution issued thereon shall, as against any creditor or creditors of the party or parties against whom such judgment shall have been obtained by confession or otherwise, or against any purchaser or purchasers for valuable consideration, have any lien on the property or any part thereof of any such party, except in the district where the judgment is first entered and execution lodged, until an execution issued thereon be lodged in the proper office in the district wherein such party usually resides at the time when such judgment was obtained," &c.

At the time this act was passed executions lodged in the proper office in any district in the state bound personal property in all the districts of the state, and judgments obtained in any district and filed in the proper office in Charleston bound the real estate of the defendant in any district in the state. This state of the law was productive of manifest inconvenience, and rendered easy the practice of fraud and imposition by the creation of liens in other districts than that in which the defendant resided, that bound his property in the district where he did reside, and of which the parties with whom he would probably mostly deal were ignorant.

*In my opinion, the act of 1849 was passed to remedy this patent evil, and provided that liens should be extended from any district to the district in which the defendant resided, by lodging execution in the latter district, and only by that means, and that the lien of a judgment, as well as the lien of an execution, could be extended by simply lodging the execution, and the execution, when lodged, bound both real and personal estate. It therefore follows that the execution lodged by Thomas in Charleston, in 1868, was a lien upon the real property of Mary Raymond, in that county.

Whether the execution lodged by Thomas in Charleston, in 1868, was, if not a lien, at least such notice to the subsequent alienees of Mary Raymond and H. H. Raymond, as to defeat the defence of innocent purchasers without notice, need not in this decree be discussed.

Subsequent to the lodgment of execution by Thomas, in 1868, Mary Raymond executed to Charles Astor Bristed a mortgage of certain real estate to secure a bond payable to him, and bearing even date with the mortgage, to wit, January 1st, 1869. To this mortgage the lien of Thomas', execution is postponed. Bank v. Howard & Garmany, 1 Strob. Eq. 174.

Mrs. Mary Raymond died in February, 1869. Her estate was cast upon her only son and heir, H. H. Raymond. All the subsequent encumbrances upon what had been the property of Mary Raymond were created by him. To none of these is Thomas' lien postponed. For, at her death, Thomas' lien covered all her estate, and mortgagees took their lien subject to that. At the moment of her death the rank and status of her debts were fixed by law, and will be paid by this court, according to their priorities, nor can the rules of administration be varied by the acts of the heir, to the extent of allowing a preference to liens created by him to liens upon the property existing when the property came into his hands.

The proceedings in the cause of Thomas v. Raymond, subsequent to the final decree of Chancellor Carroll, all grew out of the peculiar condition of affairs in this state at that time. These proceedings it is not necessary to discuss in this decree, the cause having been disembarrassed of them by the recent decree of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the cause of Raymond *v. Thomas, further than to say that the confirmation of the report of sale by Judge Orr, was not necessary to authorize Thomas to issue execution, and that the order of Judge Orr that Thomas should have judgment for the balance of the amount of his debt after the sale gave Thomas no rights or remedies that he did not already have under the decree of Chancellor Carroll. It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed—

1. That out of the proceeds of the property sold by order of the court in this cause, and out of the property mortgaged to Maria S. Hopkins and Douglas Nesbit, the amount due upon the execution in the case of W. M. Thomas v. Mary Raymond be paid, by each piece of property, or the amount that it brought at the sale ratably and in proportion.

2. That the sum, so to be paid, be paid to the person to whom it shall finally be adjudged to belong under the proceedings to that end now pending in the United States Court for the district of South Carolina.

3. That such person, when ascertained, have leave to levy said execution upon the property mortgaged, as aforesaid to the said Maria Hopkins and Douglas Nesbit, guardian, for its proportionate part of said execution.

4. That next after the Thomas execution of 1868, above referred to, is paid and satisfied, or a sum sufficient to pay and satisfy the same, is in the hands of George S. Bryan, referee herein, then the mortgagees of H. H. Raymond are entitled to receive the balance of the proceeds of the sale of the property for which they had mortgages respectively, and in those cases where there are two or more mortgages on the same piece of property, that the proceeds of the sale thereof be applied to such mortgages, according to their priorities.

5. That next after the mortgagees of Henry Raymond, that the creditors of Mrs. Raymond be paid according to the rank and priorities of their debts.

6. That next after the creditors of Mrs. Mary Raymond, the creditors of H. H. Raymond be paid according to the rank and priorities of their debts.

7. That it be referred to W. D. Porter, master, to inquire and report to this court, according to the scheme of this decree, the amount of the execution in Thomas v. Raymond, the ratable *and proportionate amount to be contributed to the payment of the sum out of the sums realized by the different pieces of property upon which it is herein deemed to be a first lien, and that he do report the debts of Mary Raymond and H. H. Raymond, according to their rank and priorities, under this decree.

8. That the costs of this action be first paid.

The plaintiff and Whaley, trustee, appealed to this court upon the ground:

Because his Honor the presiding judge has erred in decreeing that the mortgages executed by the defendant, Henry H. Raymond, during his lifetime, were such alienations of the real property of his ancestor, Mary Raymond, as entitled the holders thereof to priority in payment out of the proceeds of the sales of such property made herein, over the bonds of such ancestor held by these appellants.

The mortgagees appealed—

1. Because his Honor erred in holding that a money decree was properly entered up by Thomas, in Greenville, and that the same created a lien as against the mortgagees.

2. Because, if the same had created a lien, the lien of the same was destroyed when Thomas elected to proceed in the second suit, and under the second suit by Thomas there was created no lien as against this defendant.

3. Because, even if the first judgment was a lien, his Honor erred in holding that the earlier mortgages should contribute with the later towards paying the amount of the said judgment, the rule being fixed since Sir William Herbert's case, 3 Coke, 11 b, that as the defendant is entitled against the mortgagor to throw the mortgagor on the unmortgaged premises, he must necessarily have the same right as against all parties, whose claims under or against the debtor are subsequent to his own, which said rule has been sustained by an unbroken series of decisions, and to which rule, as reported by the referee in his report, no exception was taken.

April 25th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The plaintiff, Warren, a bond creditor of Mary Raymond, deceased, brought this action against H. H. Raymond, her heir-at-law, to whom her lands descended, claiming such lands as assets descended in the hands of the heir of the obligor, liable to the payment of her debt. He has made various parties defendants with the heir, alleging that they make various claims to the land either under the ancestor, Mary Raymond, or under H. H. Raymond, his heir-at-law. His prayer for judgment is that his debt may be paid, that the creditors of Mary Raymond and of H. H. Raymond be enjoined from attempting to enforce their demands against property derived from the ancestor, Mary Raymond, and that the assets of the estate of Mary Raymond be marshaled and the creditors called in to prove their claims, and that all rights and equities be herein adjudicated, and for the appointment of a receiver, and that the property be sold and the proceeds applied, first to the costs of these proceedings, next to the debts of Mary Raymond, and finally to debts of H. H. Raymond. It appears that administration has not been had on the estate of Mary Raymond, nor is that estate represented for the purpose of marshaling its assets. Neither does it appear that the complaint was in the nature of a creditor's bill against H. H. Raymond for the purpose of converting his estate into assets for the purpose of distribution in equity, inasmuch as it does not appear that judgment had been recovered against H. H. Raymond and execution returned nulla bona. Ragsdale v. Holmes, 1 S. C. 91. Primarily the action would have to be regarded as simply that of one brought by the creditors of an intestate against his heir in possession of lands descended for the satisfaction of his debt, the other defendants being joined as individual parties merely. The Circuit decree takes a larger scope than this would seem to indicate, but so far as it is not appealed from or necessarily affected by matters *brought here by appeal, it will not be disturbed as between the present parties. The fundamental proposition on which the Circuit decree rests is at variance with the recent decision of this court in Simons v. Bryce, 10 S. C. 354. The conclusion of the referee, sustained by the decree, was that the mere fact that the heir had mortgaged the lands descended to him, independently of the fact that the mortgagor remained in possession of the descended lands so mortgaged, was sufficient to establish an alienation in the sense of the statute of 3 and 4 W. & M., 2 Stat. 533. We held, in Simons v. Bryce, that while the mortgagor was in possession, the statute of 1791 (Gen. Stat. 536) prevented the mortgage from operating as an alienation. In Richardson v. Chappell, 6 S. C. 146, this court held that bona fide alienation by the devisee defeated the claims of the creditor of the testator against the lands devised; but the referee is inaccurate in stating that case as deciding that the alienee must show that the alienation was for a valuable consideration, and without notice, in order to come within the terms of the statute of 3 and 4 W. & M. In that case the equitable defence of purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice was set up in a suit, in one aspect, in the nature of a bill framed upon the equity of 5 Geo. II. One of the facts in the case was that Simpkins, the purchaser from the devisee, had paid part of the purchase money after notice of the plaintiff's claim, and that in equity he should be made chargeable with the amount thus paid in disregard of the plaintiff's equity. The equitable defence of purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice included all that was necessary to decide the legal as well as the equitable questions involved, and was appropriately considered for that purpose. What was said in that case was not intended as an exposition of the meaning of the phrase bona fide alienation, as used in 3 and 4 W. & M. In Haynsworth v. Bischoff, 6 S. C. 159, the question arose on a plea of purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice interposed to a claim to charge lands of which the title stood in an alienor individually, and not as administrator, as assets of his intestate's estate. The lands were mortgaged to the defendant, who set up the plea of purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice. No question of alienation through a mortgage *was presented in that case. It was held to be immaterial whether any estate passed under the mortgage. In equity the mortgagee was regarded as possessing a right to go upon the land for the payment of the mortgage debt, and this right was subject to protection under the plea of purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice, and that the equitable right was unaffected by the statute that had adopted the views that the court of equity had always held as to the nature of a mortgage. This was far from involving the question of the effect of the legal defence of alienation under the statute of 3 and 4 W. & M., nor does it preclude the court of equity from giving the same construction to that defence as a court of law would give, where arising before it, from the provisions of the statute. The Circuit decree is erroneous to the extent that it rests upon the proposition just considered.

In consequence of the conclusion of the referee and the Circuit judge just referred to, it became unnecessary for them to decide whether the mortgages, set up by way of defence to sustain the plea of bona fide alienation as against the rights of the creditor of the ancestor, commenced to operate by way of transferring the legal title of the mortgagor to the mortgagees by reason of the mortgagor being out of possession, at any time prior to the commencement of this action. There are, therefore, no such findings of fact and conclusions of law on that point as to bring the case before us for a final decree. Indeed, the brief, although exceedingly voluminous, appears to be framed to present the bearing of the facts of the case upon the points actually decided, rather than to present the whole state of facts to this court so that a final decree could be made variant from that appealed from. We can, therefore, do no more than to lay down the principles that should govern such findings, so far as we are enabled to state them from the facts before us.

As it regards the claim under the mortgage of H. H. Raymond to A. G. Rice, the findings of fact of the referee appear sufficiently full to present the question whether such mortgage in virtue of the proceedings had under it operated as an alienation of the lands descended under the statute of 3 and 4 W. & M. These findings do not appear to have been excepted to, and must *stand as final. It appears that the mortgage contained a clause that in case of certain contingencies, among others that of default in the payment of principal or interest on the bond which such mortgage was given to secure, the mortgagee, Rice, "shall and may peaceably enter into, have, hold, use, occupy, possess and enjoy the said premises above mentioned and collect all rents, issues and profits of the same, and every part thereof." Directions were then given as to the application of the money arising therefrom, among other purposes to that of the payment of the principal and interest due on the said bond and mortgage. It appears by the finds of the referee, that under this power the mortgagee, A. G. Rice, entered and took possession of the mortgaged premises on the 14th day of January, 1876, prior to the commencement of this suit, as upon condition broken. It is clear that the mortgagor was out of possession as it regarded such mortgaged premises at the time of the commencement of the present suit. Under such circumstances the decision in the case of Simons v. Bryce is inapplicable, as it regarded the lands so mortgaged and out of the possession of the mortgagor.

The statute of 1791 (5 Stat. 178, Gen. Stat. 536,) only operates to prevent the mortgage from having its due effect at common law while the mortgagor is in possession. The moment that possession passes out of him, in the sense of the statute, title passes through the mortgage under the operation of the statute, and the mortgagor occupies the same position he would have occupied had the statute never been passed. Under such circumstances this mortgage would be competent to work an alienation under the statute of 3 and 4 W. & M. It is claimed here that in order to establish possession out of the mortgagor, it is necessary to show that he has conveyed the mortgaged premises by an absolute deed to a third person, who is in possession under such deed. We have been referred to several cases in this state as supporting such proposition. None of the cases cited, either directly or indirectly, sanction such a conclusion. In Laffan v. Kennedy, 15 Rich. 246, it was held that the mortgagor was not to be considered out of possession so long as the premises were in the possession of a tenant holding under him. This case rests on the familiar principle that the possession of the tenant is the *possession of the landlord in law. Where the mortgage contains authority for the mortgagee to enter upon condition broken and take and hold possession, with the rents and profits, and, after condition broken, is let into such possession by the mortgagor, the latter is clearly out of possession through his own act and deed in the sense of the statute. In that case the mortgage has the force and effect of a mortgage at common law and constitutes an alienation of the mortgaged premises under the statute of 3 and 4 W. & M. As to such alienated premises, the plaintiff cannot follow the land.

There can be no doubt that when property descended is mortgaged by the heir and such mortgage is foreclosed and the property sold under a decree of foreclosure, it is an alienation. The fact that the mortgage contains a power of sale in case of default is unimportant; it must appear that such power of sale has been effectually exercised in order to produce that result.

It appears that, in order to secure a mortgage given by H. H. Raymond to W. J. Gayer, the mortgagor required the tenants of the property covered by the said mortgage to pay over the rents thereof to the said W. J. Gayer. In order to determine whether that transaction was of such a nature as to amount to a surrender of the possession by the mortgagor to the mortgagee, there should have been a finding of fact whether such was the act and intent of the parties. If the mortgagor merely assigned to the mortgagee the interest to grow due from time to time on an outstanding lease, without parting with the reversion, so that he would retain the right to enforce any covenants on the lease, or to make a new lease on the determination thereof, then the mortgagor must be considered as remaining in possession of the mortgaged premises, and the mortgage does not constitute an alienation by the heir. If, on the other hand, the mortgagor surrendered possession of the mortgaged premises to the mortgagee, then the mortgage must be regarded as an alienation. As the true issues were not presented under the view taken by the referee and the Circuit Court, it appears advisable that this question of fact should be passed upon by the Circuit Court under the view presented herein. The same question is raised as to other defendants, *and is subject to the same observation, and should be disposed of in like manner.

W. M. Thomas, in 1868, obtained a decree for the foreclosure of a mortgage made by Mary Raymond, and enrolled such decree as a money decree, and issued executions thereon, in Charleston, during that year, and during the lifetime of Mary Raymond. The Circuit decree holds that the decree in question was a money decree, and was properly enrolled, and that lodging the execution issued thereunder, in Charleston, gave a lien on the lands of Mary Raymond in Charleston. The decree of foreclosure was made by Chancellor Carroll, Jan. 22d, 1868, and contains the provision "that unless the defendant, Mary Raymond, do pay the complainant, William M. Thomas, the sum of three thousand two hundred and sixty-five dollars and sixty-two cents, with interest on the original sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, from the 16th of January, 1868, and the costs of this suit, on or before the sale-day in March next, the commissioner shall proceed to sell the house and lot on that sale-day, or some other convenient sale-day thereafter, at public auction," &c. It further adds: "It is further ordered, that unless the payment is made as above directed, that the defendant's equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises be forever foreclosed." Direction is then given for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale, after which follow these words: "But in case there should not be enough of the purchase money after satisfying the costs to pay the plaintiff the sum reported to be due him, then he shall be allowed to enroll his decree and issue execution against the defendant for the balance." The Circuit judge holds that the decree was properly enrolled on the 30th of January, 1868, by the filing of an abstract of the decree in the proper office on that day. The question then arises whether the filing of an abstract of that decree on the 30th day of January, 1868, was the enrolling of a money decree, competent to create a lien on real estate.

The Circuit decree holds that the decree of Chancellor Carroll was a money decree within the meaning of the following language, cited from Blake v. Heyward, Bail. Eq. 208, viz.: "The decree in the case before us establishes a sum of money to be *due by the defendants in the original bill, and not only subjects the land in dispute to the payment of it, but also directs that the balance, if any, after the sale of the land, shall be paid out of the estate of their testator. It is, therefore, a decree for the payment of money and has a lien, from the time it was pronounced, on all his real estate." This case was decided prior to the act of 1840 requiring enrollment, and is, as the Circuit judge claims, good authority on the point. The decree of Chancellor Carroll differs materially from such a decree as that contemplated in the language from Blake v. Heyward. That case clearly contemplated a decree adjudging a certain sum of money to be personally due from one party to the other, although containing further provisions for enforcing it out of a particular fund, with recourse to a general execution if that fund should be found insufficient. The decree of Chancellor Carroll did not adjudge any amount as presently due. It no doubt implied the existence of a debt, but did not establish it as a present debt, and I know of no authority for issuing an execution to enforce that which is merely implied by a judgment or decree. It gave a certain time after the day on which it was pronounced to the defendant to pay an ascertained sum for the benefit of the complainant, namely, until sale-day in March, 1868, and declared that if such sum was not paid at that time the commissioner should proceed to sell the property. Had a present indebtedness been adjudged these words might have been referred to the delay of the sale merely, but in the absence of such a direct adjudication, and in view of the concluding language of the order, that will presently be considered, the conclusion cannot be resisted that the Chancellor intended for the defendant what was equivalent to a credit on interest until the sale-day in March. The decree also ordered "that unless payment is made as above directed" the defendant's equity of redemption should be barred.

The whole effect of the decree, therefore, if the language and provisions are to speak for themselves, is to impose a duty on the defendant to pay a certain amount at a future day, or, failing to do so, that the mortgaged property should be sold and her equity of redemption barred. Before that day arrived on which the defendant was bound to make such payment, the decree was *attempted to be enrolled and execution issued to the sheriff of Greenville. This was clearly inconsistent with the intention of the decree, which, to place the matter beyond all dispute, concludes with these words: "But in case there should not be enough of the purchase money, after satisfying the costs, to pay the complainant the sum reported to be due him, then he shall be allowed to enroll his decree and issue execution against the defendant for the balance." The whole decree is consistent with itself. It clearly intended to give the defendant until the sale-day in March to pay the money, and for that purpose fixes the proper time for enrolling the decree and issuing execution by the word "then," having relation to the time when the proceeds of the sale should be found insufficient to pay complainant's mortgage debt. To enroll the decree before that time, and seek to enforce immediate payment by execution, was not to enforce, but to disregard, the decree of the court of equity. We are precluded from declaring a decree of a court of general jurisdiction void or erroneous unless duly appealed from, and surely the parties to a decree cannot be permitted to disregard its provisions. No appeal appears to have been taken from Chancellor Carroll's decree, and all parties are bound by it. The Circuit judge was clearly in error in holding that as the right to enroll was a statute right, it could not be affected by the provisions of the decree. The court before whom a cause is pending, especially when of general jurisdiction, is, subject to appeal, the only judge of what are the rights of parties as it regards the use of its process and means of enforcing its judgments. If it judges erroneously as to any such rights, the proper remedy is by appeal; but to assert that parties may disregard the provisions of its decrees, as it regards the mode of enforcement, introduces a dangerous innovation in our ideas as to what is due the authority of the courts.

At all events, the decree of Chancellor Carroll must be regarded as liquidating the debt in favor of W. M. Thomas against Mary Raymond during her lifetime. The proceedings upon Chancellor Carroll's decree, after the death of Mary Raymond, must be regarded as a new proceeding against H. H. Raymond as heir to Mary Raymond, and not as re-

administration was not then had on her *estate so as to enable it to be revived. These proceedings cannot be regarded as affecting the decree of Chancellor Carroll. They grew out of an attempt to destroy the force and effect of the decree by military authority, and did not involve any question of error in the decree itself, and must be regarded as extensive to the decree.

In view of the foregoing conclusions, it is not practicable at the present time to ascertain the various priorities of the parties plaintiff and defendant, but there should be an inquiry as to the various matters of fact opened hereby, and the decree modified to conform to the principles already laid down. The decree of the Circuit Court should be set aside where inconsistent herewith, and opened in other respects to the extent necessary to modify it in accordance with the foregoing.

I concur. HENRY McIVER, A. J.

I concur, except on the point touching the priority of lien in the case of Thomas v. Mary Raymond, and as to that I adopt the conclusion reached by the Circuit judge.

Decree modified.

Before Thomson, J., at Kershaw, February, 1879.

This was an action for divorce from the *30
bonds of matrimony, *upon the ground of defendant's adultery. It was commenced December 12th, 1878, eight days before the approval of the act of December 20th, 1878, (16 Stat. 719), repealing all laws of this state relating to the granting of divorces. The defendant failed to appear or answer. The parties were married January 4th, 1869. His Honor the Circuit judge dismissed the action, holding that the court could not hear testimony or render judgment under a repealed statute. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. D. A. Straker, for appellant.

April 25th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. This action was for a divorce a vinculo, on the ground of adultery. The complaint was dismissed on the ground that no such remedy existed by the laws of this state. The constitution (Article IV., Section 15,) declares "that the Courts of Common Pleas shall have exclusive jurisdiction in all cases of divorce." By the act of 1872 (15 Stat. 30,) a divorce from the bonds of matrimony was allowed on the ground of adultery, but that act was repealed by the act of 1878. 16 Stat. 719. It is contended, however, that the statute of 1878 is void, as tending to impair the obligation of the marriage contract alleged in the complaint, and, also, that the remedy in question is completely granted by the constitutional provision already recited. The marriage was solemnized in 1869, prior to the statute which has been thus repealed, and by such repeal the law now stands in the same position in which it stood at the time of the contracting of the marriage, so that if the general proposition advanced as to the effect of the constitutional inhibition of laws tending to impair the obligation of contracts was sound, still it would be inapplicable to the present case. The general proposition cannot, however, be maintained, as the constitution has regard to questions of property and not of matrimonial status. As this proposition is inapplicable it need not be developed in the present case. As it regards the second proposition, namely, that the remedy exists in an available form under the constitution apart from all legislation on the subject, it must be borne in mind that prior to the adoption of the constitution no such remedy existed *in this state. Mattison v. Mattison, 1 Strob. Eq. 387 [47 Am. Dec. 541]. It was argued that the inference from the authorities is that the defect was one of jurisdiction alone and not of legal right, notwithstanding the fact that no court had been rendered competent to entertain such a remedy; that as the abstract right to have such a remedy existed by law, such remedy could be had at the moment such a jurisdiction was called into existence, and that such competency was created in the Court of Common Pleas by the constitution. It is clear that Mattison v. Mattison will not bear the construction thus sought to be put upon it, but must be regarded as determining that such a remedy was excluded by the policy of the law. It was held by this court in State v. County Treasurer, 4 S. C. 524, that a mere grant of judicial power in the constitution did not remove from the legislature authority to determine to what class of cases such judicial power should extend. State v. Gaillard, 11 S. C. 309. No remedy is complete without a definition of the cases to which it shall extend, and the constitution is wholly silent on this subject. There is, therefore, nothing in the constitution tending to deprive the legislature of full power of granting or withholding such remedy which the legislature primarily possesses. The act of 1872 was an exercise of this power, and its repeal in 1878 an equally effective exercise of the power of withholding such remedy. But Article XIV., Section 5, of the constitution sets this question at rest. That section provides "that divorces shall not be allowed but by the judgment of a court, as shall be prescribed by law." In the absence of a law authorizing such a judgment none can be pronounced having the effect allowed by this section.

The appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Before Aldrich, J., at Chester, November, 1878.

This was an action on a sealed note, given by defendant, Hamilton, as principal, and Walker as surety, to C. S. Brice, the intestate of the plaintiffs. The answer admitted the execution of the note but plead payment, and set out the payment of several sums of money at various dates, by Hamilton to C. S. Brice, and the same payments were also set up by Hamilton as a counterclaim, for money had and received. The plaintiff, in reply, not admitting the counterclaim, alleged that Hamilton was largely indebted to their intestate upon other claims, and that moneys *received from Hamilton had been applied by their intestate to such other claims. At the trial the defendant proved by witnesses the receipt by C. S. Brice, of an amount collected on judgment against J. G. Gaffney, and of other moneys belonging to Hamilton. The plaintiff proved that C. S. Brice held other claims against Hamilton besides the notes sued on—a Carter judgment and a due-bill. Hamilton was asked by his counsel as to these several payments and receipts, "what was your intention and purpose, when you allowed C. S.

Brice to keep this" money? The questions were objected to, but the court admitted them, and exceptions were taken. The plaintiffs offered in evidence a memorandum found among the papers of their intestate, signed by him and proved to be in his handwriting, which was a statement of amount collected on a certain claim, with a balance stated to be "due Hamilton, to be credited on Carter judgment." Defendants objected, the objection was sustained and plaintiffs excepted. Plaintiffs proved, by a witness, a receipt from Hamilton to their intestate in full of moneys collected on a judgment of S. P. Hamilton v. J. G. Gaffney. Defendants, in reply, introduced Hamilton to prove that out of the moneys so receipted for, $100 were retained by Brice. Objection by plaintiffs to this testimony was overruled and exception taken.

The plaintiffs then asked the court to charge the jury, that as there was no evidence of application by either the debtor or the creditor of any of the payments proved, the law would then apply all the payments to the satisfaction of the judgment, and the due-bill held by C. S. Brice against S. P. Hamilton, because these debts were unsecured, while the note in suit was secured by a surety. The court refused so to charge, to which the plaintiffs excepted. The plaintiffs further asked the court to charge that a receipt, after the death of the party to whom it was given, was conclusive evidence of settlement in full of the matters therein referred to, unless fraud or mistake were proved, and, therefore, that the receipt set forth above must be taken as a settlement in full, between C. S. Brice and S. P. Hamilton, of the money received from the Gaffneys. The court refused so to charge, to which the plaintiffs excepted.

The court charged the jury that the intentions and purposes of *the debtor, when he made the payments, were to be taken by them as evidence of application. To which the plaintiffs excepted.

The court further charged the jury that if there has been no application of the payments proved, then they must apply them, as Hamilton intended they should be applied —to the Walker note. To which the plaintiffs excepted.

The jury thereupon found a verdict for the defendants, and for the defendant, S. P. Hamilton, the sum of $37.55.

No motion was made for a new trial before the Circuit judge. The plaintiffs appealed and moved this court for a new trial, upon the ground that there was error in the several rulings and charges to which exceptions had been taken by them.

Mr. A. G. Brice, for appellant.

Messrs. J. & J. Hemphill and J. H. Rion, for respondent.

April 28th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. This action was by the administrators of C. S. Brice upon a sealed note, the property of their intestate, and the defence consisted of various payments and counter-claims. The evidence disclosed various pecuniary transactions between the defendant, S. P. Hamilton, and the intestate, involving the receipt, by plaintiff's intestate, of various sums of money which defendants claim should have been applied as payments on account of the sealed note in suit, and which plaintiffs contend should be applied to others items of account between the original parties. The question at issue was the right of the plaintiffs to make such application. Various exceptions are presented, some relating to the admissibility of testimony, and others relating to charges by the judge, and refusals to charge. The verdict was for the defendants, and the plaintiffs appeal. A general objection is made by the defendants to the effect that no application was made to the Circuit judge for a new trial, but the appeal is directly from the judgment, and, therefore, as they contend, the exceptions taken at the trial cannot be heard. There is no ground for such an objection. It was competent for the plaintiffs to *have moved before the Circuit Court for a new trial, but as the objections to the verdict relate to matters of law alone, and could be heard in this court, the appellants were not bound to submit them to the Circuit judge, on a motion for a new trial, before appealing to this court. There is no provision of the code exacting any such condition to an appeal to this court, and no antecedent practice from which such a rule could be inferred. An appeal from a judgment involves any intermediate order involving the merits and necessarily affecting the judgment, (Code, § 11,) and this includes all rulings and charges material to the judgment.

The exceptions relating to the admissibility and competency of testimony will be next considered. The court admitted, against the objection of the plaintiffs, the testimony of the defendant, S. P. Hamilton, as a witness, to the effect that at the time when certain payments were made by Hamilton to the intestate, it was the intention and expectation of the defendant, Hamilton, that such payments should be applied to the note in suit, without any attempt to show that any disclosure or communication of such intent or expectation was made to the intestate. In order to show an intent to apply the payments then made, which the debtor had an undoubted right to do, it was necessary to bring that intent home to the party receiving the money.

It is questionable whether a naked intent, unaccompanied by any appropriate act or declaration, can be proved in any case. Usually, intent is inferred from the acts and declarations forming part of the res gestæ of a transaction, of which intention is an important legal element. In a very limited and exceptional class of cases, the intent, inferable from the res gestæ, may be rebutted by direct proof, but this is not such a case. The effect of a direction as to application, made by one paying money to another, is in the nature of a contract, attaching a condition to the payment by the fact of acceptance, and an undisclosed intent could produce no such effect. The objection just considered was made to several distinct offers of testimony, which need not be separately considered, as the application of the foregoing princi*ples is the same in each instance. The rulings admitting such testimony of naked intent were clearly erroneous.

The defendant, Hamilton, as a witness in his own behalf, was questioned as to his having given a direction to the intestate at the time of certain payments made, or credits given to him by Hamilton, as to the application of such payments or credits. Objection was made to such testimony. Some difference of statement exists as to the fact whether the competency of Hamilton to testify as to a communication with the intestate, as against his administrators, (Code, § 415,) was raised in the Circuit Court. The counsel for the defendant, Walker, distinctly admits that such was the ground of objection, and that is sufficient to entitle the question to be considered. Hamilton was clearly incompetent to give such testimony, as it related to both a communication and transaction between himself and the deceased, sought to be given by a party to the suit as against the administrator of the deceased. Code, § 415.

It was contended, however, that Hamilton was qualified to testify as to the matter, by the fact that such matter had been introduced, in the first instance, by a witness called by the plaintiffs. Had either of the plaintiffs, the administrators of Brice, testified personally to such communication or transaction, as parties to the suit, the defendant, Hamilton, would have been competent, as a witness, to give testimony as to such communication or transaction. Code, § 415. The reason of this provision of the section is, that if one party avails himself of this class of testimony, it is fair that it should also be available to the other. But in this case such testimony was not given by a party to the suit, so that the defendant, Hamilton, was not within that exception to the general provisions of Section 415.

A memorandum offered in evidence by the plaintiffs, as made by the deceased in his lifetime, and found among his papers at his death, tending to show an intent and purpose to make the application contended for in his behalf, at the time of the receipt of certain moneys paid to him by the defendant, Hamilton, was excluded by the court. This testimony was properly excluded as a mere declaration of the deceased.

The court charged "that the intention and purpose of the *debtor when he made the payment was to be taken by them as evidence of the application." To this plaintiffs excepted. This involves the erroneous proposition that what a party intended to do in a given case is proof of what he did do.

The court further charged "that if there had been no application of the payments proved, they must apply them as Hamilton intended they should be applied to the Walker note." To this the plaintiffs excepted. The general rule of the application of payments was settled in Heilbron v. Bissell, Bail. Eq. 430, as follows: "If the debtor, at the time of making a payment, does not direct to which of several accounts on which he is indebted the payment shall be applied, the creditor is entitled to make the application, and is not limited as to the time within which he may do so." This rule had been practically acted upon in the previous case of Stewart v. Cochran, Bail. Eq. 380.

What was said in the subsequent case of Jones v. Kilgore, 2 Rich. Eq. 63, cannot be regarded as affecting the authority of Heilbron v. Bissell. In Jones v. Kilgore there had been an application by the debtor as evidenced by certain acts of the creditor, as was there decided. It was not necessary, therefore, to state the consequences of a failure on the part of both the debtor and creditor to make the application, and yet it was said "there is no doubt, if no directions are given by the party making the payment, the right to make the application is with the party receiving. If neither party has fixed the application, it devolves on the court, and will be made pro rata to the demands held by him who receives the money, against him who paid it, or, if one of the demands be less secured than the others, the application will be made to it in the first instance." The citations to this statement are 5 Mason 82; 4 J. J. Marsh. 97; 9 Cow. 420. No reference whatever is made to the well-reasoned case of Heilbron v. Bissell, or to the case of Stewart v. Cochran, which that case followed.

It cannot be denied that equity sometimes follows the principles here indicated, but only when there is a state of equities between the parties that forbids the application of the legal rule. An intimation to that effect is found in the opinion in Heilbron v. Bissell. It must be concluded that the case was not brought *to the attention of the court in Jones v. Kilgore, as it is not cited or commented upon, and, therefore, no intention to overrule it can be implied. Jones v. Kilgore does not determine when the creditor must signify his application, and that is the point of the whole matter, but simply declares the consequences in the event that no application should be made by either debtor or creditor. The effect of Heilbron v. Bissell is to allow the creditor to make such application at any time before judgment or verdict, and there is nothing in necessary conflict with this in Jones v. Kilgore.

As the point was not necessary for decision in the last-named case, it cannot be regarded as decided with such effect as to overrule Heilbron v. Bissell and Stewart v. Cochran.

In the present case the matters at issue, under both the complaint and answer, were purely of legal cognizance, and, therefore, the legal rule of application was proper to be applied. But had the issues been such as belonged properly to equity, Heilbron v. Bissell is an authority that that circumstance alone would not have justified a court of equity in departing from the legal rule on the subject. The charge was, therefore, erroneous in laying down the rule of applying payments. In the absence of proof of application on the part of the defendant, Hamilton, at the time of making payment, the plaintiffs, as administrators of the creditor, are entitled to apply the payments by means of their action.

The proposition of the plaintiffs that a receipt is not open to explanation after the death of the party to whom it was given cannot be supported.

There must be a new trial.

Motion granted.

*(Case No. 728.)

LUCY H. ALEXANDER v. WILLIAM L. HAMILTON.

(April Term, 1879.)

[Dower ⊂⊃85.]

Lands sold at sheriff's sale during coverture may be assessed, by commissioners in dower, at a greater valuation, at the date of sale, than the price for which they sold.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. § 325; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃85.]

Before Aldrich, J., at Chester, November, 1878.

This was an appeal from the Court of Probate. The plaintiff was the widow of Sample Alexander, and demanded dower in a tract of land belonging to defendant. The land had been sold as the property of Sample Alexander, in 1868, during his lifetime, under a judgment upon which there was due over $2000. It was purchased by the brother of the plaintiff in that judgment for $500, and re-sold by the purchaser, in 1875, for $1500. The commissioners in dower valued the land, at the time of sale, at $1031.25, and assessed the widow's dower at $171.87. One of the commissioners, sworn as a witness, said he wanted the land when sold in 1868, and would have given $1031.25 for it, but did not bid, as he heard it was being sold under a judgment for a large amount. There was no other testimony. The judge of probate confirmed the return, and, upon appeal to the Circuit Court, his decree was affirmed.

Defendant appealed to this court, upon the ground that the value of the land, at the time of alienation, was ascertained by the positive proof of the sale by the sheriff and his deed, and that the valuation by the commissioners was merely speculative, and should be set aside.

Mr. S. P. Hamilton, for appellant.

Messrs. J. & J. Hemphill, for respondents.

April 28th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. The only question in this case is whether commissioners appointed to admeasure a widow's dower in land, *which had been sold by the sheriff under executions against the husband, during his lifetime, are obliged to adopt the amount which the land brought at such sale as "the value of the land at the time of alienation," or whether they may not make their own estimate of such value. The language of the statute would seem to furnish a conclusive answer to this question. It is as follows: "On all assessments of dower against a purchaser, in behalf of a widow of a former owner, the value of the land at the time of alienation by the husband, with interest from the accrual of the right of dower, shall be taken and received by the courts of this state as the true value on which to assess the said dower." Gen. Stat., ch. CXIII., § 7, p. 530. The object of this statute, which was originally passed in 1824, was to fix the time at which the value of the land was to be ascertained, and thereby settle what had previously been a disputed question. If, therefore, the legislature had designed that the amount which the land brought at such alienation should be the test of its value, they would, doubtless, have said so. The mind of the legislature was at the time turned towards the purpose of making the law upon this subject definite and certain, and if they had intended to establish a rule by which the value could be definitely measured, as well as to fix the time when such rule should be applied, they certainly would have said so. Again, it would seem to be a work not only of supererogation, but of needless delay and expense, to appoint commissioners to fix an amount which could be as easily fixed by an inspection of the sheriff's books. But, in addition to this, we would be slow to conclude, in the absence of any express declaration on the part of the legislature, or an absolutely necessary inference from what they have said, that they intended to establish a rule which would in many cases work the grossest injustice, and tend to impair materially the value of a right which is said to be favored in law. For experience demonstrates that a forced sale by a sheriff, under an execution, furnishes a very insufficient test of the real value of the property so sold.

No case has been cited which is directly in point, but the appellant contends that Brown v. Duncan, 4 McC. 346, furnishes ground for his position. That case, however, at the utmost, *only holds that where the land was sold, at a public sale, for $40,000, and the commissioners in dower based their assessment upon an estimated value of $30,000, under the idea that the land had deteriorated in value between the time of the sale and the death of the husband, thus disregarding the provisions of the act of 1824, such estimate was erroneous, because it was in violation of the provisions of that act. But the question as to the rule by which the value is to be ascertained is not considered or determined. Reliance is also placed upon Keith v. Trapier, Bail. Eq. 63, or rather upon the following language, extracted from the decree of the Circuit Court in the case: "The value cannot be ascertained by any better test than what the property actually brought on sale." This language, however, must be construed in reference to the circumstances of the case in which it was used. These circumstances were as follows: "The husband of the dowress had contracted to sell the land to one Anderson for the sum of $34,000, but in order to disencumber the title it was agreed that the land should be sold under a judgment for foreclosure of a mortgage which rested upon it, and that Anderson should bid it off provided it did not go beyond the stipulated price, and if he should bid it off for less than that price, he was nevertheless to pay such price to the husband." At the sale the land was bid off for $27,000, and Chancellor Harper, in determining whether the amount actually agreed to be paid or the amount bid at the sale should form the basis for the assessment of the widow's dower, uses the language above quoted, and held that the price actually agreed to be paid, and not the amount bid at the sale, should form the basis for the assessment of the dower. This shows very clearly that, in the opinion of that distinguished Chancellor, the amount for which land is bid off at a public sale is not the absolute test of its value by which an assessment of dower is to be made. These two cases can, at most, only be said to establish the proposition that commissioners in dower, in estimating the value of land which has been sold during the coverture, will not be allowed to estimate such value at a sum less than the amount which such land actually brought at such sale, but they are very far from establishing the further proposition that they will not be allowed to estimate such value at an amount *greater than that which it brought at such sale. We think, as was said by the Circuit judge in Russell v. Gee, 2 M. Con. Rep. 255, that proof of the amount which the land brought at the sheriff's sale is far from conclusive evidence of "the value of the land at the time of the alienation."

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

[1. Limitation of Actions ⇐6.]

An action for deficiency in quantity of land, founded upon the usual covenant of warranty in a deed of conveyance executed in 1858, is barred by the statute of limitations in four years.

The limitations prescribed in Part 2, Title 2 of the code of procedure, do not apply where the right of action accrued before the adoption of the code; such cases are governed by the statute of limitations of force at the time. It was not the intention of Section 7, Chapter CXLVI., of the General Statutes, to give to actions any new or different period, but simply to declare that they should continue under the operation of the limitations applicable to them in then existing laws.

Before Aldrich, J., at Chester, November, 1878.

This was an action commenced in November, 1875, for breach of warranty contained in deed from J. G. Smith to plaintiff on January 8th, 1858. The alleged breach was a deficiency in the number of acres, and also in a lot at a railroad station. The deficiency was clearly proven. The defendants claimed title under J. G. Smith, exactly how does not appear. The defendants plead the statute of limitations. It appeared in testimony that the defendant, Guy, and one Smith, as executors of J. G. Smith, sued Bratton, the plaintiff here, for balance due on his *bond for purchase money of this land, and recovered a verdict March 15th, 1869. Upon the declaration in that case was endorsed, in the handwriting of the attorney for Guy and Smith, executors, the following: "It is understood that the verdict in this case has been agreed upon without prejudice to the defendant's claim on the warranty." (Signed,) Melton, Hart & Melton, plaintiffs' attorneys.

At the close of testimony for plaintiff, the defendant moved for a non-suit. The court overruled the motion and defendants excepted. The defendants requested the judge to charge the jury that the action was barred by the statute of limitations, and plaintiff cannot recover. This was refused, and exception taken. The jury found a verdict for plaintiff. Defendants appealed to this court, upon the exceptions taken in the court below.

Messrs. Patterson & Gaston, for appellants.

Mr. S. P. Hamilton, for respondent.

April 28th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. The action was on a covenant of warranty for a deficiency of land existing at the time of conveyance, and the right of action accrued immediately. The then existing statute of limitations barred such an action, unless prosecuted within four years next after the cause of action arose. It is contended, however, that the cause of action was revived by an admission, in writing, made by the present defendant after the time for the prosecution of the action had expired; but it also appears that more than four years elapsed after such alleged admission and before the commencement of the present action. To this it is contended that the period of four years had not expired fully at the time of the adoption of the general statutes, but was then running, and that under the operation of Section 7 of Chapter CXLVI. of the General Statutes, the period of limitations, which was changed from four years to twenty years, as it regards actions on sealed instruments, and from four years to six as it regards actions on contracts not under seal, (Code, § 114,) is that prescribed for actions brought under the code. It is contended that if such is *the construction of the general statutes the action was not barred, and there was no error in the ruling of the Circuit judge excluding the defendant from the benefit of such statute of limitation. Section 113 of the code fixes the period of limitation for actions on sealed instruments at twenty years, and on all other contracts, express or implied, at six years. These provisions are subject to the general provisions contained in Sections 96 and 97. Section 96 provides that "the provisions of this title shall not extend to actions already commenced or to cases where the right of action has already accrued, but the statutes now in force shall be applicable to such cases according to the subject of the action and without regard to the form." In the final chapter of the general statutes the following section occurs: (Gen. Stat. 767, § 7.) "When a limitation or period of time prescribed in any of the acts repealed for acquiring a right or barring a remedy or any other purpose, has begun to run, and the same or similar limitations is prescribed in the general statutes, the time of limitation shall continue to run and have like effect as if the whole period had begun and ended under the operation of the general statutes." The question is, what time of limitation is here spoken of as continuing to run? certainly the time prescribed by some repealed statute. The effect of the running of such time is assimilated to that of a like or a similar term, commencing and ending under the statute, and, therefore, clearly a time prescribed by a repealed statute must be intended. It is not said that the period of time prescribed by the repealed statute shall be converted into the corresponding period of time provided by the general statutes, which would be necessary to sustain the argument of the plaintiff. On the contrary, the former period, namely, that prescribed by the repealed statute, is to continue to run, and only its effect, when completed, is declared by this section. The expression, "continue to run," shows clearly that that period was to continue to run which was fixed by the repealed statute, and not a period substituted therefor. We are compelled to give this section effect, together with Section 96, and in doing so it is not difficult to conclude that the object of this section was merely to give to the expiration of the period prescribed under a previous statute, and which had commenced to run before the adoption of *the general statutes, the same force and effect as by these statutes is given to the expiration of the period therein fixed in their application to the cases to which they are applicable. The necessity for such a provision is not apparent, but it cannot have the effect claimed for it by the plaintiff, for that would be to repeal Section 96. We must, therefore, conclude that the right of the plaintiff, if he had any, to sue upon the alleged admission, expired in four years after such right accrued and before the commencement of the present action. It was argued that an action of debt on specialty could have been brought on the original covenant of warranty, and that such action could only be barred by presumption of payment before the code, and by lapse of twenty years under the code.

We must assume that the covenant of warranty, which is not set forth in terms, is in the usual form. If so, only unliquidated damages could be claimed under it, and, of course, an action of debt could not be maintained. Besides, it would be a mere evasion of the statute barring actions on covenant in four years. Whether the covenant of warranty might not have existed in a form that would support an action of debt, is not a question here; in the ordinary form, it certainly can have no such effect.

There must be a new trial.

New trial granted.

Before Carpenter, J., at Edgefield, April, 1876.

This was an action of assumpsit brought by the plaintiff in 1866, against Jacob Lagrone, for the value of certain cotton. The defendant dying after action brought, it was revived against his executors. Plaintiff then filed an amended complaint, demanding judgment for $3765, for nineteen bales of cotton, and for $2922.80, for sixteen bales of cotton. The demands were set forth rather in the form of a declaration with several counts, one on a quantum meruit, another on account stated, &c. The defendants accepted service of this amended complaint on March 16th, 1870, in words following: "We accept service of amended complaint, and waive all irregularities as to additional cause of action." The defendants set up two sealed notes in discount. Also that plaintiffs' claim had been adjudicated in 1865 by the military authorities, as appeared by the following papers:

Edgefield C. H., S. C., August 10th, 1865.

Whereas, it has appeared to my satisfaction that Jacob Lagrone, a citizen of this district, is entitled to the unmolested possession and sale of a certain lot of cotton claimed to have been purchased by Carson Warren, also a citizen of this district:

It is hereby ordered that the said Warren refrain from any interference with the said Lagrone, or his agents, or the cotton in dispute between them, except in due and proper form; and that if he does so interfere he will lay himself liable to arrest and punishment. (Signed)

Witness: L. W. Metcalf,

*Headquarters, Depart. of Georgia,
Augusta, August 31st, 1865.

The cotton sold by Lagrone, which had previously been sold to Warren, will be delivered to Simons, to whom Lagrone sold it. Dr. Lagrone called on me some four weeks since, and stated all the facts in this case, and I advised him to sell the cotton.

(Signed)

James B. Steadman,

Major-General Com.

At the trial plaintiff introduced testimony to show the purchase of the cotton by him from Lagrone, and the price of cotton in 1865, and its sale by Jacob Lagrone. Defendants moved for a non-suit, upon the ground that the action should have been trespass or trover, and not assumpsit. The motion was refused and defendants excepted. The defendants offered in evidence the papers set forth in their answer together with statement of Capt. Metcalf; his Honor ruled them inadmissible, and defendants excepted. The defendants introduced testimony to show that the cotton belonged to Jacob Lagrone at the time he sold it. They also proved their notes.

The jury found a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $5933.82.

Defendants moved for a new trial on the minutes, upon the following grounds:

1. Because his Honor erred in overruling the motion of defendants' counsel for a non-suit, made upon the grounds that the testimony in behalf of plaintiff showed that the action was improperly brought; that the action should have been trespass or trover, and not assumpsit; and in allowing the plaintiff to go to the jury upon the pleadings as presented.

2. Because it is respectfully submitted his Honor the presiding judge erred in not allowing full force and effect to the act of the general assembly of this state, entitled an "Act to quiet rights vested under military orders," approved and ratified on the 22d day of September, A. D. 1868; the defendants' testator, Jacob Lagrone, having under and by virtue of the military orders of Capt. L. W. Metcalf, 33d U. S. colored troops, then stationed at Edgefield C. H., and the orders of Major-General *James B. Steadman, stationed at Augusta, Ga., against rights which were intended to be, and were, as defendants submit, quieted and determined by said orders; and in not allowing full force and effect to said orders issued in August, 1865.

3. Because his Honor erred, as it is respectfully submitted, in not instructing the jury upon the evidence that the said testator having acted in the alleged conversion and sale of the cotton in question, under and by virtue of the said military orders, he should not have been held accountable either for the cotton, its value, or for interest from the date of the alleged conversion and sale.

4. Because his Honor erred in his instructions to the jury that they should allow interest from the date of the alleged conversion, whereas interest, if allowed at all, should have been allowed only from the date of the demand by plaintiff, and no demand was proved.

5. Because the jury, in arriving at their verdict, regarded the alleged contract for the purchase of the cotton as having been made with reference to confederate currency as a basis of value, whereas there was no proof to justify such a conclusion, but on the contrary there was positive and direct proof, uncontradicted and unimpeached, that said contract was made with reference to gold and silver.

6. Because the testimony showed that the value of the cotton alleged to have been converted, at the date of the alleged conversion, was twenty-one and one-half cents per pound; and the jury erred in estimating said cotton at said time at thirty-five cents per pound.

7 Because, it is respectfully submitted, the jury erred in disregarding the testimony that established the fact that the contract between plaintiff and defendants' testator was rescinded previously to said alleged conversion, inasmuch as the cotton was not to be delivered until paid for, and no tender of payment was ever made.

8. Because it is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in charging the jury, as matter of law, that the contract had not been rescinded, instead of charging that there was testimony to *show that the contract had been rescinded, and tending to show that defendants' testator had a right to sell the cotton.

9. Because the verdict of the jury was excessive, oppressive, not warranted by the law and evidence, and contrary to the law and evidence.

The order upon the motion for a new trial is as follows:

1. It is ordered that the motion in arrest of judgment and all the grounds for new trial are overruled, except the ground as to excessive damages.

2. That the ground as to excessive damages be sustained.

3. That said motion for a new trial be and the same is hereby granted, unless the plaintiff within thirty days from the date hereof remit on the record the sum of $2975.82 of the verdict, as of the date thereof, in which case said motion is dismissed, without costs.

The defendants appealed to this court from so much of this order as—

1. Overrules the motion in arrest of judgment, and all the grounds of new trial, except the ground as to excessive damages.

2. As denies the motion for a new trial, in case the plaintiff, within thirty days from the date of said order, remits on the record the sum of $2975.82 of the verdict, as of the date thereof.

Mr. L. F. Youmans, attorney-general, for appellant.

Messrs. M. W. Gary and E. B. Gary, for respondent.

May 5th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. The first ground of appeal is that the Circuit judge erred in overruling a motion on the part of the defendants for a non-suit, made upon the ground that the testimony in behalf of the plaintiff showed that the action should have been trespass or trover, and not assumpsit.

The action was commenced in 1866, under the form of practice which existed prior to the adoption of the code of proced*ure. The pleading, as presented in the "case," contains the writ and an "amended complaint," upon which is the following endorsement: "We accept service of the amended complaint, and waive all irregularities as to the additional cause of action," dated March 16th, 1870, and signed by the attorneys for the appellants.

The complaint seems to have been again amended under an order of court, bearing date June 8th, 1874, and the cause was tried in 1876. This court is unable to perceive that the motion would have been sustained even under the former rules of pleading. It was optional with the plaintiff to sue for the proceeds of the sale of cotton, or for damages for the conversion thereof. The first would be an action of assumpsit for money had and received to the use of the plaintiffs, the second would be trover. The difference would have been in the rule by which the damages should be measured. But the fact is that the greater part of the proceedings and the trial took place after the adoption of the code, "and the rules by which the sufficiency of the pleadings is to be determined are those prescribed by this code of procedure." Gen. Stat. 604, § 163.

The amended complaint which is before us contains beyond question the requisites prescribed by section 165. The motion for a nonsuit was, therefore, properly refused.

For a second ground of appeal it is alleged that the judge erred "in not allowing full force and effect to the act of the general assembly of this state, entitled 'An act to grant rights vested under military orders'," approved September 22d, 1868. Gen. Stat. 506.

It is enough on this point to say that the military orders to which reference is made, do not purport to adjudicate any rights as to the ownership of the cotton, nor are they in other respects within the provisions of the act. One is an order from a subordinate officer forbidding Warren from interfering with cotton in possession of Lagrone, "except in due and proper form," while the other is an order issued by the officer commanding in the department of Georgia, and relates to transactions in that state. Neither comes within the terms or contemplation of the act, and, therefore, no question as to the force and effect of the act is before us.

*The third, fourth and eighth grounds of appeal charge the judge with error of law in his instructions to the jury. The case, as made out by the appellants, shows no exceptions to the charge of the judge, and such exceptions cannot be taken after a verdict has been had. The third, fourth and eighth points are, therefore, not properly before this court, and need not be considered, though, perhaps, it may be as well to say that so far as is disclosed by the case, such exceptions, if they had been properly taken, would not have been of any avail to the appellants.

The fifth, sixth and seventh grounds are based solely upon surmise and conjecture as to what were the motives and reasons by which the jurors may have been influenced in arriving at their conclusion. Such suggestions may properly have been presented to the mind of the Circuit judge when he was considering the motion for a new trial, but they cannot come up on appeal, and, therefore, as to them the appeal must be dismissed.

The only remaining question in the case is raised by appeal from the order which determined that the damages were excessive, and granted a new trial, unless the plaintiff, within thirty days from the date hereof, remit on the record the sum of $2975.82 of the verdict, as of the date thereof, in which case said motion (for new trial) "is dismissed, without costs."

The appeal is from that part of the order which allows the plaintiff to remit the amount in excess, and thereby prevent a new trial being had.

It is well settled that this court has no power to review or correct the findings of fact in a trial by jury. Const., Art. IV., § 4. But it is provided that "the judge who tries the cause may, in his discretion, entertain a motion to be made on his minutes to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial upon exceptions, or for insufficient evidence, or for excessive damages." Gen. Stat. 636, § 288; vide, also, act of 1868, Gen. Stat. 497, § 4. From the decision of the Circuit judge on such motion, based upon error in fact, as for insufficient evidence or for excessive damages, there is no appeal. The Circuit Court, therefore, in such respect, is a court of final resort, and, except where especially directed by constitutional or statutory provisions, is to be governed in its proceedings by the principles of law and the rules of practice *which were of force and applicable to courts in the exercise of similar power prior to the adoption of the constitution in 1868. The practice of the Court of Appeals prior to 1868, before which court such motions were then heard, is too well settled to require more than a mere reference to the volumes of the reports of the adjudicated cases. In the case of Laney v. Bradford, 4

Rich. L. 2, the court, per Wardlaw, J., says: "These considerations induce the court to impose, upon the grant of a new trial in this case, extraordinary terms required by an extraordinary conjuncture of circumstances. The discretion of the court in imposing conditions upon the grant of a new trial may always be exercised according to the exigency of the case." A new trial was thereupon granted nisi. In Parker v. Walker, 12 Rich. 138, the court, per O'Neall, J., says: "Having thus the means of correcting the verdict and doing justice between the parties, we will pursue that course. A new trial is therefore granted, unless the plaintiff shall, within sixty days after notice of this order, enter upon the record a remittitur of so much of the verdict as shall exceed twenty-nine dollars and seventy-five cents." See, also, Walters et al. v. McGirt et al., 8 Rich. 287; Dotterer v. Bennett, 5 Rich. 295; Guerry v. Kerton, 2 Rich. 507; Farrand v. Bouchell, Harper 83. In fact, it requires but a glance at the authorities to show that where the proper limit of the damages was legally ascertainable, it was the common practice to grant the order nisi. 3 Graham & Waterman on New Trials 1162.

If the Circuit judge is empowered to grant a new trial because he considers the damages excessive, it is absolutely necessary to presume that he is able to fix damages which would not be excessive. If the plaintiff sees proper to reduce the verdict to that amount, no one can complain—most assuredly not the defendant.

If the plaintiff had obtained leave to remit before the defendant moved for new trial, the motion would rest, not upon the verdict as it had been, but as it was when the motion was made. The court certainly can grant leave to the plaintiff to do that which he could have done as of course on his own motion. The moment the reduction is made, the reason for a new trial has ceased to exist. The plaintiff in this case has remitted the amount, and the order of the Circuit judge stands, dismissing *the motion. We have no doubt of the power on the part of the Circuit judge to attach conditions to an order granting a new trial, and base such conclusion upon the reasons already given. From this decision there is no right of appeal.

The law is well expressed by Gray, J., in the following language: "Such a motion, so far as it depends upon the weight of evidence or other matter of fact, is exclusively addressed to the discretion of the presiding judge. When the damages awarded by the jury appear to the judge to be excessive, he may either grant a new trial absolutely or give the plaintiff the option to remit the excess or a portion thereof, and order the verdict to stand for the residue. Lambert v. Craig, 12 Pick. 199; Hurry v. Watson, 4 T. R. 659, note; Blunt v. Little, 3 Mason 102; Doyle v. Dixon, 97 Mass. 208.

The judgment must be affirmed.

Motion refused.

THE CHARLOTTE, COLUMBIA AND AUGUSTA RAILROAD COMPANY v. THOMPSON EARLE and OWEN SMITH & CO.

(April Term, 1879.)

[Equity ⊂⊃415.]

While a judge, in an equity cause, may enlighten his conscience by the findings of a jury upon questions of fact submitted to them, the decree should be the conclusions of his own judgment on both law and facts; and a judgment in such a cause, resting wholly upon the verdict of a jury, is erroneous.

Before Carpenter, J., at Richland, February, 1875.

The facts bearing upon the merits of the case are immaterial to a proper understanding of the opinion of the court. It was an action of interpleader, and the issues of facts raised between the defendants were submitted to a jury. The jury found a verdict *in favor of Owen Smith & Co. On the same day Earle moved for a new trial, and the motion was refused in these words: "That the motion for new trial be and is hereby overruled and refused."

From such refusal, and from the judgment entered up upon the verdict, the defendant, Earle, appealed to this court.

[For subsequent opinion, see 13 S. C. 44.]

Mr. J. P. Carroll, for appellant.

Mr. F. W. McMaster, for respondent.

May 5th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This was an action in the nature of a bill of interpleader under the old equity practice, and by it the plaintiff sought such relief as was administered only by the Court of Equity before that court was abolished. It must, therefore, be governed by the rules applying to actions which were formerly cognizable only by a court of equity. Regarding it in this light this appeal must be determined by the principles announced in the recent case of Sloan v. Westfield, 11 S. C. 445. It is very true that though this case is concluded by the decision in the case of Sloan v. Westfield, the practical result reached here is precisely the reverse of the one reached in that case, but this is for the reason that in that case the appeal was only from the order of the Circuit judge refusing the motion of a new trial, while the appeal in this case is not only from such order but also from the final judgment. It appears from the record, as supplemented by the concessions made at the hearing, that the Circuit judge referred the issues of fact raised between the defendants to a jury for trial, not under an order framing such issues, as is the correct practice, but just as if the case had been an ordinary action at law, and upon their verdict judgment was entered without any hearing by the Circuit judge. This was clearly erroneous, as has been held in Flinn v. Brown, 6 S. C. 209; Gadsden v. Whaley, 9 S. C. 147, and Sloan v. Westfield, supra. For, as was said in Flinn v. Brown, and repeated in Gadsden v. Whaley, the parties in what is commonly called an equity case have a right to the opinion of the Circuit *judge, notwithstanding his right to refer issues of fact to a jury for the purpose of enlightening his conscience, "but the verdict of the jury is not to be accepted as the conclusion which is to govern and control the case, and through the medium of which the judgment is to be pronounced in favor of one side or the other." The judgment in such a case must be the result of the conclusions of the judge, "both on the law and the facts," and as he, "in forming his conclusions," is not bound by the verdict of the jury, but may wholly disregard it, there is manifestly no necessity for or propriety in a motion for a new trial in such a case.

As it does not appear that the judgment appealed from in this case was upon a hearing by the Circuit judge after the verdict was rendered, but, on the contrary, as was conceded on the argument here, was simply entered upon the verdict as in an ordinary action at law, it cannot be allowed to stand. The consideration of the motion for a new trial cannot be regarded as such hearing, for the Circuit judge in refusing the motion for a new trial might have supposed, and, doubtless, did suppose, that he was not at liberty to disregard the verdict and form his own conclusions, but that he was confined to the inquiry whether the verdict was so manifestly against the weight of evidence as would justify him in exercising the power, given him by statute, of ordering a new trial in an ordinary action at law on the ground of "insufficient evidence."

The judgment of the Circuit Court is set aside, and the case is remanded to the Circuit Court for further proceedings in accordance with the practice herein announced.

Decree set aside.

Before Townsend, J., at Marion, May, 1876.

In this case Hon. W. H. Wallace, Circuit judge, sat in the place of Associate Justice McIver, who had been of counsel in the cause.

The Circuit decree sets out all matters necessary to a full understanding of this case.

It is as follows:

This is an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage. In the complaint it is alleged that the bond was executed by the defendants on or about the 1st day of January, 1870, conditioned for the payment of $2,500 in two equal annual installments, with interest payable annually, from the 1st day of January, 1870; that the defendants, at the same time, to secure, the payment of said bond, executed a mortgage to the plaintiff of a certain tract of land, containing eighty-three and three-tenths acres; that on the 27th day of February, 1870, the bond and mortgage were consumed by a fire which destroyed the office of the plaintiff; that the condition of the bond and mortgage has been broken, and there is now due upon the bond the principal sum and interest, less a credit of an amount between $900 and $1000 paid by the defendant, McLucas, to Durham & Co. for the plaintiff on *the 1st day of January, 1871. The answer of the defendants admits the execution of the bond and mortgage, their destruction by fire, the fact of non-payment, the correctness of the credit to which the bond is entitled by reason of payments to S. A. Durham & Co. for the plaintiff, and feebly denies the correctness of the amount of principal and interest claimed in the complaint. The answer further alleges that the bond in question was given for the purchase money of the tract of land described in the mortgage. The various defences set up in the answer are:

1. That in March, 1866, the plaintiff executed a mortgage for the same tract of land described in the complaint to A. L. Evans, then commissioner in equity, to secure the payment of a bond then given to him for the purchase money, and that the bond is now unsatisfied and the mortgage effective, and that the owners of the same should be made parties to these proceedings before it is competent for the court to grant any orders directing a foreclosure and sale.

2. That at the time of the execution of the bond and mortgage by the defendants to the plaintiff, and the sale of the land, there were various judgments against the plaintiff, obtained at different times, and that others have been rendered since, none of which have been satisfied, but are now liens upon the land; that of the existence of any binding judgments at the time of the purchase of the land by them they had no knowledge or actual notice, and confiding in the plaintiff they made no inquiries or investigation; and that the holders of all the judgments, both prior and subsequent in date to the sale, should be made parties to these proceedings before a judgment of foreclosure can be rendered.

3. That when the trade with the plaintiff was made, it was done with the express condition and understanding that the plaintiff would remove the mortgage which he had given to A. L. Evans, and that he has not done the same, and his mortgage ought not to be foreclosed until this condition is complied with.

4. The proposition of law is here submitted, that all the plaintiff can properly claim is rent for the tract of land for the time it has been in their possession, and that the defendants are willing, under all the circumstances, to pay rent, if it is dis*counted against the claim for amount paid by McLucas to Durham & Co. for the plaintiff.

At the hearing of this case, a motion was submitted by the plaintiff's counsel for judgment on the pleadings. The decision of this question was reserved by the court, and testimony was heard. As to the first defence, the defendants proved that they had express notice of the existence of the mortgage given to A. L. Evans before the purchase of the land and the execution of their mortgage, but stated that there was an express agreement that the plaintiff was to remove this mortgage by payment. There was no evidence that A. L. Evans was any party to or had any knowledge of this agreement.

The deed from the plaintiff to the defendants contained the usual clause of warranty. The case of Barkley v. Barkley, 14 Rich. Eq., [12] decides that a valuable agreement of this kind can be specifically enforced in the courts by the vendee against the vendor, but does not hold that the holder of the prior encumbrance, which it was agreed should be removed, is to be affected in any way in his rights. The existence of the agreement, then, does not entitle the defendants to the right in equity to have A. L. Evans made a party to this proceeding. His mortgage was on record within the time prescribed; and besides, the defendants had express notice of its existence. They purchased the land, subject to the lien of the mortgage. A. L. Evans was no party to the alleged agreement. The defendants, cannot, therefore, claim adversely to him. It seems they relied exclusively upon the integrity of the plaintiff and his warranty for protection against the prior encumbrance. What benefit will it be to them to make A. L. Evans a party to the proceeding? He does not seek to become a party. The respondents have their remedy on the agreement against the plaintiff, or can recover for breach of warranty.

There are prior judgment creditors who have a lien upon the land, with the exception, perhaps, of two of them, whose judgments may be satisfied by lapse of time. They are not seeking to be made parties. Of these judgments the defendants had constructive notice when they purchased the land. How is it to enure to their advantage to have the prior judgment creditors *made parties to the proceedings, I cannot see. They have been wanting in diligence in making inquiries about encumbrances, and must bear the legal consequences. As to subsequent judgment creditors, I can see no advantage to result to these defendants from making them parties.

But, it is urged, it is the practice of this court to make prior and subsequent encumbrancers parties to proceedings to foreclose a mortgage, so that all their rights may be adjudicated and adjusted without the multiplicity of suits. Such has not been the practice of the Court of Equity in this state. The only proper parties to an action of this kind, strictly speaking, are the mortgagor and the mortgagee and those who have acquired rights or interests under them subsequent to the mortgage. This is the rule. The mortgagee, even, has no right to make one who claims adversely to the title of the mortgagor, and prior to the mortgage, a party defendant for the purpose of trying the validity of his adverse claim or title. But the mortgagee may make a prior encumbrancer a party to the action, for the purpose of having the amount of each encumbrance litigated; or he may, at his option, have the premises sold, subject to such prior encumbrance. I can find no authority directly supporting the doctrine that a mortgagor can claim the right to bring in, as parties to an action, prior encumbrancers of the land sought to be sold for foreclosure, particularly when their rights are not conflicting, or when they are, for the purpose of adjudicating them. In this action the court is not bound to make the prior judgment creditors or the holder of the prior mortgage parties in order to settle the rights of all the parties; nor is it necessary for the protection of the purchaser of the premises. He takes the interest of the mortgagee only under the sale. In fact, he will stand in his place, and all who are not parties to the proceeding are not affected thereby. The purchaser must inquire beforehand and ascertain definitely what he is to get by his purchase. The defendants are certainly not entitled to have unwilling parties made to this action simply for the benefit of the purchasers. If the junior judgment creditors are made parties, it will enure to their advantage alone.

The subsequent encumbrancers or judgment creditors are some*times made parties originally in actions of foreclosure. In the old practice in this state it has been done. But the mortgagee was the party who usually brought them in. The proposition that the defendants should be released from the contract, because of the encumbrances of this case and their want of diligence, and be allowed and required to pay only rent for the land, need not be considered by the court. To thus cancel the bond and mortgage and disregard the rights of the plaintiff, would be at variance with the law. I can find no authority to justify such action on the part of the court.

I am of the opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to his judgment of foreclosure and sale, without the addition of any other parties to the action, and it is so adjudged.

It is ordered that it be referred to S. G. Owens, clerk of this court, to ascertain the amount of the principal and interest due upon the bond, to secure the payment of which the mortgage sought to be foreclosed was given.

The defendants appealed to this court upon the following exceptions to the decree:

1. In that the judge, in his judgment, erred in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to have his mortgage foreclosed before he complied with his express agreement, when the mortgage was given, to remove a mortgage before that time given by him to A. L. Evans, commissioner in equity, on the same property.

2. In that the judge, in his judgment, erred in holding that the owner of the mortgage given by the plaintiff before the sale made by him to the defendants, was not a necessary party to the proceedings in this case.

3. In that the judge, in his judgment, erred in holding that prior judgment creditors of the plaintiff were not necessary parties to these proceedings, and notwithstanding two of the judgments had been recovered more than twenty years before the execution of the mortgage, and have since that time been renewed by the consent of the plaintiff.

4. In that the judge, in his judgment, erred in holding that subsequent execution creditors of the plaintiff were not necessary parties.

*5. In that the judge, in his judgment, erred in ordering a foreclosure of the mortgage and in overruling the positions taken in defendants' answer.

Messrs. Johnson & Johnson, for appellants.

The court ought not to have ordered a foreclosure until after the vendor had removed the lien of the prior mortgage. 14 Rich. Eq. 12; 6 Johns. Ch. 398; Story Eq. Jur. 370, 785, 850; Moseley 318; 1 McM. 125. All encumbrancers should be parties. Story Eq. Pl. 193; 6 John. Ch. 450; 4 John. Ch. 605; 3 John. Ch. 459. Though encumbrancers in most cases may not be necessary parties, yet in a case like this, where the encumbrances are numerous, and some of them uncertain as to their validity, they ought all to be before the court.

Mr. C. A. Woods, for respondent.

Prior encumbrancers are not necessary parties. Pom. Rem., §§ 334, 342; 9 S. C. 197. Subsequent judgment creditors are proper but not necessary parties. Story Eq. Pl., § 193; 3 Johns. Ch. 459; Pom. Rem. 342. Defendants accepted title with full knowledge of the prior encumbrances, and must rely upon their warranty. And the removal of the prior mortgage was not a condition precedent. 14 Rich. Eq. 12. Defect of title cannot avail as defence until surrender of possession. 3 Rich. 196.

May 7th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The only objection for want of parties taken by the answer is that a mortgagee, prior to the plaintiff, is not joined. We held in Warren v. Burton, 9 S. C. 197, that a prior encumbrancer was not a necessary party to a suit for foreclosure. That case disposes of all question as to the alleged defect of parties, for the defendant not having raised any other question as to defect of parties, either by demurrer or answer. such an objection is waived. Code, § 171.

The objection to the judgment, based on an alleged agreement to pay off all encumbrances on the premises, requires consideration. It appears that the plaintiff sold and conveyed to the defendant, with the usual covenant of warranty, and took back *a mortgage for the purchase money, which he is now seeking to foreclose. The defendant alleges outstanding encumbrances existing at the date of the conveyance with warranty, both by mortgage and judgment. He also alleges a parol agreement on the part of the plaintiff to pay off and discharge these incumbrances.

The Circuit judge does not pass directly upon the question of fact of the existence of such a parol agreement. It is placed in doubt by the evidence whether any distinct agreement of the character alleged, independent of what was accomplished through the covenant of warranty, was made between the parties. The covenant of warranty was itself a contract to pay the encumbrances in question. It is settled in this state, beyond dispute, that the general covenant of warranty, since the act of 1795, must be construed as containing the various covenants in use prior to that time in conveyances of land.

In Jeter v. Glenn, 9 Rich. 374, Wardlaw, J., held that the covenant of warranty embraces all the five English covenants, namely, that the vendor is seized in fee; that he has a right to convey; that vendee shall quietly enjoy; against encumbrances, and for further assurance. In Brisbane v. McCrady, 1 N. & McC. 104 [9 Am. Dec. 676], the existence of a covenant against encumbrances, as included in the ordinary covenant of warranty, was distinctly recognized. In Johnson v. Veal, 3 McC. 449, the same was held with regard to the covenant of seizin, and in reference to both the covenants of seizin and quiet enjoyment in Furman v. Elmore, 2 N. & McC. 189. The proposition above stated is based upon a construction of the act of 1795, and is so well settled and understood that it needs no particular consideration. Inasmuch, then, as there was an express covenant, under seal, between the parties, by which, in effect, the vendor bound himself to pay off all encumbrances on the land, the testimony as to a parol understanding may well be referred to this express contract as the contemplated means of enforcing that obligation. A parol contract, in addition to this formal one, would have been senseless and useless. We therefore conclude that the covenant of warranty was the obligation to which the parties looked as fixing *the duties of the vendor as it regards the discharge of encumbrances affecting the title to the land in question.

It appears that encumbrances, consisting of a mortgage and judgment, existed affecting the title of the land at the time of its conveyance by the vendor with warranty. Whether the mere fact of conveyance, with warranty, of an encumbered title constituted a breach from the moment of such conveyance, or only from the time when the covenantee sustained damage from the existence or enforcement of the encumbrance, need not be considered in this case. In Massachusetts and New York it is held that under such circumstances the covenant is broken from the time of the transfer of the encumbered title, but that covenantee can get only nominal charges, unless he has either been at cost to extinguish the encumbrance, or has suffered through its enforcement. Prescott v. Trueman, 4 Mass. 627; Delavigne v. Norris, 7 Johns. 358. It may be a question whether the case of Brisbane v. McCrady, 1 N. & McC. 104, assuming it to hold that the covenant is not broken until actual damage sustained, should not be restricted to contingent liabilities like that involved in that case, namely, a contingent right of dower dependent on surviving a husband, but it is not important to determine that question in the present case. The question is not directly that of the right to maintain an action for the breach of the covenant, independent of the question of damages, but whether the defendant has sustained any damage that should be allowed by way of counter-claim to the plaintiff's demand. It is very clear in all the authorities that no damage can be recovered until the vendee has either extinguished the encumbrance in whole or in part, and in that case to the extent of payment for the purpose and interest, or unless he has lost the land in whole or in part under such encumbrance. Brisbane v. McCrady, 1 N. & McC. 104; Prescott v. Trueman, 4 Mass. 627; Delavigne v. Norris, 7 Johns. 358.

It is well settled in this state that under the former practice, damages arising from a breach of covenant in conveyance of land, could be set up by way of discount against a claim for the purchase money, whether that claim was based on a parol contract or one under seal. Bell v. Huggins, 1 Bay 326;

Sumter v. *Welsh, 2 Bay 558; O'Neall in Van Lew v. Parr, 2 Rich. Eq. 321; Garvin v. Cohen, 13 Rich. 153; Carter v. Carter, 1 Bail. 217; Taylor v. Fulmore, 1 Rich. 52. Such a defence can be made available under the code by way of counter-claim. But the defendant does not allege or prove any damage that can be deducted from the purchase money secured by the mortgage, and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to have his decree for the amount due on his mortgage.

and for the sale of the mortgaged premises for foreclosure.

The decree below must be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

Decree affirmed.

[This case is cited in Bostick v. Chovin, 55 S. C. 429, 33 S. E. 508, without specific application.]

Before Mackey, J., at Barnwell, September, 1878.

It would seem that the defendant executed a mortgage to the plaintiff upon a certain tract of land, excepting therefrom a homestead reservation, the limits of which were not defined either in the mortgage itself or by previous assignment. This action was brought by plaintiff to foreclose his mortgage, and defendant failing to answer, an order was obtained that a sale should be made "after a homestead has been set off to the defendant, Bostick, out of the mortgaged premises." Commissioners were *then appointed under the provisions of the homestead act of February 22d, 1873. The commissioners made their return, to which the plaintiff filed exceptions. After hearing testimony upon the matter of these exceptions, the Circuit judge set aside the return and assignment of homestead, and ordered a reappraisement by other appraisers named in the order. From this order the defendant, Bostick, appealed to this court.

Mr. J. C. Davant, for appellant.

Messrs. A. T. Smythe and A. B. Connor, for respondent.

May 26th, 1879. The opinion was delivered

PER CURIAM. We gather from the brief, which contains an imperfect statement of the proceedings in the case, that the decree of foreclosure is incomplete. The mortgage, in terms, excluded from the premises described in it a homestead reserver by the mortgagor, but such homestead is not defined as to its limits. It was necessary, therefore, that the extent of the homestead should be judicially ascertained before the judgment was complete. The extent of the homestead should have been ascertained in the manner in which all other facts are ascertained by a court of equity, either by testimony taken before the court or upon a reference to a master or referee, as the case may be. The act of 1873 prescribes the mode of setting apart the homestead where it is claimed out of property sought to be subjected to process, but does not preclude the court before which a question of homestead arises from determining that question in the mode employed for determining other questions of law or fact. We infer that the parties in the present case thought themselves bound to proceed in the mode pointed out by the statute. In this they were in error, and the order appointing commissioners, and all previous proceedings for the same purpose, must be set aside, and the cause remanded for the purposes already indicated.

Proceedings set aside.

WILLIAM L. TRENHOLM, Executor, v. PETER C. GAILLARD, County Treasurer.†

[1. Taxation ⇐527.]

A petition to the Circuit Court to have issues framed under act of June 9th, 1877, entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of proving bills of the bank of the state tendered for taxes, and the rules of evidence applicable thereto," dismissed—as the terms of that act, declaring that "in all proceedings by mandamus, or otherwise, to compel the reception of bills * * * an issue shall be framed under the direction of the judge, and * * * shall be submitted to a jury," authorized no new and specific proceeding, but were intended to regulate the framing and trial of the issues under established remedies then in common use.

The tender of the bills and their deposit with the clerk, was not the commencement of a legal proceeding, within the intent and meaning of this statute.

Before Hudson, J., at Charleston, March, 1879.

This, and twelve other cases involving the same question, were brought before the Circuit Court for Charleston county, by petitions, filed after the passage of an act entitled "An act to facilitate the collection of taxes," approved December 24th, 1878; and they were all heard together.

† Note—This case was carried by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States. By the decision of that court, filed March 22d, 1880, the judgment of this court was affirmed.—REPORTER.

The prayer of the petitioners was granted by the Circuit judge, by an order directing the framing and submission of the issues specified in the act of June 9th, 1877, and at the same time he filed the following opinion:

These cases came up on petitions to be admitted to have issues framed pursuant to the act of June 9th, 1877, for bills of the Bank of the State of South Carolina, tendered in payment of taxes, prior to the act of December 24th, 1878. The question involved is, whether the latter act repeals the former, and if it does repeal it, whether such repeal is constitutional. The former *act is entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of proving bills of the bank of the state tendered for taxes, and the rules of evidence applicable thereto;" the latter is entitled "An act to facilitate the collection of taxes."

It has been repeatedly decided that, under the act establishing the Bank of the State of South Carolina, a contract was made by the state with the holders of the bills of such bank, that the same were receivable in payment of taxes.

It was important, in view of the difficulties connected with such bills, that the act of 1877 should be passed, so as to ascertain what bills were genuine, and not affected with the prohibitions. The act was passed with a view to the taxes of that year in which it was passed, and is to be construed by that light. The act itself recognized that bills might be tendered, and its provisions were intended to guard against the reception of bills which might be open to the objections which, according to the preamble of the act, would prevent their reception.

The tender of the bills to the treasurer, and his deposit of them with the clerk, operated as a conditional payment of the taxes for which they were tendered, which would become absolute upon the verdict of a jury in favor of the plaintiffs, upon the issues prescribed in the act.

The effect of the act was, that upon the tender of the bills, and their lodgment in the office of the clerk of the court, the first step had been taken in such proceedings as the act contemplated. The person tendering had become invested with a right to have the bills so lodged received for his taxes, in the event that he had established the facts, the burden of proving which had been put upon him by the act. And the state had become invested with a right to have such bills as had not been so proved, destroyed. It must, therefore, be construed, that upon a tender being made, and the bills sealed up and lodged with the clerk, such a proceeding had been commenced as the act contemplated. And it would follow, that a proceeding having been commenced, it could not be taken away by subsequent legislation.

The act of 1878 is not inconsistent with such view, for its third section seems to provide rather an additional remedy, than *a deprivation of the former. If the tenderer did not see fit to assume the burden of proof cast upon him by the act of 1877, he could come in under the third section of the act of 1878. But if he claims to come in under the act of 1877, he comes in only on assuming the burden of proof as required by that act. There is, therefore, nothing inconsistent or repugnant in the provisions of the two acts, and necessarily implying a repeal, so far as those who, having tendered under the act of 1877, and were in the process of enforcing the remedy, had availed themselves of it.

But it is clear, that since the act of 1878 there can be no tender hereafter made under the act of 1877. And the principles of this judgment refer only to such persons as tendered under the act of 1877, and prior to the passage of the act of 1878.

The prayer of the petitioners in these cases is, therefore, granted, and an order will be made directing issues to be framed, under the act of 1877, in these cases.

The defendant appealed to this court. An abstract is given of only so much of the arguments as bears upon the questions decided by the court.

Messrs. De Saussure & Son, for appellants.

It is necessary to consider whether a proceeding had been commenced by the tender of the bills. And to arrive at a conclusion, the act of June, 1877, must be referred to.

Read by its own language, the act clearly intimates that the mere deposit of the package with the clerk of the court, was not a proceeding instituted. Something remained to be done. And the person making the tender was to be the actor, since he was charged with the burden of proving certain facts necessary to entitle him to the benefit of the act. The county treasurer could not be the actor; indeed, Section 3 clearly points out that he was to be defendant, while Section 1 as clearly shows that the proceeding to be instituted should be "to compel the reception of the bills of the said corporation as a legal tender for taxes to the state;" it is needless to argue that the county treasurer could not institute a proceeding to compel the reception of the bills.

*The act contemplates that the proceeding may be by mandamus or otherwise. If by mandamus, when would such a proceeding be regarded as instituted?

The usual practice in this country in obtaining the alternative writ, is to present to the court a formal application, variously termed a petition, relation or complaint, setting forth in detail the grounds upon which the claim for relief is based, and praying the aid of a mandamus. High on Extra. Rem., §§ 450, 502. It is grounded on a suggestion by the oath of the party injured, of his own right, and the denial of justice below. 3 Bl. Com. 3.

If, then, the proceeding to be instituted was by mandamus, it is clear that until the suggestion or petition was filed, no proceeding would be instituted.

But the proceedings may have been instituted otherwise than by mandamus.

Agreeably to the code, such other proceedings must have been by action or special proceedings.

Sec. 2. An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice, by which a party prosecutes another party for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offence.

Sec. 3. Every other remedy is a special proceeding.

Sec. 122. An action is commenced as to each defendant, when the summons is served on him or on a co-defendant, who is a joint contractor or otherwise united in interest with him. Wait Pr. 467–501.

No summons has ever been issued or served, and if it was by way of special proceeding, to wit, an application at a regular term of the Court of Common Pleas for Charleston county, to the presiding judge, to direct the framing of an issue, such application was not made until after 24th December, 1878.

But Judge Hudson places his decision upon the fact that the sealed package was in the possession of the clerk of the court, and thereby the person tendering and the state had each become invested with certain rights as to the particular contents of that package.

The requirement that the package be deposited with the clerk of the court, was merely arbitrary; any other depositary could *have been selected; the court could take no cognizance of the package, except upon proceedings instituted; the object of the sealing up and depositing in designated hands, was obvious; it was to prevent the risk of the same bills being tendered for various persons.

It is certain that the state could take no action in regard to such package, and hence, until proceedings instituted, trial had and judgment rendered that the bills were not genuine or valid, the state had no right. If the person tendering had chosen to pay the taxes in such funds as the county treasurer was authorized to receive, the package could have been reclaimed by the person who had tendered, and the state could not possibly have retained the bills so sealed up.

Messrs. McCrady & Son and Miles, Walker & Bacot, for respondents.

1. "That the tender of the bills to the treasurer, and his deposit of them with the clerk, operated as a conditional payment of the taxes for which they were tendered, which would become absolute upon the verdict of a jury in favor of the plaintiffs, upon the issues prescribed in the act."

2. Upon the tender of the bills to the treasurer, and the enclosing of said bills in a package, and the deposit of said package with the clerk, "the first step had been taken in such proceedings as the act contemplated—the person tendering had become invested with a right to have the bills so lodged received for his taxes, in the event that he established the facts, the burden of proving which had been put upon him by the act—and the state had become invested with a right to have such bills as had not been so proved, destroyed."

Although the act goes on to say that such deposit with the clerk shall "abide the decision of the court in any proceedings which may be instituted in regard to said bills," it is plain that the "proceedings" here referred to are interlocutory and not original.

The remedy provided in the act of 1877 is in the nature of a "special proceeding," and not an "action."

*"Remedies in the courts of justice are divided into: 1st. Actions; 2d. Special proceedings." Code, § 1.

The law lays down a general rule for the commencement of "actions," to wit, by service of a summons on defendant. Code, § 122.

But in "special proceedings" there can necessarily be no general rule for the commencement of the same; in each case a special rule must be laid down. It will scarcely be asserted that the remedy provided by the act of 1877 is not a "special proceeding," and, if a "special proceeding," then a special rule for commencement thereof ought to be laid down, which the legislature has done.

Again, the act of 1877 directs that "An issue shall be framed," &c. (see Section 1 of act), which is analogous to what was formerly termed "feigned issues." Section 95 of the code provides for our case. See 12 Barb. 385, cited Wait's An. Code, p. 19, note 1. It is therefore evident that no portion of the remedy provided in the act of 1877, is in its nature, an "action" which must be commenced under the general rule of summons served; but being altogether a "special proceeding," it has a special commencement, to wit, tender of the bills; enclosure of the bills so tendered in a package; deposit of said package with the clerk, &c.

Messrs. De Saussure & Son, in reply.

The appellees say this is a special proceeding; and "in special proceedings there can necessarily be no general rule for the commencement of the same; in each case a special rule must be laid down." If, for argument, this proposition is conceded, yet the act of June, 1877, prescribes that the deposit of the package with the clerk is to be followed up by an act, viz., "a proceeding which may be instituted in regard to said bills." "In all proceedings by mandamus, or otherwise, to compel the reception of bills of the said corporation as a legal tender," &c. "In all proceedings by mandamus or otherwise under this act."

The language, therefore, clearly indicates that the person who tendered is to do an act, viz., to institute proceedings by mandamus or otherwise in regard to said bills to compel their reception. These provisions follow the deposit of the package, and, if they *have any meaning, definitively show that the legislature did not regard the deposit as the institution of a proceeding.

If, for argument, it is conceded that the proposition relative to feigned issues, as suggested by appellees' argument, is analogous, yet the argument fails by its own authority, since "an order" is requisite to put such machinery in motion. In these cases no order had been made; and by Section 2 of act of December, 1878, no order could be granted by any court or the judge of any court.

May 28th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

WILLARD, C. J. A fundamental question in this case is whether the act of 1877, (16 Stat. 302,) entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of proving bills of the bank of the state tendered for taxes, and the rules of evidence applicable thereto," gives a new and specific remedy, or is intended and applies to issues joined in the ordinary remedies. The respondent moved the Circuit Court, by petition to have issues settled under that act. Such application is a new and independent remedy, claimed to have been allowed by the act in question, and unless such claims can be substantiated the whole jurisdiction below fails, which necessarily affects the result of the present appeal. The circumstances that led to the passage of that act are a part of the judicial history of the state, and will help to an understanding of the intent of the act. The question of the right of holders of the bills of the bank of the state to compel the county treasurers to receive such bills in payment of taxes came before the court in State v. Stoll, 2 S. C. 538, and was finally decided in the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal. This litigation gave rise to a great number of applications for mandamus throughout the state, involving a similar demand to that made in State v. Stoll, and presenting issues of fact as to whether the bills of the bank of the state, held by the various relators, were genuine and valid obligations. The difficulty that lay in the way of investigating such issues of fact led the legislature, in 1877, to pass the act in question, having in view, as its principal object, the establishment of a rule governing the burden of proof in such and similar cases.

*The act directs the county treasurer to enclose all bills of the bank of the state tendered in payment of taxes by any person in a package, "sealed and signed by the party tendering the said bills, and by the treasurer to whom said tender is made." Such package is to be deposited by such treasurer with the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas of the county, who is to give duplicate certificates of such deposit, one to the party tendering and the other to such county treasurer, and directs that such package "abide the decision of the court in any proceeding which may be instituted in regard to said bills." It then declares that "in all proceedings by mandamus, or otherwise, to compel the reception of bills of the said corporation as a legal tender for taxes to the state, and refused, an issue shall be framed under the direction of the judge, and at a regular term of the Court of Common Pleas for the county wherein said bills are tendered, shall be submitted to a jury to inquire and determine by their verdict if the bills so tendered in payment for taxes are genuine and valid bills of the said corporation and have not been funded by the state, and since fraudulently uttered, and are the bills the payment of which is not prohibited by the constitution of the state and by the constitution of the United States. And upon the trial of said issue the burden of proof shall be upon the person tendering said bills to establish that the said bills are genuine and valid bills of the said corporation, and have not been funded by the state, and since fraudulently uttered, and that said bills are bills the payment of which is not prohibited by the constitution of the state and of the United States." The act then provides that if such bills shall be found, by the verdict of the jury, genuine and valid, that they shall then be received by the county treasurer in payment of taxes due the state. If found not to be genuine and valid the clerk of the court shall cancel such bills in the presence of the court, and file the packages of canceled bills with the record of the case in his office.

The respondent alleges that he had tendered bills of the bank of the state to the appellant, as county treasurer, for the payment of taxes due to the state, and that such bills were enclosed in a package and deposited with the clerk of the court in the manner prescribed by the act, and prayed that an issue might be *framed in accordance with the provisions of the act in question, and, finally, that further proceedings to enforce said taxes "shall await the determination of the trial of the issues provided in said act of June 9th, 1877," &c.

On motion, an order settling issues was made by the Circuit judge, from which the county treasurer has appealed. It is evident that if no such proceeding, as the act contemplated, is pending between the parties, there is no authority for the Circuit Court to proceed to try the issues framed, or any issues whatever, and in that case the whole proceeding would have to be dismissed. Two views of this question have been presented, the first being that the tender of the bills and their deposit with the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas in the manner prescribed by the act was, within the intent and meaning of the act, the commencement of a legal proceeding authorizing the framing and trial of issues of fact of the nature and with the consequences prescribed by the act in question, and, second, that the petition was, at all events, such a proceeding as the act contemplated. The first of these grounds is disposed of by the clear language of the act. The act declares that the bills so deposited shall "abide the decision of the court in any proceeding which may be instituted in regard to said bills." This contemplated the institution of some proceeding by means other than that of the making of the tender and deposit of the bills. This language would be senseless if the tender and deposit of the bills, in itself, had the effect of instituting such a proceeding. An implication creating a new and summary remedy, without a definition of its character and incidents, in a case where known and well-understood remedies exist, adequate for the purpose, if capable of being made under any circumstances, could not be made as against language so clear and explicit.

Is, then, the filing of the respondent's petition the institution of a remedy such as was contemplated by the act? If it is such a remedy, it is because the act has made it such, for, independently of the act, such a petition has no legal sanction, and can confer no jurisdiction on the Common Pleas.

The provisions of the statute in question, as to the framing of issues, are the only source from which authority to commence *such a proceeding can be claimed, if it exists. Do they warrant such an inference? These provisions are declared to be applicable to all "proceedings instituted by mandamus, or otherwise, to compel the reception of bills of the said corporation as a legal tender for taxes." Whether the language of the statute, the rules of construction, or the object of the statute, as defined by the circumstances under which it became a law, be considered, it is very clear that the proceedings intended by the statute were these established by law, and in common use for the same or like purposes. The object and end of the proceeding is distinctly stated, namely, "to compel the reception of the bills," &c. The petition contains no prayer that the county treasurer may be compelled to receive the bills in payment of taxes. If it had, possibly the petition might have been regarded as a suggestion for a mandamus. That the omission was not accidental may be inferred from the fact that the petition was filed after the passage of the act of December 21st, 1878, prohibiting the issuing of writs of mandamus for such purposes. State v. County Treasurer, 4 S. C. 520.

The only affirmative relief prayed for is in the nature of an injunction to restrain the enforcement of the taxes pendente lite—a remedy prohibited by law. Gen. Stat. 96. The theory of the petition is, that a verdict establishing the genuineness and validity of the bill is, in itself, a complete and perfect remedy, whereas the act distinctly provides that the issues framed, and the verdict taken upon them, shall be an incident merely of a remedy having for its end the compelling of the county treasurer to receive the bills in payment of the claimants' taxes. As the respondent does not ask to have his petition treated as a suggestion for mandamus, we need not consider the effect of State v. County Treasurer on the question of the validity of such a demand.

The proceeding on the part of the respondent fails, therefore, to possess the character due to the proceedings in which issues may be framed and tried under the statute. Again, the words "mandamus, or otherwise," exclude the idea that the statute intended to give a new and specific remedy for the purposes contemplated in it. These words describe a class of remedies, and not a par*ticular specific remedy newly created. The leading and characteristic member of that class, selected to represent the nature and kind of remedies intended, is mandamus, a known remedy, and, in fact, the very remedy then generally employed for that purpose. The remedy particularly specified, according to familiar rules, characterizes the intention of the legislature so regulating the proceedings in existing remedies, and not as creating a new, and until then unknown, remedy. A mandamus is a regular and formal remedy, and its mention, in such a connection, excludes the idea that a summary and informal remedy was intended to be created. In a word, the object of the statute was to create a rule of proof as to existing remedies, to be applied to any known remedy that might be resorted to for the purpose contemplated in the act, and "otherwise" was inserted to prevent parties from escaping the burden of the rule of proof by selecting some other remedy in the place of mandamus—such, for instance, as an action for seizing property in satisfaction of the tax after tender alleged to be duly made.

It must, therefore, be concluded that the court was without jurisdiction to proceed upon the respondent's petition, and the appeal should be sustained, and the order framing issues set aside and the petition dismissed. The appellant has not objected to the appeal on the ground that an interlocutory order in a special proceeding is not appealable, and it will not be considered.

Proceedings dismissed.

(Case No. 738.)

THE STATE, ex rel. JAMES E. ATKINS, v. TOWN OF MAYSVILLE.

(April Term, 1879.)

[1. Municipal Corporations ⟸956.]

A municipal corporation has no power to levy taxes without express authority granted in its charter for that purpose.

For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 2010; Dec. Dig. ⟸956.]

[2. Mandamus ⟸112.]

Query: Can a municipal body be compelled by mandamus to levy a tax to pay judgments recovered against it?

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 238–248; Dec. Dig. ⟸112.]

*This was an original application to the Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus to compel the corporate authorities of the town of Maysville, a municipal corporation, to levy a tax upon all of the taxable property within the town, to satisfy a judgment recovered by the relator against the town of Maysville, payment of which could not be enforced under the ordinary process of the Circuit Court. The charter of this town is silent upon the subject of taxation.

Mr. J. S. G. Richardson, for relator.

† 1. The charter of the town of Maysville is silent upon the subject of taxation; it neither denies the right, nor does it, in terms, confer it. For charter, see Acts of 1874, p. 551.

2. The action in this case was to enforce an obligation, arising not ex contractu but ex delicto.

That the charter is silent as to the power to tax for the purpose of satisfying obligations of that class, can hardly make any difference. Such power is never conferred in express terms; but we submit that in all cases it arises by necessary implication from the mere fact of corporate existence. Damages are, in their nature, penal—are often given for the purpose of punishing the offender—and can it be supposed that the legislature ever intended, in giving corporate existence to a body of men, that they, as an ideal whole, should escape the consequences of its delicts and other offences, whether public or private.

The legislature confers the corporate existence, and by its general laws commands it to commit no trespasses upon the rights of others. The sanction of the general law is the damage imposed for the breach of the command. It would be doing great injustice to the legislature to suppose that it deliberately and purposely intended to throw a shield over the corporation and thereby protect it from the sanctions which the general law imposes.

That the authority of a municipal corporation to impose taxes may arise by implication, is clear from many authorities, a good many of which may be found in the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, from 23 How. to the present time. *We contend that the right to tax to pay damages recovered in actions ex delicto is never expressly conferred, but arises in all cases by implication; and we would go farther, and if necessary contend—if the legislature should ever, in terms, deny the right—that it would be the duty of the courts to declare the provision void, according to those principles of right and justice which are supposed to underlie all laws, which Lord Coke mentions, and which are set forth and approved by the court in Ham v. McLaws, 1 Bay 97; or it may be under a provision of the constitution, which we will now proceed to notice.

Article IX., Section 8, after providing that the corporate authorities of cities, towns, &c., may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes, adds, "and the general assembly shall require that all the property, except that heretofore exempted within the limits of municipal corporations, shall be taxed for the payment of debts contracted under the authority of law." There cannot be a doubt, it seems to me, that every debt contracted by a corporation comes within the protection of this provision of the constitution; for how can a debt exist unless it be contracted by authority of law.

If a corporation should go through the form of contracting a debt, that form would amount to nothing, unless the authority to contract it existed; it would be a mere form and nothing more; or, in other words, there would be no debt. But even in such a case as that, if the corporation should be sued in some high court of general jurisdiction for the purpose of enforcing the supposed obligation, and judgment should be rendered against it, would not the obligation arising out of the judgment be a debt contracted by authority of law? The defendant would certainly be estopped from denying the validity of the original supposed obligation which now, under the authority of the law itself, has become res adjudicata, settling the question for all time to come. But whether this be true or not, as to void or voidable obligations arising in form ex contractu, it must be true as to obligations arising ex delicto. Obligations of this latter class arise from acts which the corporation, from the mere fact of its existence as a corporation, has capacity to commit. If it commits the act, the law imposes the obligation to pay the penalty—that is, *the damages which a jury may give, and when an action is brought by the injured party and judgment is recovered therein, the original obligation arising ex delicto merges in the judgment, and a new obligation arising quasi ex contractu is created by the judgment—this new obligation is a debt fixed and liquidated; it is a debt contracted by authority of law, to be enforced under the section of the constitution above cited, by taxes to be assessed and collected for that purpose.

† This is the last argument made by Mr. Richardson in the Supreme Court.

But, if the constitution contained no such provision as that found in Article IX., Section 8, can there be a doubt that the authority as well as the duty to levy and collect taxes for the payment of obligations arising ex delicto, exists by implication. We cannot see how there can be a doubt about it.

To insert in a charter that the corporation shall satisfy its obligations ex delicto by imposing taxes for the purpose, would be to assume that the corporation is likely to incur such obligations. That would hardly be proper, and all such charters are, therefore, very properly silent upon the subject.

Our propositions, then, are—

1. That under the constitution of this state all debts contracted by a municipal corporation, when authorized by the charter, either by express terms or by necessary implication, must be paid by taxation, and that mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the corporation to levy the taxes. See Const., Art. IX., § 8; Com'rs of Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 24 How. 376; Walkley v. City of Muscatine, 6 Wall. 481.

2. Where the charter does not deny the authority to tax, but merely ignores it, and the corporation is expressly authorized to contract a debt for any special purpose, nothing being said as to how the debt is to be paid, but the right to tax for its payment is not denied, then the debt is contracted by authority of law and must be paid by taxation.

3. Where the authority to contract a debt is conferred upon the corporation, but the authority to tax for its payment is expressly denied, as a general rule it may be said the debt would be null and void. Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655. But in this state, under the constitution, (Art. IX., § 8,) it would *seem not that the debt contracted by the corporation, but that the denial of the authority to tax, is void.

4. Obligations arising ex delicto stand upon a very different footing from those arising ex contractu. They can only be enforced, in the first instance, by an action at law. When judgment is recovered and the damages fixed and ascertained by the verdict, the obligation arising ex delicto is merged in the judgment, it becomes, in the language of the ancient jurists, an obligation arising quasi ex contractu—an obligation to be enforced, it may be, in the first instance, by execution against property under the judgment; but certainly by equal and just taxation, as directed by the constitution, and where neither the act of the legislature nor an ordinance of the town authorizes the levying of the tax, it is the duty of the court, by its writ of mandamus, to compel the corporation to make the assessment and levy the tax.

Mr. Joseph H. Earle, for respondents.

Under our construction of the charter of the town of Maysville, it is not the duty of the respondents to levy a tax to satisfy the relator's judgment, nor, indeed, have they any power to levy a tax for any purpose whatever. But it is necessary to the issuance of this writ that two pre-requisites appear. First, the relator must show that he has a clear, legal right to the performance of the particular act or duty at the hands of the respondents; and, second, that the law affords no other adequate or specific remedy to secure the enforcement of the right and the performance of the duty it is sought to coerce. High on Extra. Rem., § 10.

In the case at bar it must be admitted that there is, at least, much doubt and uncertainty as to the power of the respondents to levy a tax, since the charter is silent upon the subject; and where substantial doubt exists as to the duty whose performance it is sought to coerce, or as to the power of the officer to perform the duty, the relief will be withheld. High on Extra. Rem., § 32; 24 Tex. 317; 2 Chand. 250.

We admit that mandamus may be the proper remedy to enforce the satisfaction of a judgment against a municipal corporation;

*but it must appear that this duty is plainly and specifically imposed by law upon the corporate authorities to levy a tax for that purpose. 4 Wall. 435; 8 Wall. 575; High on Extra. Rem. 375; 35 Me. 345; 24 Barb. 166; 27 Ark. 457; United States, ex rel., v. Macon County, (Supreme Court U. S., October Term, 1878.)

Are the respondents authorized to levy a tax? This is the one important question in this case. To ascertain this fact we must look to the charter of the town of Maysville. This is the organic law which gives to the corporation its existence and its character. It has no power except such as is conferred by the charter. 4 Wait Actions and Defences 601; 21 Ohio 273; 4 Hill 76; Blackwell on Tax Titles 448; 1 Blackf. 336; Burroughs on Taxation 371; 56 Mo. 126; 2 Dill. on Mun. Cor. 605; 1 Id., § 336.

Being special grants of power, the charters of municipal corporations must be strictly construed. 35 Miss. 189; 29 Cal. 180. Any ambiguity or doubt arising out of the terms used must be resolved in favor of the public. 23 How. U. S. 435; 18 Ohio 523.

There must be a distinct legislative authority for every tax that is levied. This is a principle that admits of no exception whatever. Cooley on Taxation 244; 45 Ind. 310; 1 Dill. Mun. Cor., § 55.

The charter of Maysville certainly contains no express authority for the performance of the duty sought to be imposed upon the respondents, nor does such authority arise anywhere from necessary implication. It is equally clear that this power is not essential to the declared object and purposes of this corporation.

It cannot, upon any theory of construction, be determined that this great and dangerous power, of which the courts can never be too jealous, was ever intended to be vested in this corporation; and, if not intended, then the power does not exist; for such corporations have no inherent power of taxation. 47 Miss. 367; 13 Gratt. 78, 98; 11 Bush 18; 5 Gill 383, 395; 19 Wis. 624; 21 Gratt. 604.

We do not for a moment deny that the legislature can compel *a municipal corporation to recognize and pay a debt contracted under authority of law, by levying a tax. This doctrine has long since been established. Dill. on Mun. Cor., vol. I., § 44. But a petition to the legislature is a different proceeding from an application to this court for a writ of mandamus.

In our view of this case, it matters not whether the original obligation arose ex delicto or ex contractu, or whether the judgment be ex contractu or quasi ex contractu.

May 28th, 1879. The opinion was delivered

PER CURIAM. The relator asks a mandamus to compel the town of Maysville to levy a tax to pay the amount of a judgment recovered by the relator against said town. The only point discussed at bar is the power of the town of Maysville to levy taxes. It appears that no express authority is granted for that purpose in its charter. Such power can only be implied on the ground of necessary implication. To raise such an implication it would be necessary to hold that municipal powers cannot be effectively granted without the taxing power—a proposition that we cannot affirm; no such power of taxation can therefore be implied.

This is a sufficient answer to the relator's demand, and renders it unnecessary to decide the question already suggested in State v. City of Columbia S. C.[1] as not passed upon, namely, whether a municipal body can be compelled, by mandamus, to levy a tax to pay judgments recovered against it. That question was neither raised by the parties nor argued, and for that reason we do not feel bound to consider it.

The petition must be dismissed.

Petition dismissed.

[1] Case No. 736, unreported, opinion filed May 27th, 1879. It was an application to the Circuit Court for a writ of mandamus to compel the city of Columbia to levy a tax sufficient to pay the amount of a judgment recovered by one of the relators against that city. It did not appear that the relators had exhausted their legal remedies; and for that reason the application was refused.

*(Case No. 739.)

Ex parte C. T. MITCHELL, Receiver, In re DANIEL HAND, v. SAVANNAH AND CHARLESTON RAILROAD COMPANY et al.

(April Term, 1879.)

[Receivers ⇐121.]

An order directing repairs to be made for the preservation of railroad property in the hands of a receiver appointed by the court, to be paid for with certificates of indebtedness constituting a first lien upon such railroad, can be made only upon motion and after a proper investigation and hearing.

[2. Appeal and Error ⇐190.]

[Cited in State v. Port Royal & A. R. R. Co., 45 S. C. 468, 23 S. E. 880, as an example of the power of the Supreme Court to set aside on appeal an order of the circuit court granted without notice, no previous application to set aside having been made in the latter court.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1216–1220; Dec. Dig. ⇐ 190.]

[This case is also cited in Hand v. Savannah & C. R. Co., 17 S. C. 221, as to facts.]

Before Hudson, J., at Charleston, March, 1879.

The Circuit judge passed an order directing the receiver of the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company to purchase new iron and cross-ties and one new locomotive, at a cost not exceeding $75,380. For such expenditure the receiver was authorized to issue his pay certificates, to be paid, in the first place, out of the net income of the road not already, by order of the court, otherwise appropriated; and if not so paid, then on the sale of the road, out of the proceeds of such sale, in priority to the mortgages. He subsequently filed the following paper as a part of his judgment:

On the morning of the 18th of March, A.

D. 1 79. C. T. Mitchell, Esq., as receiver of the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, submitted to this court a report of the condition of the road, setting forth the gross income thereof for several years past, and stating that from this source sufficient has not been, and manifestly will not be, realized to keep the road in repairs and furnish the much-needed additional rolling stock requisite to the business. The report is full, and shows the absolute necessity of immediate repairs to the road, and the urgent call for additional and safe rolling stock. Reference to the report must be had for its details. In filing this report, Messrs. Memminger, Campbell and Young, representing chiefly the holders of the seven per cent. mortgage bonds, issued under *act of 1869, applied to the court for an order allowing the receiver to purchase the necessary additional rolling stock, and to make the necessary repairs of the road, and in payment thereof to issue his certificates, which should stand as a lien on the road in preference of all mortgage liens.

After discussion by counsel for and against the measure, the court referred it to the superintendent of the road, Mr. C. S. Gadsden, and an engineer, to report to the court what repairs of the road are urgently demanded, and what additional rolling stock is really needed to enable the road to do the business required of it. At five o'clock p. m. of the same day this report was submitted to the court. In substance the report stated that the road could be made secure and safe to the public by relaying with new rails twenty miles of the track, and with the best of the old rails repairing the balance.

That many new cross-ties are needed, and that of rolling stock there are needed two new engines and fifty new box-cars. The estimated cost of these matters of purchase and repairs he puts at $110,000.

Pursuant to notice counsel appeared to defend and resist this proposed scheme of expenditure. The resistance came from a number of attorneys, representing chiefly the holders of the six per cent. bonds, issued under act of 1856, and recently declared by the Circuit Court to be a first lien on the road. In resisting the application aforesaid, they urged that sufficient notice had not been given; that the court has no jurisdiction to allow any expenditure to create a first lien; that the necessity therefor does not exist; that the matter should at least be referred to a master of this court for examination and report; that the interest of their clients will be greatly jeopardized by the proposed creation of a first lien.

On the contrary, it was urged that the court having assumed the custody, control and management of the road, is clothed with jurisdiction to order an expenditure and outlay sufficient to preserve the property, which being a public highway imposes on the court duties of the gravest character; duties and responsibilities not alone to the creditors, but to the public. That the expenditures asked are not for the improvement of the property, but for *its preservation, a measure which will redound as much or more to the advantage of the holders of the first liens, whoever they may be, as to other creditors; that unless the road be speedily repaired serious accidents to the traveling public are imminent, and great loss of business to the road. That already the owners of connecting lines have given notice that they will sever their connection with the Savannah and Charleston railroad as a connecting link of a through route, and will form other connections unless this road be put in repairs and made safe to the public. At the conclusion of the argument I announced my judgment orally in open court, and signed an order to carry the same into effect, which was placed on file in the cause.

It has since been suggested to me that the order is open to a construction at variance with the judgment pronounced. To avoid misunderstanding, I proceed simply to announce in writing the judgment orally delivered.

I do not regard the controversy as arising on a motion of which formal and due notice is required. The receiver of the road in the discharge of his duty, laid before the court important information touching the responsible trust imposed upon him, which information, in the judgment of the court, calls for prompt and decisive action. Unfortunately, the course of litigation between the creditors of this road has become very complicated; has already produced much delay, is likely to produce much more delay, and prevents me from signing an order for the sale of the property, which would be more agreeable to my feelings, and more conducive to the welfare of all concerned. Pending this delay, this court remains the custodian and manager of the property through its constituted agent, and having assumed, must discharge the full measure of the duties and responsibilities of that management to the company, its creditors, and to the public. The court at present can make no order of sale, and hence the road must be suspended in its operations, or continued as a public highway.

No one desires or asks that it be suspended. To suffer it to be operated at great hazard to human life, and at the risk of loss to private property, without the means of responding in damages, would not only be an act of remissness and negligence in *the court, but would be criminal. The information laid before me by the intelligent receiver and superintendent, satisfies me that the exigency requires material repairs to preserve the property, and make the road a highway safe to travel and transportation, and leaves no doubt in my mind as to the duty of the court. I feel that I would betray the trusts reposed in me by the law were I to withhold action, and carelessly suffer this road, in its unsafe condition, to be held out to the public as a highway and thoroughway, without repairs. But I deem my power in this respect to be exhausted, by ordering only such purchases of rolling stock and repairs of the road, as are necessary to preserve the property in running order.

I will, therefore, only allow the receiver to make an outlay in this direction not exceeding the sum of $75,380, to be expended for the items of repairs and purchases set forth in his estimate, except the fifty box cars and one of the locomotives.

In no event shall the face value of the certificates to be issued for the expenditures exceed the sum aforesaid, to wit, $75,380 in the aggregate, and the most scrupulous care and fidelity is enjoined upon the said receiver in carrying out this judgment, and the order based thereon of date March 18th, 1879. No rate of interest having been fixed for the certificates, in the said order, the receiver will see that they bear a rate not exceeding seven per centum per annum. Let this judgment be filed as of even date with the order of March 18th, 1879, of which it forms a part.

[For subsequent opinion, see 13 S. C. 467.]

The holders of a certain class of mortgages outstanding upon this railroad property, appealed, upon several grounds, including that upon which the appeal was decided. So far as the arguments of counsel bear upon the point decided, they were as follows:

Messrs. T. M. Hanckell, W. H. Brawley and Bryan & Bryan, for appellants.

We submit that said order has been made without due caution or deliberation, and, as appears by the record itself, without sufficient opportunity given to parties in interest, either to investigate the facts alleged in the reports of the receiver and the *superintendent of the road, or to examine the law applicable to the case, or opportunity given to the attorneys in the cause even to consult with their clients as to the advisability of the order, to obtain from them any information in their possession, or to receive any instructions whatsoever in the premises.

That said order was made, as appears by the record, without the usual reference to a master, in a case in which the courts have held that such an order should be made with the greatest care and circumspection, with full notice to all parties in interest, and with ample opportunity given to them to examine witnesses and accounts, to produce testimony, and submit argument upon the facts and the law.

That said order, as appears by the record, was made, after a reference for a few hours, to a referee, which reference was contrary to law, and the order made upon his report without opportunity given to the parties in interest to appear before him for the purpose of examining evidence or submitting either testimony or argument. Meyer v. Johnston, 53 Ala. 237, 346; Fosdick v. Schall, 9 Otto 235.

Mr. C. G. Memminger, for respondents.

The whole matter lay in the discretion of the court, and, in the effort to guide that discretion, the suggestions of counsel could not assume the technical form of a motion. The action of the court must be deemed spontaneous, and the first difficulty, therefore, which the present application to the Supreme Court presents, is whether it can be dealt with as an appeal.

The entire action is within the inner orbit of the court. The court has undertaken to manage. It has appointed its receiver; given him possession and directions. Difficulties occur in the management; he submits them to the court. There is no interference from without. It is the receiver (the agent of the court) who comes to his principal for instructions. That principal simply calls for argument for his own enlightenment, and then gives his own instructions. This is one of the absolute necessities produced by the situation, and no fault can be found with the judge for exercising his judgment. The only question which *can arise is, whether this judgment was so unwise as to call for the interference of the Supreme Court.

The objections made to the action of the court are in part formal and in part substantial.

The formal objection made to the want of notice is probably made from a want of knowledge of facts. Mr. Cutting's solicitors were not informed of the condition of the road any sooner than the solicitors of the other parties. The report of the receiver was only known to them at the same time that notice was given to the other parties, and the receiver himself stated that he expected the court would sit for one or two weeks beyond the time when he made his report, and that he was as much concerned as they were when he heard that the court was so soon to adjourn, and that he acted in good faith by hastening on the matter at the time he reported.

May 29th, 1879. The opinion was delivered

PER CURIAM. The order below, made on the application of C. T. Mitchell, receiver, was improperly granted. Orders of that class can only be made on motion and after a proper investigation and hearing. We are not called upon to determine the question of law raised by the appeal as to the authority of the court to make such order, and the propriety of the order itself.

Having the whole cause before us on appeal,† we are enabled to say that an early sale of the road is practicable and desirable, which, if made, would obviate any necessity for the order in question.

We are, nevertheless, disposed to submit all questions regarding the time and terms of such sale to the determination of the Circuit Court, after hearing, on due notice.

The order must be set aside and the proceedings remanded to the Circuit Court for the purposes above indicated, with liberty to grant an order of sale, notwithstanding the pendency of the appeal and without prejudice to the rights of parties to apply to the court for prudential orders in conformity herewith, in order to maintain the efficiency of the service and the traffic of the road until sale and delivery.

*(Case No. 740.)

THE STATE v. ALFRED McNINCH.

(April Term, 1879.)

[1. Grand Jury ⇐15.]

The jury commissioner who assisted in drawing the grand jury that found the bill of indictment, and the petit jury that convicted the prisoner, was the husband of a fourth cousin of deceased. Held, no ground for quashing the indictment, or granting a new trial.

[2. Grand Jury ⇐34.]

That the Circuit solicitor went into the room of the grand jury after they had agreed, and at the request of the foreman, to instruct him how to write the finding, is no ground for quashing an indictment. Distinction drawn between this case and State v. Addison, 2 S. C. 356.

[This case is also cited in State v. Turner, 36 S. C. 535, 15 S. E. 602, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Aldrich, J., at Laurens, February, 1879.

The prisoner was indicted for the murder of William C. Kilgore, on December 2d, 1878.

Besides the facts stated in the opinion of the court, it appears that while the jury was being empaneled, the solicitor ordered jurors to stand aside, without challenge or cause shown; but that the panel being exhausted these same jurors were recalled and presented to the prisoner.

J. S. Grimes, a witness sworn for the prosecution, gave testimony concerning the circumstances of the difficulty which ended in the death of the deceased. In his charge to the jury the judge said: "I do not give the evidence of this witness [i. e., Grimes,] *because he was withdrawn and not cross-examined; I suspected he was drunk, but as the attention of the court was not called thereto, I exercised a liberal charity and let him go. He said nothing material." His Honor made the following report afterwards upon this matter, the Mr. Garlington referred to being counsel assisting the solicitor in the prosecution:

"The witness, Grimes, was presented by the state, and was examined by Mr. Garlington. His answers to the first questions attracted my attention. I suspected he was intoxicated. A few more answers convinced me he was drunk. The examination proceeded until, I think, the counsel, the jury, and the bar came to the same conclusion, when Mr. Garlington proposed to withdraw him, in which I acquiesced. The defence claimed the right to cross-examine, which was admitted by the solicitor. The presiding judge said: 'Of course you have the right to cross-examine, but I do not see the use of continuing the examination in his present condition; he may be recalled, either to resume his examination in chief or to cross-examine, as may be desired by the prosecution or the defence.' The witness was withdrawn, after some consultation between the counsel for the defence, and was not recalled by either side. No exception was taken, and the right to cross-examine not denied.

"After he was withdrawn I lost sight of him; had never seen him before and supposed he was very drunk, until to-day, when I was informed it was his natural manner. This may be so, but I do not think I could be mistaken. In my opinion the man was drunk."

At the conclusion of his charge to the jury, the judge was requested by the prisoner to charge the jury in the words set out in the third and fourth grounds for a new trial in this court. Upon these two requests his Honor reports: "I was requested to give certain instructions to the jury, as contained in first request, which being, in my opinion, covered by the charge, were refused. I did charge as requested in the second request, but added that it was the duty of the jury to inquire who was the first wrong-doer."

The prisoner was convicted.

*The case was brought to this court by the defendant upon the following notice and grounds:

The defendant, Alfred McNinch, notifies of an appeal, and that he will move in the Supreme Court, at the next regular term thereof, to reverse the ruling of his Honor Hon. A. P. Aldrich, in his refusal to quash the indictment herein:

I.

1. Because Stobo D. Garlington, the jury commissioner, who assisted in drawing the grand jury who found the bill of indictment, was the husband of a cousin of the deceased, William C. Kilgore.

2. Because the solicitor, B. W. Ball, Esq., had, under the direction of the court, free access to the grand jury, and did visit the same, before and during the day they had under consideration the bill of indictment in this case.

II.

1. And the said defendant will at the same time move to set aside the verdict in this case, and the judgment of the court thereon, on the further ground that his Honor the presiding judge erred in allowing the solicitor, when the petit jury was empaneled, to cause jurors then presented to the prisoner to stand aside, without challenge and without cause shown.

2. Because his Honor the presiding judge erred in withdrawing from the consideration of the petit jury charged with the trial of this action, the testimony of one J. S. Grimes, a witness on the part of the prosecution, after he had testified.

3. Because his Honor the presiding judge, although requested so to charge, refused to charge the jury that all the circumstances of the homicide having been disclosed by evidence for the prosecution, the homicide does not imply malice, but malice can be established only by the circumstances themselves.

4. Because his Honor, when charging by request, that "it is for the jury to inquire if the deceased struck the first blow with his pistol upon the prisoner, and if the prisoner should reasonably fear for his life, or fear great bodily harm, then, as a matter of law, the prisoner might be found not guilty," erred in adding *that it was also the duty of the jury to inquire who was first in the wrong.

5. Because the said jury commissioner, being connected by marriage with the said deceased, assisted in drawing the petit jury who tried this cause.

Because the Circuit judge erred in charging the jury that in the testimony of J. S. Grimes, he said nothing material.

Messrs. Pope, Baxter & Caldwell, for appellants.

Upon the first ground taken for quashing the indictment, reference was made to 5 S. C. 429; and upon the second ground, to 2 S. C. 356. The challenge to the array of the petit jury and the motion to set aside the venire because drawn by a relative of the deceased after his death, should have been sustained. 5 S. C. 429. The state having now the right to challenge two jurors peremptorily, cannot require any to stand aside. Before the act of 33 Edward I., the right of peremptory challenges by the king was unlimited. 1 Chit. on Crim. Law 534. That act took away from the king the right of peremptory challenge, and it became the practice to allow the king to require the jurors to stand aside. That act was made of force in South Carolina in 1731, but was repealed by implication in 1871, (14 Stat. 694,) and expressly in 1872, (Gen. Stat. 782.) So now the state has only two peremptory challenges.

The witness, Grimes, was withdrawn before cross-examination, without the consent of the prisoner, who insisted upon his right to cross-examine. In charging the jury that this witness said nothing material, his Honor disregarded the requirement of Section 26, Article IV., of our state constitution. Its materiality was a question of fact, and the judge's misapprehension of that testimony invalidates the judgment. 1 Mill Con. R. 200, 216; 1 Bail. 482; 2 Bail. 128; 5 S. C. 65, 67. Upon the third ground for a new trial, counsel cited 6 S. C. 185; 42 N. Y. 1; 53 N. Y. 164; 1 Archb. Crim. Pr. and Pl., Pomeroy's Notes, 152. Upon the fourth ground, they contended that the words added were indefinite and might mislead. It may have carried their minds to offensive words, rather than to illegal acts. 6 S. C. 185.

*Mr. Solicitor Ball, for the state.

As to the relationship of the jury commissioner, see 1 Burr. Law Dict. 69, title "Affinity." There is no nearness in this case. A challenge to the array may be based on partiality of the officer. 1 Co. Lit. 156, 1st Am. ed. The early decisions have reference to the sheriff or other officer who returned the venire. 3 Whart. on Crim. Law., § 3016. But here the state is a party and not the deceased. Under our statute, there are three officers. The motion to quash is not proper—there should have been a challenge to the array, and that could be only in writing. 3 Whart. on Crim. Law, § 2947. If defendant is correct, the trial might be perpetually blocked. As to the solicitor going into the grand jury room, we have no statute in our state. Mr. Chitty says it is permitted in England. See 1 Whart. on Crim. Law 495, 496. This case in every aspect is very different from Addison's case. 2 S. C. 356.

The right of the state to require jurors to stand aside temporarily, is well settled. Gen. Stat. 747; 2 N. & McC. 553; 7 Rich. 416; 3 Whart. on Crim. Law, § 2956. The present statute does not affect this right, because it gives to the state two peremptory challenges; standing aside for cause, as authorized in 33 Edward I., does not mean the same thing.

As to the witness, Grimes. He testified in the hearing of the jury, and it was no error in the judge not to read over his testimony to them. There was nothing that he said that was favorable to the prisoner, and therefore he is not prejudiced.

The judge properly refused the first request to charge, as he had already fully covered the whole ground of the case. It is not error in such cases for the judge to refuse to charge an abstract proposition of law, selected from some decided case, as in this case from 6 S. C. 185. 1 Archb. Cr. Pr. and Pl. 171, 641, 1643; 5 Wend. 289. The second request to charge is the demoralizing principle announced in Selfridge's case; but his Honor's qualification states the correct doctrine, and just as he had already charged, and the jury could not have been misled by the charge. Notes to 1 Arch. Cr. Pr. and Pl. 643, citing 3 Strob. 155.

As to the principles upon which new trials are granted, see *4 Whart. on Crim. Law 3226, 3248, 3253; 2 N. & McC. 261; 2 Bail. 37, 69, 665; 14 Geo. 55; 3 Wat. New Trials 302, 862; 3 Brev. 522.

May 31st, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. The motion to quash the indictment in this case was upon two grounds:

1. Because the jury commissioner who aided in drawing members of the grand jury "was the husband of a cousin of the deceased."

2. Because the solicitor "had, under the direction of the court, free access to the grand jury, and did visit the same before and during the day they had under consideration the bill of indictment in this case."

The appeal is from the refusal of the Circuit judge to grant the motion. As to the first ground, the testimony is that the wife of the jury commissioner is a cousin of the deceased in the fourth or fifth degree, and there is no evidence of affinity other than that incident to such connection. There is no consanguinity between the jury commissioner and the deceased, and the degree of affinity shown is remote—too remote to be of itself evidence of bias or prejudice against the person charged. The case of State v. McQuaige, 5 S. C. 429, was decided upon the ground that the jury commissioner was a near blood relation—first cousin of the deceased. It is unnecessary, perhaps impossible, to draw an absolute line to mark what degree of relationship or affinity must control in such cases; but it is sufficient here to say that in the present case there is no relationship by blood, and no evidence of such affinity as, of itself, would reasonably lead to the presumption that the jury commissioner would thereby be affected in such manner as to impair the proper discharge of his duties.

As to the second ground, the evidence is that the solicitor did go to the grand jury room, "at the request of the foreman, * * * and instructed him how to write the findings, but that he had not been in the room while the case of the prisoner was under consideration." The evidence is conclusive on the point in question; but this court does not hesitate to say that the solicitor has *on many occasions the right and the duty to communicate with the grand jury as to the manner in which the business in their hands is to be conducted. It is the established practice for the Circuit judge to instruct the grand jury to apply to himself, or to the solicitor, for such further instruction or information as they may deem necessary. The solicitor is a sworn officer of the state, and responsible for the proper discharge of the duties of his office; he is presumed to have the power to discriminate between matters on which he should or should not communicate with the grand jury, and error must be shown and not presumed. The case of State v. Addison, 2 S. C. 356, is entirely different, and not applicable to the point now under consideration. In that case it was not a solicitor whose conduct was in question, but an attorney who was conducting the prosecution, and who was, further, a paid attorney, retained to aid in the prosecution. The facts were entirely different, for, in that case, the attorney actually interfered with the grand jury in their consideration of the bill, and argued the case in the grand jury room. Here there were no such circumstances; but this much is said to indicate that there is a broad distinction between the solicitor—an officer of the state—and one who acts merely as an attorney-at-law to aid in the prosecution. The ruling of the Circuit judge must be sustained.

The first ground for new trial is that the judge erred in allowing the state, when the petit jury was being empaneled, to cause jurors to "stand aside" without challenge, and without cause shown. The practice pursued in this respect by the Circuit judge has been long since established, and no law or sufficient reason has been advanced to show why it should be changed. State v. Barrontine, 2 N. & McC. 553; State v. Wise & Johnston, 7 Rich. 412. The order to stand aside for a time is distinct from a challenge, and is not affected by the act of 1871 (14 Stat. 690), which confers upon the state the additional right of peremptory challenge to a limited extent. The ruling of the Circuit court as to this point is sustained.

The second ground is that the judge erred "in withdrawing from the consideration of the petit jury, charged with the trial, * * * the testimony of J. S. Grimes, a witness on the part *of the prosecution, after he had testified." It appears, by the judge's report of the case, that the witness was allowed to be withdrawn at the instance of counsel employed to assist in the prosecution, and that the accused, although he insisted on his right, was not allowed to cross-examine the witness prior to his being withdrawn, although the judge does say that he would have been allowed to call the witness back at some other time to be cross-examined. It is difficult to see how this would have helped the accused, for the witness was practically set down on the ground that he was drunk. Whether or not he was drunk was a question on which no one but the jury was to reach a conclusion so as to affect the case; but, even if the judge had the power to decide that the witness was drunk, he could not either take away from the jury the testimony already given, nor could he deprive the accused of the right to immediately cross-examine. Suppose this witness had been the last, (perhaps it was so,) when could the prisoner have called him back? He could have been deprived absolutely, as he was substantially in this case, of one of the most inestimable rights which belong to those who are tried for crime. The fact that the appellant was deprived of his right to cross-examine the witness before his removal and withdrawal is not contained in the grounds of appeal, but is in the report of the judge. It is urged that the appellant had thus waived his right to appeal from such action of the court below. The same rule does not apply in this respect to civil actions and to trials involving human life. This court is bound, in a capital case, to take notice, in behalf of the accused, of any error apparent upon the record by which the prisoner has been deprived of any of the substantial means of enjoying a fair and impartial trial. As already indicated, it was not the province of the judge to decide that the witness was drunk, nor was it proper to decide that the evidence was immaterial and must be withdrawn. The evidence related to the question in issue, and could not, in a proper sense, be called immaterial; while its materiality, as measured by its weight or value, was a question solely for the jury. Either of the reasons would give sufficient ground for new trial. But the right to cross-examine is one which must remain inviolate. To take it away would render almost value*less the constitutional right "to meet the witnesses against him face to face." Const., Art. I., Sec. 11. It is the law of evidence that "When a witness has been examined in chief, the other party has a right to cross-examine him." 1 Greenl., § 445. "The power of cross-examination has been justly said to be one of the principal, as it certainly is one of the most efficacious, tests which the law has devised for the discovery of truth." Ib., § 446. The right loses its efficacy if its exercise is to be postponed until the witness has had time to reflect or to be subjected to evil influences. It is unnecessary, perhaps, to say more on this point. The law is too plain to require authority. The prisoner was practically deprived, though, doubtless, unintentionally so, of the right to cross-examine the witness produced against him—one of the most inestimable rights by which a man may maintain his defence. It is concluded, therefore, that there is material error in the action of the court with regard to the witness, Grimes; the rulings upon the character of his testimony; its withdrawal from the jury, and the practical deprivation of the right to cross-examine then and there.

The third and fourth grounds show no error, and do not require particular consideration. The fifth ground has been already disposed of.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore set aside, and a new trial granted.

Motion granted.

[This case is also cited in Templeton v. Lowry, 22 S. C. 390, as to the facts, and in Martin v. Bowie, 37 S. C. 115, 15 S. E. 736, as to the right of sale under first levy.]

Before Hudson, J., at York, March, 1878.

The plaintiffs purchased a tract of land at sheriff's sale as the property of J. R. Bratton; the defendant, Lowry, was in possession of this land, claiming it as his own, and Fenton Diggs was his tenant. This action was brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants to recover possession of the land and damages for its detention.

J. R. Bratton was a member of the firm of Allison & Bratton. Judgment in favor of Hugh Galloway was entered up on January 15th, 1871, against J. R. Bratton for $100.60, costs of a suit instituted by Bratton. No levy was endorsed upon the execution in this case. Judgment by default was entered up before the clerk of the court in May, 1872, for $354.36, in favor of Schieffelin & Co. against Allison & Bratton, personal service of the summons accepted by Allison signing the firm name. In July, 1873, separate judgments by default were entered up before the clerk against Allison & Bratton, in favor of Dowie, Moise & Davis, for $194.49, and L. M. Grist for $125.40, respectively. On the summons in the Dowie, Moise & Davis case appears this endorsement: "Personal service of a copy of within summons admitted, May 12th, 1873. (Signed) J. R. Bratton, per John T. Lowry, attorney in fact." In September, 1873, judgment by default before the clerk was obtained by McGill, *administrator, against Allison & Bratton, for $675.05, service of summons being accepted by Allison and also by "J. R. Bratton, per John T. Lowry, attorney in fact." The Dowie, Moise & Davis and Grist executions were properly levied upon the land in dispute, as the property of J. R. Bratton, on September 22d, 1873; and the Schieffelin & Co. and McGill executions were also levied November 5th, 1873; and on the day that these levies were made, certified copies of the executions and levies were filed with the clerk. In these four cases, the judgment recited that J. R. Bratton had been personally served with the summons. On sale-day in December, 1873, the land was sold under these levies, and bid off by J. T. Lowry, who was then in possession, for $1405. During the month Lowry paid to the sheriff $400, (which were applied to the Dowie, Moise & Davis and Grist executions, satisfying them in full,) but failing fully to comply, the land was advertised to be re-sold at his risk on sale-day in January, 1874. Meantime, an order of injunction at the suit of Mrs. Agnes B. Harris prevented the re-sale. This order was modified February 12th, 1874, restraining the re-sale until the assets of Allison & Bratton were exhausted. These partnership assets were exhausted in April, 1874. On February 11th, 1874, judgment was obtained by Mrs. Agnes B. Harris against J. R. Bratton, for $666.95. This judgment recited that the defendant appeared by attorney, answered and admitted the cause of action. Execution was lodged with the sheriff during the same month, but was never levied. H. F. Adickes obtained judgment by default for $663.70, against Allison & Bratton on February 14th, 1874, which recited that the summons and complaint were served personally on the defendants, and adjudged that the plaintiff recover of "said defendants," &c. Upon the summons was endorsed an acceptance by Allison alone. Execution was lodged but never levied. The land was re-sold by the sheriff in June, 1875, and bid off by the plaintiffs for $1000, who complied and received deed of conveyance. Before suit brought in any of these cases (except Galloway's), J. R. Bratton had left the state and remained away. No attachments were issued against his property, and there was no service by publication of summons.

*The defendant claimed the property under deed from J. R. Bratton dated in 1874. He also claimed to have had previously a bond for titles, executed and delivered to him by J. R. Bratton in 1871, in the presence of two witnesses, which bond had been afterwards destroyed in a fire, which consumed his dwelling-house. He denied the validity of the sale, and the legality of all the judgments obtained since Bratton left the state.

The deed was offered in evidence. The witnesses resided out of the state, but proof was admitted under Section 30, Chapter CX., of General Statutes.

The plaintiffs requested the presiding judge to charge: 1. That any execution whose return-day had not expired at the date of injunction order, still kept its active energy during the existence of the injunction. 2. That the defendants had no right to attack, in this action, the judgments under which the sale was made, on the ground that J. R. Bratton was not personally served with the summons. 3. That even though said executions under which the land was sold were void, the sale would still be valid if there was another and valid execution and judgment to which the sale could be referred. 4. That if a levy were made before the return-day of an execution, a sale after return-day would not thereby be void. 5. That if from the testimony, the jury were satisfied that the deed made to J. T. Lowry was for the purpose of hindering, delaying and defrauding the creditors of J. R. Bratton, then that said deed was void. 6. That the re-sale was not affected by the active energy of the execution expiring after first sale. 7. That J. T. Lowry and his tenant were, in this action, estopped from denying that J. T. Lowry was duly authorized to accept service on the summonses against J. R. Bratton.

His Honor declined the third request, on the ground that it was not applicable to the present case. He refused the fourth request, saying that any sale after the one hundred and twenty days had elapsed, was void, even though the levy had been made prior to the return-day of the execution. He granted the fifth request to charge. Upon the remaining exceptions, his Honor held as follows: "That he had grave doubts whether there had been such service of process as would sustain the executions in *these cases against Bratton's individual property; that even were service good, the lien of the executions and the sheriff's power to sell under them expired one hundred and twenty days after the levy, or one hundred and twenty days after all prior encumbrances were removed; that more than one hundred and twenty days appeared to have elapsed after such removal of prior encumbrance affecting the executions last levied; that in the case of W. H. Schieffelin & Co., the execution was levied more than sixty days after it was issued, and the levy was void; and that none of the executions, in the judgment of the court, were effective process to authorize a sale of Bratton's individual property in June, 1875. He further held that these defendants were not estopped upon these questions, as it was incumbent upon any one claiming possession under a sheriff's title, upon an execution sale, to show the validity of the proceedings on which the executions issued. He charged the jury that if they believed that the defendant was in possession, under a bond for title, or contract of sale, at the time of the levy, which was afterwards converted into a fee simple title, that the land could not be taken in execution against Bratton, unless the transaction between Bratton and the defendant was for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding creditors; and of this they must be the judges."

To all of which charges (except the fifth) and refusals to charge, the plaintiffs excepted. The jury retired; and then brought in a verdict for defendants. The plaintiffs thereupon made a motion for a new trial, which motion was refused, and exception thereon taken. The defendants thereupon entered up judgment against the plaintiffs on day of , 1878, for the sum of dollars, costs and disbursements.

From which judgment, charges, refusals to charge, and refusal to grant a new trial, the plaintiffs appealed to this court, and asked that the rulings of the presiding judge be reversed, and a new trial granted, on the ground that his Honor erred in refusing to charge—

1. That any execution whose return-day had not expired at the date of the injunction order, still kept its active energy during the existence of the injunction.

2. That the defendant had no right to attack, in this action, *the judgments under which the sale was made, on the ground that J. R. Bratton was not personally served with the summons.

3. That even though said executions, under which the land was sold, were void, the sale would still be valid if there was another and valid execution and judgment to which the sale could be referred.

4. That if a levy were made before the return-day of an execution, a sale after return-day would not thereby be void.

5. That the re-sale was not affected by the active energy of the executions expiring after the first sale.

6. That J. T. Lowry and his tenant were estopped in this action from denying that J. T. Lowry was duly authorized to accept service on the summonses against J. R. Bratton. And in charging—

7. That the right to sell under the executions depended upon the lien of the executions, and that said lien had expired before the second sale.

8. That the sheriff was without authority to re-sell the land at the time he did sell.

9. That if the defendant, Lowry, was holding the land at the time of the first sale, under a contract to purchase from Bratton, then that the land could not be sold as Bratton's property. And—

10. In refusing to grant a new trial.

11. Because his Honor erred, in his rulings, on the admissibility in evidence of the power of attorney, and the deed from Bratton to Lowry.

[For subsequent opinion, see 15 S. C. 128.]

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellants.

1. The judgments express, upon their face, that the summons had been served personally upon J. R. Bratton. This recital cannot be controverted, except in proceedings instituted by the defendant in execution directly attacking the judgments. 3 McC. 346; 1 N. & McC. 408; Harper 463; Freeman on Judg., §§ 130, 131; Rorer on Jud. Sales, § 468.

2. The power of attorney gave authority to Lowry to accept service of summons for J. R. Bratton. 1 Wait Pr. 50.

3. Defendants are estopped from denying that J. T. Lowry *was duly authorized to accept service of the summons in either of the actions. Rorer on Jud. Sales, §§ 445, 457, 656; 2 Pars. on Cont., § 799; Bigelow on Estoppel 433, and note; Story on Agency, § 264.

4. His Honor should have charged "that even though the said executions under which the land was sold were void, the sale would still be valid, if there was another and valid execution and judgment to which the sale could be referred." 1 McM. 349; 2 Spears 91; 2 Rich. Eq. 4; 3 Hill 289; 11 Johns. 513; Freem. on Ex., § 274.

5. If a levy was made before return-day, a sale after return-day would not thereby be void. 1 Mill Const. R. 325; 3 Hill 289.

Mr. J. F. Hart, for respondent.

As to the first exception, there was no execution which had an active energy. As to the second, any party may collaterally take advantage of void proceedings. 2 Strob. 208; 1 Bail. 611. Was the sale void? Under the Galloway judgment there was no levy and no lien. A sale under it would have been void. 2 Bail. 361; 2 Bay 524. The executions of Grist and Dowie, Moise & Davis, were against Allison & Bratton, and Bratton not being served, his individual property could not be seized. Code, § 159, Subd. 1. There was no service by Lowry's acceptance, because—(1.) The power of attorney referred only to Bratton's individual estate; (2.) It would have conflicted with act of 1785; 4 Rich. 267; 6 Rich. 487. (3) It was in conflict with the code, which requires service to be personal. 13 How. Pr. 43; 5 Ib. 341; 14 Ib. 381; 16 Ib. 144; 1 Wait Pr. 511, 530, 531; (4.) There was no attachment taken out. 17 How. 106. The Schieffelin & Co. execution was not levied in time, and in the McGill case there was no service. The Harris and Adickes executions were not in existence in December, 1873, and their subsequent issue could not validate the sale. 3 Rich. 119; 10 Rich. 448. In June, 1875, when the land was re-sold, all liens had expired.

After the expiration of the lien the sale cannot be made. 1 Mill Const. R. 323. As to the re-sale: The act of 1839, (Gen. Stat. 473,) must be strictly followed. 3 Bay 524; 2 Brev. 417; 3 Strob. 306; 1 Bail. 618.

*The valid execution and judgment to which the sale could be referred, must be such as create a lien. 2 Spears 90. As to the sixth exception, there can be no estoppel if act is void. 1 Bail. 618.

As to the ninth ground of appeal, the Circuit judge is fully sustained by 2 Hill Ch. 428, and Freem. on Judg., §§ 357, 363.

June 19th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. This is an action brought to recover certain lands, with damages for the detention thereof. The land was levied on as the property of J. R. Bratton, and sold by the sheriff on sale-day in December, 1873, under and by virtue of executions then in his office against the business firm of Allison & Bratton, of which J. R. Bratton was a member, and was bid in by J. T. Lowry, one of the respondents, who failed fully to comply with the terms of the sale, and received no title from the sheriff. It appears that Lowry was in possession at the time of the sale. The land was advertised by the sheriff for re-sale on the succeeding sale-day in January, 1874, but the sale was prevented by orders of the court restraining further proceedings against the property of J. R. Bratton until the assets of Allison & Bratton had been exhausted. It is further shown, in the case as made, that the assets of the firm were exhausted by sale in April, 1874, and that on sale-day in June, 1875, the land was re-sold by the sheriff "at the risk of the former purchaser, and bid off by the plaintiffs for $1000, which they paid," and that they received a title deed from the sheriff, on which title the appellants rely. The defence claims possession by J. T. Lowry under a deed from J. R. Bratton "prior to said sale," and further denies that there was "any valid sale by the sheriff," upon the grounds: 1. That the premises were the individual property of J. R. Bratton, and that he had never been served with process in the suits under which the land was sold; and second, that no valid levies had ever been made by the sheriff under the executions in his office, and that the sale by him was without authority of law. There was evidence to show that there was in the sheriff's office, prior to the first sale, an execution in the case of Hugh Galloway

v. J. R. Bratton, judgment *bearing date January 15th, 1871, and that no levy was ever endorsed on said execution. That there were also in the sheriff's office, at the time of the first sale, executions issued upon judgments, of title and date as follows, viz.: Schieffelin & Co. v. Allison & Bratton, May 22d, 1872, execution issued and lodged same day; Dowie, Moise & Davis v. Same, July 28th, 1873; L. M. Grist v. Same, July 28th, 1873; McGill et al., administrators, v. Same, September 30th, 1873. Executions in the last three cases were issued and lodged in each on the same day that the judgment was entered up. It was also in proof that subsequently to the first sale, but prior to the re-sale, that is, on the 11th of February, 1874, and on the 14th of February, 1874, judgments were entered up, one in favor of Agnes B. Harris v. J. R. Bratton et al., execution issued and lodged 14th of February, 1874, and another in favor of H. F. Adickes v. Addison & Bratton. And that levies were made on the said land by the sheriff, and certified copy of each levy and execution filed in the cases, and at the dates as follows, viz.: L. M. Grist v. Allison & Bratton, September 22d, 1873; Dowie, Moise & Davis v. Same, September 22d, 1873; Schieffelin & Co. v. Same, November 5th, 1873; McGill and others v. Same. November 5th, 1873. At the time when each of these four judgments was obtained a judgment did not of itself constitute a lien upon real estate. Code, § 313, Gen. Stat. 643. Such lien, however, might be created by a levy made by virtue of an execution issued to enforce the judgment, and by the filing of a certified copy of the execution, with proper certificate thereon, in the office of the register of mesne conveyance. Code, § 314. It is in proof that in the four cases last above-named such proceedings were properly had, and that in at least three of the cases the sixty days, within which the original executions were returnable, had not expired at the time the levy was made, and that as to one of them, the execution held by McGill et al. v. Allison & Bratton, the sixty days had not expired on November 25th, 1873, which date it will be seen, has important bearing upon the point involved. It is plain from the statement thus presented that there was evidence to show that at the time of the sale, on sale-day in December, 1873, there were three executions in the sheriff's office which had been levied within *the time in which they were returnable, and that according to law (Code, § 314.) the lien attached to the land for one hundred and twenty days subsequent to the date of filing the proper certificates, and one hundred and twenty days after the removal of prior encumbrances. But on November 25th, 1873, an act entitled "An act to alter and amend the code of procedure, being Title V., Part III., of the General Statutes," (15 Stat. 495,) became law. See Arnold v. McKellar, 9 S. C. 335. By Section 14 of said act, it is provided that "final judgments hereafter (after November 25th, 1873,) entered in any court of record in this state, shall constitute a lien upon the real estate of the judgment debtor in the county where the same are entered, for a period of ten years." It is further provided that "where any judgment has been obtained and execution issued since the first day of March, A. D. 1870, and the said judgment or execution has now [November 25th, 1873,] a lien by reason of a levy in accordance with the provisions of the code of procedure, then the lien of such judgment or execution shall date from the day upon which it became a lien under said code of procedure," and, as to real estate, endures for ten years from that time. The leading purpose of Section 14 is to make a judgment a lien upon real estate for ten years from the time the judgment is entered up. As to cases, however, where judgments had come into existence between March 1st, 1870, and November 25th, 1873, and such judgments had not acquired a lien according to law, the mode by which lien may be acquired and the period from which the lien is to run are both provided for. But in cases where the judgment had acquired a lien under the code for a period limited by the one hundred and twenty days rule, the provision above cited does nothing more than fix the time from which the extended or ten-years lien shall run, and requires no summons or other proceedings to show cause why it should not become a lien, from the fact that the lien had already been acquired. Executions, also, under the act of 1873, (15 Stat. 495,) cease to be returnable within sixty days, and retain their active energy "until the regular term of the court from which they were sued, which shall follow next after the full completion of five years from its lodgment." It is thus obvious that three such judg*ments as those above cited might have constituted a lien upon the land for ten years after the times at which they respectively acquired lien under the code of procedure. The two other judgments offered in evidence, viz., Agnes B. Harris v. Bratton, and Adickes v. Allison & Bratton, having been entered up subsequently to the adoption of the act of November 25th, 1873, would unquestionably constitute a lien upon the property. Thus, there being evidence of the existence of such judgments and executions, it was manifestly error to instruct the jury "that the right to sell under the executions depended upon a lien of the executions and that said lien had expired before the second sale." The fact is that the whole trial was conducted upon the assumption, on all sides, that the act of 1873, above cited, was not of legal force, and that its provisions did not go into effect until the 8th of March, 1875, at which time they were re-enacted; but, as already said, this court held otherwise in Arnold v. McKellar, supra. The judgment lien fixed by the act of 1873 disposes of most of the questions of law contained in the exceptions of the charge of the judge, and it is unnecessary that they should be further considered.

There remain, therefore, only two questions to be disposed of.

1. Whether the defendants had any right to attack the judgments under which the sale was made, on the ground that J. R. Bratton, the judgment debtor, was not personally served with the summons. The defendants are, in no sense, parties to the judgment. The general doctrine is thus briefly stated: "Third persons may sometimes have a judgment vacated on the ground that it is collusive, or that the cause of action on which it is based was fictitious, but they are not allowed to take advantage of errors or irregularities of proceeding." Freem. on Judg., § 91. In Barkley v. Screven, 1 N. & Mc.C. 408, it was held that the purchaser of real estate at sheriff's sale, could rest his title upon the judgment and execution. "The purchaser," says the court, "is not required to look into the regularity of the proceedings. The seal of the court is evidence enough for him. Nor can objections of this nature be made by third persons if the proceedings were clearly irregular." The same is held in Guignard v. Glover, Harp. 457, and in Henry v. Ferguson, 1 Bail. 512. The de*fendant, Lowry, sets up for a defence that the service of summons on Bratton was accepted by Bratton, per J. F. Lowry, (the defendant,) and that he, the defendant, was not duly authorized to thus accept service. Henry v. Ferguson is exactly in point and is conclusive. Admitting that Lowry had not full authority at the time he accepted the service, nevertheless Bratton has never objected, and, certainly, Lowry cannot, at law or in equity, avail himself of his own wrong. The defence is inadmissible, and should not have been allowed to stand.

2. Whether the judge erred in his instruction to the jury—"That if the defendant, Lowry, was holding the land at the time of the first sale under a contract to purchase from Bratton, then that the land could not be sold as Bratton's property." The judge further submitted to the jury to decide whether such sale to Lowry was "for the purpose of hindering, delaying or defrauding creditors." The law, as announced by the Circuit judge, is sustained by the case of Massey v. McIlwain, 2 Hill Ch. 421, which is a leading authority on the subject. It is proper, however, to remark that the conclusion reached on the point by the Circuit judge should be regarded in the light rather of a judgment than of an instruction to the jury. Such defence is equitable in its nature and belongs to that side of the court which exercises the chancery jurisdiction. Under the former practice such defence could not have been set up in the action at law to try the title and recover possession. The defendant would have been obliged to file his bill in equity to restrain proceedings at law, and to seek such other relief as in equity he might have a right to demand. Under the code of procedure all this may be effected by the pleadings in a single action, and new parties, if necessary, may be brought in; but, at the trial, the legal and the equitable issues must be distinguished and decided by the court in the exercise of its distinct functions as a court of law and a court of equity, and only those should be determined by a jury which are properly triable by jury, while those which would formerly have been properly triable in equity must be determined by the judge in the exercise of his chancery power. In the latter class, when questions of fact are submitted to the jury, the purpose can only be to enlighten the understanding of the *judge by giving him the aid of a verdict, but the verdict is not binding, and may be totally disregarded by the judge in arriving at his final determination.

The question of the admissibility of certain deeds in evidence is rendered immaterial by the decision as to the lien of the judgments, and as to the right of the defendant to assail judgments to which he is not a party. The right of the sheriff to resell cannot be disputed after the lien of the judgments is admitted; and whether the resale could be at the risk of the former purchaser is not made a question.

Having thus disposed of the material questions raised, the case is remanded for a new trial, attention being called to the manner in which the equity portion of the case should be tried.

Motion granted.

[Costs ⊂⊃212.]

A sheriff is entitled to his costs as taxed and entered up in the judgment. If there is error in the taxation it should be corrected by motion or on exceptions taken; it cannot be questioned in proceedings by rule against the sheriff.

Before Wallace, J., at Marlborough, February, 1879.

The defendant, Sutherland, paid the execution in this case in full, less certain costs for serving witnesses, taxed up in the judgment in favor of the sheriff. The sheriff, W. P. Emanuel, refused to enter satisfaction on the execution, and this was a rule requiring him to show cause why he so refused. The Circuit judge ruled that the charges were legal, and discharged the rule. The defendant appealed.

June 19th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. The sheriff was ruled for refusing to enter satisfaction on an execution in his hands, which it was claimed had been paid in full. He responded for cause "that he had charged one dollar for each witness served by him, besides mileage, and for so doing he had not been paid." * * * *

The Circuit judge * * * ruled that the charges were legal, and ordered the rule to be discharged." The record was not brought up, but the above is the statement of the case made. It was admitted by the counsel that the sheriff's costs had been regularly taxed and entered up in the judgment, and that he charged no more than the sum so taxed. The whole proceeding by rule, therefore, was irregular, and the rule should have been discharged without deciding upon the legality of the costs taxed. Costs as taxed are legal until the taxation has been set aside; that should be done by motion or on exception taken. The sheriff was unquestionably entitled to collect the costs as taxed; but whether the taxation was proper was not in issue in the proceedings by rule, and must be considered as not having been decided. The conclusion, however, of the Circuit judge in discharging the rule is sustained. The appeal must be dismissed.

Motion refused.

The "Court of Claims" established by the legislature by the act approved March 22d, 1878, (16 Stat. 555,) is not a court, organized under the authority of Article IV., Section 1, of the constitution, but a tribunal in the nature of a board of audit, created under Article XIV., Section 4, to inquire into the amount and character of the unfunded debt of the state.

[4. States ⊂⊃184.]

Claims known as "Little Bonanza Warrants" being presented before the commissioner of such "Court of Claims," before the enactment of the amendatory act of December 24th, 1878, it was not error on the part of such commissioner to require the claimants to prove the bona fides of the original consideration upon which their claims were founded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 174; Dec. Dig. ⊂⊃184.]

This was an original application to this court for a writ of certiorari.

On December 24th, 1875, the general assembly of South Carolina passed two acts providing for the payment of certain claims against the state. The first was entitled "An act to provide for the payment of certain indebtedness of the state," and was nick-named the "Little Bonanza;" the other was entitled "An act to provide for the settlement and payment of certain claims against the state," and was nick-named the "Big Bonanza." By these nick-names they are sometimes designated in subsequent legislation. The little bonanza act specified certain claims by name and amount, for which the comptroller-general should *issue his warrants in sets of three, payable in one, two and three years, with interest from date.

The petitioners in the three cases stated at the head of this decision, were assignees of some of these little bonanza warrants.

On March 22d, 1878, the legislature passed an act entitled, "An act to provide for the settlement of the unfunded debt of the state incurred before the first of November, 1876." The scope of this act is sufficiently set forth in the opinion of the court, the class of claims against the state alluded to, as being provided for in the fifth section, being big bonanza warrants.

The petitioners presented their claims to Hon. James C. Coit, commissioner of this Court of Claims, who required them to prove the bona fides of the original consideration against the state, upon which their claims were founded.

On December 24th, 1878, this act was amended, (16 Stat. 787), Section 5 of the original act (providing for the payment of the big bonanza warrants) having added to it these words: "And in all other cases, including the warrants known as little bonanzas, the burden of proof shall be upon the claimant to establish the bona fides of the original consideration upon which the claim is based."

The petitions in the three cases were all presented to this court in April, 1879, and were heard together during the same term of the court.

*Mr. L. F. Youmans, attorney-general, for respondent.

The alleged error is not an error of law; if error at all, it is error of fact, not remediable by certiorari. 2 Wait Act. & Def. 140. Section 5 shows that only those warrants should be received without evidence. The amendatory act amending Section 5, makes it still plainer. Respondent has followed the acts. The petitioners, by their action, have waived all objections to the two acts. The Supreme Court has no jurisdiction of these cases. Const., Art. IV., § 4. This is not a court at all. It is a tribunal created under Article XIV., Section 4; what might have been committed to a committee of the legislature, or other board, or officer. If errors are committed they can be corrected only by the legislature. Certiorari is not a writ of right, but grantable only in the sound discretion of the court. 2 Bac. Ab., tit. "Certiorari," A, 164, 165; 5 Wait Pr. 454, 459, 460; 2 Wait Act. & Def. 135. The common law certiorari (that here prayed for), reaches only patent defects. 2 Wait Act. & Def. 135, 139. For the judicial department to attempt a settlement of the unfunded debt of South Carolina, would open Pandora's box of evils, and would be in violation of Article I., Section 26, of the constitution.

June 25th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. These three cases, involving the same questions, were heard and will be considered together. They were petitions addressed to this court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, praying that writs of certiorari be issued, directed to James C. Coit, Esq., commissioner of the Court of Claims, established by "An act to provide for the settlement of the unfunded debt of the state, incurred before November 1st, 1876," approved March 22d, 1878, (16 Stat. 555), as amended by an act approved December 24th, 1878, (16 Stat. 787), for the purpose of "ascertaining all legal and just claims which have not been funded in bonds or stock," commanding the said commissioner to certify to this court the records of the several claims of the petitioners, that they may have justice done to them in the premises. Upon the filing of the petitions rules were issued requiring said commissioner to show cause why the writs should not issue *as prayed for in the petition. To these rules the commissioner has made return, as follows: "1. That the action of respondent, set forth in the petition, is final and not reviewable by any of the courts of the state. 2. That this honorable court has not jurisdiction to issue the writ of certiorari prayed for. 3. That the action of respondent, set forth in the petition, is not an error of law."

The error of law alleged in each of the petitions is that the commissioner required the petitioners to make proof of the bona fides of the original consideration upon which the claim was based, notwithstanding it had been previously approved by the legislature and ordered to be paid, and a warrant given therefor by a former comptroller-general of the state. It will be seen, therefore, that the error which this court is thus asked to review and correct is not one of a jurisdictional character, but only an alleged error of law in applying the rules of evidence as to the burden of proof. There is no allegation that the commissioner has either exceeded his jurisdiction, or has failed or refused to exercise any of the powers conferred upon him by the act establishing his office. The question whether a common law writ of certiorari goes only to correct errors of a jurisdictional character or extends to any error of law, and is, in fact, a substitute for a writ of error, where no other remedy has been provided, has given rise to much conflict of opinion, and has been variously decided.

We think, however, that the true rule, which is not without the support of high authority, is this: where the legislature establishes an inferior tribunal, and gives no right of appeal from its decisions, the only office of the writ of certiorari is to determine whether the inferior tribunal has acted within the scope of its powers, and not to determine whether in so acting it has committed errors of law or fact. It cannot be used for the purpose of determining whether such inferior tribunal has committed an error of judgment in exercising the powers granted, but only to determine whether it has exceeded or has failed to exercise any of the powers granted. Any other rule would deny to the legislature the power of establishing an inferior tribunal with jurisdiction to hear and finally dispose of any matter. If the *legislature, in establishing an inferior tribunal, designed that its decisions should be reviewable by appeal or otherwise, it would be very easy to say so, but if they did not so intend, then, certainly, this court ought not to thwart their intention by the exercise of what is at least a doubtful power. When, however, such inferior tribunal undertakes to go beyond the limits of its jurisdiction, as prescribed in the act creating it, or fails or refuses to exercise any of the powers granted, it then becomes the duty of this court to see that it keeps within the limits prescribed for it, and that it performs the functions for which it was created, thus carrying into effect, instead of thwarting, the intention of the legislature. A reference to some of the cases will show that these views are not without the support of authority.

In Groenvelt v. Burwell, 1 Salk. 144, the question was whether the Court of King's Bench could send a writ of certiorari to the censors of the College of Physicians, who, by their charter, were authorized to fine and imprison for malpractice. The writ was allowed, and Holt, C. J., said: "It is a consequence of every inferior jurisdiction of record that their proceedings be removable into this court to inspect the record and see whether they keep themselves within the limits of their jurisdiction."

Rex v. Moreley, 2 Burr. 1040, was an application to the Court of King's Bench for a writ of certiorari to be sent to a justice of the peace to bring up the record of the conviction of certain persons prosecuted under the conventicle act. It was contended that the act, by implication at least, forbid that court from issuing the writ, inasmuch as the act provided "that no other court whatsoever shall intermeddle with any cause or causes of appeal upon this act, but they shall be finally determined in the Quarter Sessions only." From this it was argued that the Court of King's Bench could not review the proceedings even by certiorari, and hence it would be useless to issue the writ. But the court held that the writ should issue, saying: "A certiorari does not go to try the merits of the question, but to see whether the limited jurisdiction have exceeded their bounds." See, also, Rex v. Whitbred, 2 Doug. 549; Rex v. Abbott, reported in note to 2 Doug. 553; Anonymous, 1 B. & Ad. 382; 20 E. C. L. R. 405.

In Birdsall v. Phillips, 17 Wend. 474, recognized and approved *in Simpson v. Rhinelander, 20 Wend. 104, it was distinctly decided that on a return to a common law writ of certiorari no other questions can be raised except those relating to the jurisdiction of the officer or court before whom the proceedings are had, and the regularity of such proceedings. The decisions as to the admission or rejection of evidence, or the instructions given to the jury, cannot be reviewed by certiorari. The policy of the law creating their summary jurisdictions, is that their decisions on the merits shall be final and conclusive, and if they err upon questions either of law or fact, the parties are without remedy as long as such inferior tribunals keep within the limits of the jurisdiction assigned to them. Cowen, J., in this case uses the following language: "The court below being possessed of the cause, and prima facie having jurisdiction and proceeding regularly with its process and continuances, all the rest relates to the merits. These include the evidence offered, its competency and effect, and the charge of the judge, and it is not the office of a common law certiorari * * * to bring up such matters for review. This writ is but an emanation from the general supervisory duty of the Supreme Court to restrain the action of all inferior magistrates to matters within their legal grasp." This case also recognized and approved in Ex parte Mayor of Albany, 23 Wend. 277, where the court, after a review of the cases in New York, says: "The amount of these is that we will not, in any case, on a common law certiorari, go beyond the question of power, which is another word for jurisdiction." It is very true that in subsequent cases in that state, the most recent of which is Clapp v. Board of Police, 72 N. Y. 417, the courts of New York have taken a different view of the matter, and have extended the operation of a common law writ of certiorari much further than we are disposed to do, and much beyond the limits originally prescribed for it.

The cases in our own state do not decide the question under consideration, though there are passing remarks made in some of them, which seem to support the view contended for by the counsel for the petitioners. But these remarks, besides being mere dicta, were evidently not made with any reference to the question we are considering, and are not, therefore, entitled to the weight *which would otherwise be accorded to them. It seems to us that the proposition contended for by the counsel for the petitioners, that the common law writ of certiorari is a substitute for a writ of error, where there is no other remedy provided, and may be used to effect the same purposes, leads necessarily to the conclusion that it is beyond the competency of the legislature to establish an inferior tribunal for any purpose whatever, whose decisions upon the merits of any question, properly within its jurisdiction, should be final and conclusive, and not reviewable through the agency of a writ of certiorari, a conclusion which we would be very slow to adopt.

But the question in the case now before us is still narrower than the one we have been considering. Here the application is to this court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, for the writ in question. The jurisdiction of this court is defined in Section 4 of Article IV. of the constitution, and, as there defined, it embraces four distinct classes of powers: 1. Appellate jurisdiction in "cases of chancery." 2. "The correction of errors at law," under such regulations as the general assembly may prescribe. 3. The power to issue certain specified writs. 4. The power to issue "such other original and remedial writs as may be necessary to give it a general supervisory control over all other courts in the state." It will be observed that the jurisdiction for the correction of errors at law is not given in general and absolute terms, but only "under such regulations as the general assembly may by law prescribe;" and as it is not pretended that the general assembly has prescribed any regulations by which the errors of any inferior tribunal can be corrected through the medium of a writ of certiorari, it would seem to be very clear that such errors cannot be so corrected by this court, and, therefore, however it may be as to the Court of Common Pleas, this court cannot issue a writ of certiorari as a substitute for a writ of error. Then, as to the fourth class, under which the power invoked is claimed to have been conferred. In this class, too, the power conferred upon this court is not general and absolute, but can only be exercised in such cases as "may be necessary to give it a general supervisory control over all other courts in the state." Hence, whenever this court is asked to *issue a writ of certiorari, (one of the writs embraced in the general terms employed in conferring the fourth class of powers), it is necessary to show: 1. That the writ is to go to one of the courts of this state, as was decided in the recent case of Ex parte Carson, 5 S. C. 117. 2. That such writ is demanded for the purpose of giving this court some "supervisory control" over the court to which it is directed.

In these cases the demand is that the writs of certiorari prayed for be directed to "James C. Coit, Esq., commissioner of the Court of Claims," and the question is, whether that tribunal is a court within the sense of that term as used in the constitution. The fact that it is so called in the act constituting it, does not determine the question. Nor is the question to be determined by the nature of the means or instrumentalities it may employ, but rather by the objects which the legislature had in view in creating it, and the scope and effect of its powers. It is undeniable that some of the powers incident to a court have been conferred upon it, but on the other hand it was a tribunal of a temporary character, which did not proceed according to the course of the common law, dispensed with all pleading, was not governed by the rules of evidence which obtain in every court of justice, but, on the contrary, in the language of the act, "the evidence for and against the claim may be brought forward in the usual mode of auditing accounts and under such rules as may be prescribed by the commissioner; it had no means of enforcing its judgments, and, more than all, it did not render judgment according to the right of the matter, or according to the law and the evidence, but arbitrarily reduced the amount found to be due one-half. It is very clear to our minds that it was not a court in the sense of that term as used in the constitution. The general assembly, in creating it, evidently did not act under the powers conferred in Section 1 of Article IV. of the constitution, but rather under the provisions of Section 4 of Article XIV., which ordains that "the general assembly may direct by law in what manner claims against the state may be established and adjusted." Its object, undoubtedly, was not to create a court in the sense of that term as used in the constitution, but simply a tribunal, more as a board of audit than as a court to inquire into the amount state, which, but for the magnitude of the matter, might just as well have been referred to one of its own committees, and to prescribe the mode in which such claims against the state should "be established and adjusted."

But, even were we to regard this tribunal as a court, it would still be necessary, as we have seen, to inquire whether the writ is demanded for the purpose of enabling this court to exercise "supervisory control" over such inferior court. To determine this question it will be necessary to inquire what is meant by the terms "general supervisory control," as here used. They certainly do not mean that this court is to correct any error into which any inferior court of this state may fall in the exercise of the jurisdiction committed to it, for that would necessarily lead to the conclusion that this court could, through the medium of a writ of certiorari, review the findings of fact of any inferior court, a conclusion which no one is willing to adopt. Nor is it reasonable to suppose that the framers of the constitution meant by these words that this court should have power to correct any errors of law committed by any of the other courts of the state, for that would be repeating, in the fourth class of powers, the same power already conferred in the second class. These words must, therefore, mean just what the word "control" implies, that this court, through the medium of these writs, is to exercise such a supervision over the other courts of the state as that they may thereby be kept within the limits assigned to them, and no one of them be allowed to overstep its jurisdiction. This, as we have seen, was the office of a writ of certiorari at common law, and as one of the rules in construing the constitution is that it should be read in the light of the common law, (Cooley on Const. Lim. 60), we find that the construction which we have placed upon these terms in the constitution, instead of antagonizing, harmonize with the common law.

The respondent also takes the position in his return that his action, as set forth in the several petitions, constitutes no error of law. As the writ of certiorari is not a writ of right, but grantable only in the sound discretion of the court (1 Bac. Ab., A, 349), the writ should not, of course, be granted where the alle*gation of error, contained in the petition, does not appear to be well founded. While, from the view which we have taken of these cases, it is scarcely necessary to decide this question, yet we may say that we are not satisfied that any error of law is shown in the petitions. The error assigned consists in requiring the petitioners, as holders of warrants known as "Little Bonanzas," to prove the bona fides of the original consideration upon which such warrants were based; whereas the petitioners claim that the warrants themselves were sufficient prima facie evidence, and until the consideration upon which they rested was assailed by evidence adduced on the part of the state, it was not incumbent upon them to offer any evidence as to such consideration. This question, it will be borne in mind, is to be determined, not by the general rules of evidence obtaining in all courts of justice, but by the special provisions of the acts constituting the tribunal. By the first section of the original act, the object of establishing the tribunal is declared to be "for ascertaining all legal and just claims," not merely all legal claims. By the second section it is provided, not that the evidence for and against the claim shall be brought forward according to the usual rules of evidence, but the provision is "the evidence for and against the claim may be brought forward in the usual mode of auditing accounts, and under such rules as may be prescribed by the commissioner;" and by the fifth section it is provided that, so far as a certain class of claims against the state (to which class the claims held by petitioners do not belong) are concerned, the warrants drawn by the comptroller-general "shall be deemed sufficient evidence of the claims set forth therein," which, under the maxim expressio unius exclusio alterius, would seem to show that the legislature intended that, so far as all other classes of claims were concerned, such warrants should not be deemed sufficient evidence. Then, too, if we are permitted to gather the intention of the legislature which passed the acts in question from the condition of things which rendered it necessary to institute an inquiry into the validity of the debt of the state, it must be apparent to any one who is in the least degree conversant with such condition, that the legislature could not have intended that the inquiry *should be limited to an ascertainment of what claims had been passed and ordered to be paid by the previous legislatures, and warrants given therefor by any of the previous state officials, as such a course would practically defeat the very object of the inquiry, except in reference to that class of claims especially excepted in the fifth section of the act, which had already been subjected to the scrutiny of a tribunal somewhat similar to the one whose conduct is now under review.

From all these considerations, which it is not necessary for us to dilate upon, we are not prepared to say that the commissioner erred in the construction placed by him upon the terms of the original act. But if there were any doubt upon this point that doubt is entirely removed by the provisions of the third paragraph of the first section of the amendatory act, which, in express terms, casts the burden of proof upon the claimant to establish the bona fides of the original consideration upon which the claim is based, "except in that class of claims specially mentioned in Section 5 of the original act." It is contended, however, that as this amendment was passed after the claims of the petitioners in these cases had been presented, after their actions had been commenced, so to speak, it cannot alter the rules of evidence in force at that time, so far as these claims are concerned. Without stopping to ascertain the weight to which this argument would be entitled if this were a question arising in one of the courts of this state, where the general rules of evidence apply, it is sufficient to say that, as appears by the journal of the general assembly, this question was brought to the attention of that body by the report of the commissioner, and they, simply in the exercise of the power conferred by Section 4 of Article XIV. of the constitution, directed by law in what manner the claims against the state should be established; and if the petitioners were unwilling to submit to the mode which the general assembly prescribed, by which such claims should be established, all they had to do was to withdraw them, for, at the time of the passage of the amendatory act, these claims had not been adjudicated by the commissioner, and it is only "after adjudication" that the commissioner is directed to cancel the claims.

It seems to us, therefore, that in any view of the question the *petitioners are not entitled to the writs of certiorari as prayed for in the petitions. In each of the cases above stated the rule must be discharged and the petition dismissed.

Application refused.

[This case is also cited in Darby & Co. v. Shannon, 19 S. C. 531, as an example of the authority of the court to dissolve an attachment upon motion.]

Before Hudson, J., on Eighth Circuit, October, 1879.

The opinion of the court fully states the case.

[For subsequent opinion, see 16 S. C. 619.]

Mr. E. F. Stokes, for appellant.

Messrs. Earle & Wells, for respondent.

June 25th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The action is for the recovery of money on a promissory note, and the place of trial Greenville county. The plaintiff obtained an order for the attachment of the property of the defendant on the ground that the defendant was about to *remove her property out of the limits of the state with intent to defraud her creditors. After the attachment had been executed by the sheriff, and a summons served, the defendant moved before the clerk, who issued the attachment, to discharge the same, which motion was denied by the clerk. Defendant then gave notice of a motion before the Circuit judge, then sitting within the circuit at Walhalla, to set aside the attachment upon the affidavits upon which the motion had been heard before the clerk of Greenville county, on two grounds—first, because no summons was issued before the attachment was granted; and, second, because the note upon which the warrant of attachment was granted was not due. The Circuit judge heard and granted the motion, at Walhalla, vacating the attachment.

The plaintiff now appeals from the order vacating the attachment, on several grounds, which will be considered. It is objected by the plaintiff that the motion could not be heard except in the county where the action was triable, and, also, that it could not be heard at chambers. The general rule, as it regards the place where motions must be made, is contained in Section 417 of the code, and is as follows: "1. An application for an order is a motion. 2. Motions may be made to a judge or justice out of court, except for a new trial on the merits. 3. Orders made out of court, without notice, may be made by the judge of the court in any part of the state. 4. Motions, upon notice, must be made within the circuit in which the action is triable, or, in the absence or inability of the judge of the circuit, may be made before the judge of a circuit adjoining that in which it is triable." Unless, therefore, there is some provision of the law applicable to attachment constituting an exception to the general rule just stated, it was competent to make the motion before the Circuit judge at chambers in Oconee county, which is within the same circuit with Greenville, the county in which the action was triable. As the motion was not for a judgment, or any relief properly obtained through a judgment (Section 416), it was a case within the provisions of Section 417; and as it was not a motion for a new trial, on the merits, it was capable of being heard in any part of the circuit in which the action was *triable, and even in an adjoining circuit in case of the absence or inability of the judge of the proper circuit to hear it.

Has, then, the law relating to attachments created an exception to this general rule limiting motions to dissolve an attachment to be heard before either the clerk or the court in the county in which the action is triable? This is substantially the proposition contended for by the appellant. The provisions of the code of procedure relating to attachments are taken substantially from the act to regulate attachments passed in 1868. 14 Stat. 102. Sections 16 and 17 provide a means of obtaining a release of property attached from the attachment by the defendants giving a bond with sureties for the payment of any judgment in the action in which the attachment was issued, but it assumes the validity of an attachment, and is not the remedy of the party complaining that the attachment was improperly granted.

By the code, attachment is classed among the provisional remedies (Title II.) The provisions of the sixteenth and seventeenth sections of the act of 1868 relating to the release of attached property upon giving a bond for the payment of the judgment, should one be recovered, are re-enacted in Sections 264 and 265. A clause is, however, added at the end of Section 265, in the following words: "And in all cases the defendant may move to discharge the attachment as in the case of other provisional remedies." This provision includes, beyond doubt, the motion to discharge the attachment on the ground of invalidity or irregularity, and refers us to the general rules governing the provisional remedies at large for the rules governing such an application. We will then inquire what provisions exist in similar cases in regard to the various provisional remedies, which include arrest and bail, claim and delivery of personal property, injunction, attachment, receiverships and orders for the surrender of some subject of suit admitted to be due to the claimant in such proceeding. The only provision in case of the order of arrest is "that the defendant arrested may, at any time before judgment, apply on motion to vacate the order of arrest, or to reduce the amount of bail." Before whom and at what place the motion should be made is left to be governed by the general *provisions of the code applicable to motions in general, which are contained in Section 417, already referred to. The provisions as to the claim and delivery of personal property are silent as to any similar motion. It is provided that a motion to dissolve an injunction may be made on notice "to the court or a judge thereof in which the action is brought to vacate or modify the same." This is equivalent to allowing the motion to be made either to the court or a judge at chambers. It is not said that such motion must be made to the judge or court who granted the motion, in which case it might be perhaps contended that an injunction granted by the court must be dissolved by the court, and one granted at chambers dissolved at chambers; but the language is: "To the court or a judge thereof in which the action is brought." The one requisite qualification of the judge, in order to hear such motion at chambers, being that he is "a judge of the court in which the action is brought." The other provisional remedies are left wholly to be governed by the general provisions of the code as it regards similar motions. The strongest reasons exist why motions to discharge orders of this class should be facilitated by being heard at chambers during the vacations of the court in which the action is triable. Such orders are granted ex parte and on affidavits alone, and in the case of order of arrest, affecting the liberty of the defendant, and the order of attachment, removing his property from beyond his control, may be granted by the clerk. Plaintiffs sometimes obtain such severe remedies on sworn charges of a general character without setting forth any facts and circumstances sufficient to authorize the conclusion that a case for such remedies exists as was done in Brown v. Morris, 10 S. C. 467, recently decided by this court, and where that practice was condemned as illegal. In the present case the affidavit was defective in that respect, but as the defendant did not demand the discharge of the attachment on that ground, he must be regarded as having waived such irregularity. In such cases, to allow an improperly-obtained process against the property or the person of the defendant to remain in force until a court is convened in the county where the action is triable, would invite parties to sue out such orders in cases when they know they could not hold them, in the hope *that the defendants would offer security for the payment of the debt claimed, rather than submit to the loss of personal liberty or the control of their property until an opportunity, perhaps only after the lapse of months, could be offered for showing that they were entitled to be relieved from such severe process. The objection of the appellant to the jurisdiction of the judge to grant the order appealed from stands upon no just grounds.

It is very clear that the judge who granted the motion to discharge the attachment had not before him evidence sufficient to justify the discharge of the attachment. We must assume that all the proofs before the Circuit judge on the motion are brought before us, for that is the requirement of Rule I. of this court, and it is not alleged that there has been a failure to comply with that rule. The defendant, who alleged irregularity in the granting of the attachment, was bound to prove the fact of such irregularity, as irregularity in the proceedings of courts or their officers will not be presumed. The charge of irregularity was that summons had not been issued at the time that the attachment was granted. The warrant of attachment was issued July 24th, 1878. The summons bears date the same day. The summons was served on the 25th. The only proof offered that the summons had not been issued at the time of the issuing of the warrant, was a memorandum purporting to be made by the sheriff of Greenville county, on the back of the summons, as follows: "Entered July 25th, 1878. P. D. Gilbreath, S. G. C." Whether a memorandum of this character, made by the sheriff, is competent proof of the fact to which it relates, need not be considered, for even if it is, it does not exclude the idea that the summons had been regularly issued before that day. The order of attachment may be made "at the time of issuing the summons or at any time afterwards." Code, § 250. The summons is issued whenever it is placed in the hands of a person legally capable of serving the same for the purpose of service. The summons may be served by the sheriff of the county where the party may be found, or by any other person not a party to the action. Code, § 156. It follows that the fact, if admitted, that the summons was not lodged with the sheriff until the day after the attachment was made, does not exclude, in any legal sense, *the idea that it had previously been placed in the hands of some other person competent to serve it. Indeed, it is very common practice to place the summons in the hands of a person other than the sheriff, and afterwards, for greater convenience, to transfer it to the sheriff for service.

As the objection of the defendant on this ground is purely technical, and no possible injury can have been sustained by the defendant for a day's delay in the service of the summons, she is bound to make a strict proof of the irregularity she alleges, and this she has not done. No evidence whatever was given in support of the statement of the defendant contradicting the affidavit on which the attachment issued that the debt claimed was due.

The complaint is not before us, nor the terms of the promissory note sued upon, nor anything enabling us to see that the Circuit judge was justified in holding that the fact of a debt due, as alleged in the affidavit, on which the attachment issued had been contradicted. Had there been any evidence on which the judge could have concluded that as matter of fact no debt was due to the plaintiff, such a conclusion of fact could not be reviewed by us on appeal. But as no such evidence appeared, no ground existed for such a determination of fact.

The appeal must be sustained, and the order vacating the attachment must be set aside.

HASKELL, A. J., concurred.

McIVER, A. J., dissenting. This is an appeal from an order of the Circuit judge, sitting at chambers, vacating an attachment. The grounds upon which this order was applied for were: "1. Because no summons was issued before the attachment was granted, as required by the law of this state. 2. Because the note, upon which the said warranty of attachment was granted, was not then, and is not now, due." As the record brought here furnishes no evidence whatever to sustain the second ground, and, as we are bound to assume, in the absence of any averment to the contrary, that "all the papers upon which the court below acted in making the order," are embraced in the record sent up to this court, as required by Rule I. of this court, we must *assume that the Circuit judge granted the order to vacate the attachment on the first of the above-stated grounds, and it is only necessary to inquire whether that ground is well founded. The facts necessary to the determination of this question, as disclosed by the record, are as follows: On the 24th of July, 1878, the plaintiff obtained from the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for Greenville county, a warrant of attachment, which, on the same day, was lodged with the sheriff and duly executed by the seizure of defendant's property. The summons in the action bears date 24th of July, 1878, and by endorsement thereon appears to have been lodged in the sheriff's office on the 25th of July, 1878, the endorsement being in these words: "Entered July 25th, 1878. P. D. Gilbreath, S. G. C." The sheriff's return shows that the summons was served on the 25th of July, 1878. Under this state of facts it seems to me that the Circuit judge was fully justified in granting the order to vacate the attachment. It is very clear that a warrant of attachment should not be granted before the issuing, but only at the time of issuing the summons, or any time afterwards. Code, § 250. And it is equally clear, from the facts above stated, that the only evidence before the Circuit judge showed that the summons had not been issued until the day after the warrant of attachment was granted. It may be that the entry of the sheriff, endorsed on the summons, showing the date when it was entered in his office, is not conclusive evidence as to the time when the summons was issued, but in the absence of any other the Circuit judge was fully warranted in the conclusion that, from the evidence before him, the summons had not been issued until after the warrant was granted, and, therefore, the attachment should have been vacated. The suggestion that, under the provisions of Section 156 of the code, the summons may be served by any person not a party to the action as well as by the sheriff, and, therefore, for aught that appeared in this case, the summons might have been placed in the hands of some private person to be served on the day of its date, and afterwards lodged with the sheriff, loses its force when it is remembered that Section 122 of the code fixes the time of the commencement of an action at the time when the summons is served, or when it "is delivered with the intent that it shall *be actually served to the sheriff or other officer of the county in which the defendants, or one of them, usually or last resided," not when it is delivered to any person not a party to the action. For Section 250 provides that "in an action arising on contract * * * the plaintiff, at the time of issuing the summons, or any time afterwards, may have the property of such defendants or corporation attached in the manner hereinafter prescribed, * * * and for the purposes of this section an action shall be deemed commenced when the summons is issued." This shows that the design was only to allow the remedy by attachment "in an action" which had already been commenced, or which should be commenced at the time the attachment is applied for; and, reading this section in connection with Section 122, it is plain that the action cannot be regarded as commenced until the summons is served, or until it is delivered, not to any person not a party to the action, but "to the sheriff or other officer of the county." The reason for this distinction is obvious. For, while there may be no objection to fixing the time at which an action can be said to have been commenced at the time when summons is served, even though such service should be made by a private person, there would be manifest impropriety, as opening the door to fraud, in providing that an action should be deemed commenced from the time the summons is delivered to a private person to be served, as that would be a fact known only to the plaintiff and such person, which the defendant would have no means of contradicting. But when the summons is delivered to a public officer to be served, the fact of such delivery, and the time when it is made, becomes more open and notorious, and is accessible to the defendant as well as to any other interest. The objection raised by the appellant that the Circuit judge, sitting at chambers, had no authority to grant the order in question is so fully and satisfactorily disposed of in the opinion of the Chief Justice that it is unnecessary to say anything upon that point. For the reasons above stated, I am unable to concur in the conclusion reached by the Chief Justice, and on the contrary, I think that the order of the Circuit judge should be affirmed.

Order vacated.

Before Pressley, J., at Sumter, May, 1878.

This was an action instituted in Sumter county by John W. Daniels, clerk of the court of Anderson county, against M. Moses, F. J. Moses, Henry Ryttenberg, Marcus G. Ryttenberg and Joseph Ryttenberg. The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the court.

The defendants appealed.†

Messrs. Moise & Lee, for appellants.

If no perfect title passed to M. Moses, then he held adversely to the world from time the last installment fell due. Rice Eq. 373. And the statute giving the lien was repealed before action brought. Gen. Stat. 801; 6 Otto 595; 2 Story Eq., § 1520. The deed admitted the receipt of the purchase money: that should protect an innocent purchaser without notice. 2 Bail. 101; 3 S. C. 105. There were no records in Sumter county to give notice. Proceedings for partition must be had in the district where the lands lay. 5 Stat. 164; 1 N. & McC. 253. None but parties to that cause were bound by the decree. 1 Bail. Eq. 283; 2 McC. Ch. 125. Bond with sufficient sureties being required, rebuts the presumption that the statutory lien was con*templated. If loss has happened, it has been owing to plaintiff's laches. 3 S. C. 530; 2 Story Eq., § 1520, and notes.

The costs of the former action should have been paid before this action was heard. 2 Rich. 27; Chev. 217; 4 East 585; Bac. Ab., "Costs." The representative of F. J. Moses should have been a party. If a statutory lien, he had an equity of redemption; and the defendants should have had the benefit of any defences that F. J. Moses might set up against the bond. 10 Rich. Eq. 484.

The proceedings in Van Wyck v. Maverick were of broader scope than a partition of † The act of 1791, referred to in the arguments and in the opinion of the court, is entitled "An act for the abolition of the rights of primogeniture and for giving an equitable distribution of the real estates of intestates, and for other purposes therein mentioned." The seventh section provides how partition may be had of estates, real and personal, and, if sold, how sold, and concludes—"and the property so sold shall stand pledged for the payment of the purchase money." In Compton v. Ulmer, 2 N. & McC. 430, it was held that this section applied only to cases of intestacy—a decision which has been followed in all subsequent cases where the question arose, although not without suggestions of doubt as to the correctness of such construction. — Reporter.

intestate lands; it included lands held under deed. Hence there is no lien under act of 1791. The act was not fully complied with. There should have been a separate suit in Sumter, as in cases of dower. 4 Stat. 742. And the evidence of M. Moses and the admissions of the deed prove payment. 10 Rich. Eq. 484. The bond being no part of the record, an examination of the record would not have shown the lien. In 2 Hill Ch. 575, and 2 Rich. Eq. 162, the purchasers had actual notice, and proceedings were had in the county where land lay.

The bond should have been only for the credit portion of the purchase money, and the penalty in double that sum.

The policy of the law is against secret liens. 3 S. C. 530; 9 Rich. Eq. 55; Perry on Trusts, § 218.

Mr. Jos. H. Earle, for respondent.

The lien under the act of 1791 has been assimilated to a purchase money mortgage. 9 Rich. Eq. 53. Possession by the purchaser from mortgagor for ten years, is no bar to a foreclosure. 3 S. July 30th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. The action in this case was brought to foreclose a statutory lien on a lot of land in the town of Sumter. For a proper understanding of the questions raised by the appeal it will be necessary to make a brief statement of the facts.

In the year 1852 one Samuel Maverick, a resident of Ander*son district (now county), died intestate. Some time in the year 1854 a bill was filed in the Court of Equity for that district, praying for the partition of his estate, which was alleged to consist, amongst other things, of quite a number of tracts and lots of land, situate in the said district of Anderson, (which formerly constituted a part of Pendleton district,) and in several other districts in this state, including Sumter. In this bill it was stated that shortly before the filing of the bill the records of certain voluntary conveyances from said Samuel Maverick were discovered, purporting to convey quite a large number of these tracts of land—not, however, including the lot in Sumter, which is the subject matter of this controversy—to his three children, dated as far back as 1822; and while the main purpose of the bill was partition, it also asked the opinion of the court as to the validity and construction of these conveyances. Chancellor Wardlaw, who heard the cause, stated in his decree that doubts existed whether such deeds were ever delivered to the parties themselves, or to any one interested for them, but as the parties took the same shares under the deeds as they would take if the deeds were never executed, the question was of no great consequence. He therefore ordered partition of all the lands described in the bill, including the tracts mentioned in the deeds, saying that "as the said lands are situated in many of the districts of this state, it will be necessary that writs of partition should be granted for each district where the lands lie." Accordingly a separate writ of partition was issued to divide the lands in Sumter, and, upon a return to this writ recommending a sale, an order was passed for the sale of the Sumter lands on the following terms: One-fourth cash on the day of sale; the balance in three equal annual installments, to be paid in one, two and three years, with interest payable annually—"any purchaser being permitted to pay in cash, on the day of sale, more than one-fourth if desirable." Purchasers were also required to enter into bonds, with good and sufficient sureties, for the payment of the purchase money. In pursuance of this order the said lot in Sumter was sold by A. O. Norris, as commissioner in equity for Anderson district, on the 3d of March, 1856, and bid off by the defendant, M. Moses, who complied with the terms of sale by *giving bond, with F. J. Moses as surety, for the amount of his bid, which, however, was credited, at its date, with the amount required to be paid in cash, and received a deed therefor from the said commissioner, which is alleged by the defendants to contain an acknowledgment that the whole of the purchase money was then paid. On the 7th of November, 1871, the said lot of land was sold by the sheriff of Sumter county, under an execution against the defendant, M. Moses, and bought by the defendant, Joseph Ryttenberg, who subsequently conveyed the same to the defendant, Henry Ryttenberg, and the defendants, Joseph and Marcus G. Ryttenberg, are alleged to be now in possession of said lot, holding under the said Henry Ryttenberg. The plaintiff demurred to several of the defences interposed by the answer of the Ryttenbergs, and the questions raised thereby will hereafter be partially mentioned. The demurrer was sustained by the Circuit judge, by his order of March 30th, 1878, to which exception was duly taken. At a subsequent special term the case was brought on for trial, when the counsel for appellants insisted upon the following positions: 1. That all proceedings in this case should be stayed until the costs of a former action, brought on the same cause of action, were paid. 2. That the personal representatives of F. J. Moses, who had died during the progress of the cause, were necessary parties. 3. That the defendant, Henry Ryttenberg, having been adjudicated a bankrupt by the United States court on the 2d of May, 1878, the cause was necessarily suspended as to him. These positions being overruled, to which exception was duly taken, the court, after hearing the testimony and argument of counsel, rendered a decree establishing the statutory lien, rendering judgment against the defendant, M. Moses, for the sum of $1340, the amount named in the bond as the penalty, (the accruing interest having carried the amount due considerably beyond such penalty,) and directing that unless the said sum was paid by a day named the said lot of land be sold to satisfy such judgment; and if the proceeds of such sale proved insufficient for that purpose, that the plaintiff have execution against defendant, M. Moses, for the balance. To this decree various exceptions were filed, which will be noticed hereafter.

While we purpose to consider all the various questions raised *by this appeal, we do not expect to take them up exactly in the order in which they are presented in the brief. The facts upon which the motion to stay the proceedings until the costs of the former action were paid are based, are not fully or clearly presented in the brief. So far as we have been able to gather them, it would seem that an action had been previously commenced by A. O. Norris, the late commissioner in equity for Anderson district, but whether against the same parties, and for the same purpose, does not distinctly appear. To this action a demurrer was sustained (whether correctly or not it is not important now to inquire) upon the ground, as we infer from what was said in the argument here, that Norris had no right to bring the action, it being nowhere intimated that such former action was tried upon its merits, which, as it will be seen, is a very important consideration. But, looking at the question in the light most favorable for the appellants, and assuming that the former action was between the same parties, and sought the same relief as in this case, we are yet unable to perceive any error upon the part of the Circuit judge in refusing the motion. As was said in Miller v. Grice, 2 Rich. 36 [44 Am. Dec. 271], there is no inflexible rule in this state upon the subject, and while the general rule may be that the costs of a former action should be paid before a second action should be allowed to proceed, a point, however, which we do not propose to decide, yet after all, it is a question which, to a large extent, must depend upon the discretion of the Circuit judge, and would not, therefore, ordinarily be the subject of appeal. But we are not content to rest our decision upon this. We are entirely satisfied that so far from there being any abuse of discretion in this case, it was very properly exercised in refusing the motion. In England the rule seems to be that a motion to stay the proceedings until the costs of a former action have been paid will not be granted unless the former action has been tried on the merits, or the court is satisfied the second action is vexatious; and, where the former action has failed on some formal or technical ground only, such a motion will not be entertained, especially in an action "for the recovery of a debt." Bass v. Firmen, 1 Ld. Raym. 697; Melchart v. Halsey, 3 Wills. 149; Pashley v. Poole, 3 Dow. & Ry. 53; 16 E. C. L. 134.

*In actions of ejectment the rule there is different, doubtless because one recovery in ejectment could not be pleaded in bar of a second action for the same lands. Keene v. Angel, 6 T. R. 740; Doe, ex dem. Feldon, v.

Roe, 8 T. R. 645; Doe, ex dem. Pinchard, v. Row, 4 East 585. Possibly, too, the rule may be different in such actions as trespass, malicious prosecution, &c. Western v. Withers, 2 T. R. 511; Pashley v. Poole, supra. It is very manifest, therefore, that the discretion of the Circuit judge was properly exercised in this case, which was an action "for the recovery of a debt," and which could not be regarded as vexatious merely, as the former action was not tried upon the merits, but failed on a purely technical ground.

Another fatal objection to the motion was that it came too late. It does not seem to have been made until the case was called for trial, not only after issue joined, but after a demurrer to portions of one of the answers had been heard and sustained, and after all the expense incident to a preparation for trial had been incurred. As is well said in Miller v. Grice, supra, at page 37, "such a motion should be made at as early a period as practicable to prevent suprise and an unnecessary accumulation of costs."

The next question is as to the right of the plaintiff to bring this action, and the necessity for making the persons interested in the money due upon the bond parties to the action.

The objection that the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue, or that there is a defect of parties when appearing upon the face of the complaint, as in this case, should be taken by demurrer. Code, § 167. And if not so taken, is deemed to be waived. Code, § 171. But even were the objection taken in the proper way we do not think it could be sustained. As was said in Billings v. Williamson, 6 S. C. 122, the plaintiff is the proper person to bring the action, and Section 136 of the code shows that it was not necessary to join the parties interested in the money to be recovered on the bond.

We do not think there was any error in refusing to require that the representatives of F. J. Moses, who had died during the pendency of the action, should be made parties. He was a mere surety on the bond, and not, therefore, a necessary party in the *first instance; and if, after his death, the plaintiff chose to proceed without making his representatives parties, he certainly had a right so to do, as the only effect would be to deprive him of the right to a judgment against such representatives. It is a mistake to suppose that F. J. Moses was one of the mortgagors, and, as such a necessary party, and that after his death it would be necessary to bring in his personal representatives. (In that event it would be more correct to say heirs and representatives.) He had no contention whatever with the sale out of which the statutory lien arose; no title was made to him, and he could not in any sense be regarded as a mortgagor. It was not until after the sale that his connection with the matter commenced, and then he only came in as a mere surety on the bond.

Nor do we think that there was any error in refusing to suspend the cause as to Henry Ryttenberg, because he had been adjudicated a bankrupt. There can be no doubt that when this action was commenced the court below had jurisdiction of the case against Henry Ryttenberg, along with the other defendants, such adjudication not having been made until May 2d, 1878, after the action was commenced and after issue joined therein. This proceeding being merely for the enforcement of a lien, so far as the bankrupt is concerned, and not for the purpose of obtaining any personal judgment against him, cannot be affected by the proceedings in bankruptcy. Baum v. Stern, 1 S. C. 415; Bump on Bank. 292–3, (7th ed.)

The next question is, whether the bond, which is the cause of action in this case, has been paid. This, of course, is a question of fact, and while it would be quite sufficient for us to say that, in accordance with the established rule of this court, we will accept the conclusion of the Circuit judge where there is any evidence to sustain it, we may be permitted to add that we agree entirely with him in the conclusion which he has reached. It is contended, however, that the deed to M. Moses contains an acknowledgment that the whole amount of the purchase money was paid at the time of sale. The deed itself is not before us, but the presumption is, as we understood from the statements made in the argument the fact to be, that the deed is in the usual form, and, after stating the amount of the consideration, adds the *customary words, "the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged," or something of that kind. This, in the absence of any other evidence, might be sufficient to show that the consideration had been paid; but, certainly, under the facts proved in this case, would not warrant any such conclusion. Indeed, whatever may have been the form in which acknowledgment may have been made, it would not be conclusive, for no rule of law is better settled than that a receipt is not conclusive. Creditors of Rochelle v. Campbell, 1 McC. Eq. 53 [16 Am. Dec. 595]; Pinchback v. McCraven, 1 Hill Eq. 307; McElwee v. Jeffreys, 7 S. C. 228. To say nothing of the other circumstances proved in the case, the testimony of M. Moses puts it beyond question that the bond was not paid at the time the deed was executed, for, if so, why should he in 1864, propose to pay, by way of settlement, that which had been paid ever since 1856; and he does not anywhere in his testimony even pretend to intimate that the purchase money was paid at the time the deed was executed, but, on the contrary, in reply to the question whether the bond was paid, undertakes to show that it was, in a way wholly inconsistent with the idea that it was paid at the time the deed was executed.

The next question raised by the exceptions, which we propose to consider is, whether the lien provided for by the act of 1791, in case land is sold for partition, attached to the lot now in question. It is contended that in order to give rise to such lien the provisions of that act must be strictly followed, which, it is argued, was not done. First, because the proceedings for partition were instituted, not in Sumter, where the land lies, but in Anderson, and the case of Brown v. McMullen, 1 N. & McC. 252, is cited as authority to show that such proceedings must be instituted in the district where the land lies. In that case the proceedings were instituted in Fairfield district, while all of the lands sought to be partitioned were situate in other districts, and a motion to dismiss the proceedings for want of jurisdiction was granted. The court, in that case, after considering the argument drawn from the provisions of the statute in relation to proceedings for dower, which was likewise urged in this case, lays down the following terms: "It is the opinion of the court that the writs of partition can only issue in those districts where the lands *lie, and that where there are lands in several districts, several writs must issue." So that so far from that case being authority for the position taken by the appellants, it sustains the practice pursued by Chancellor Wardlaw in the case under which the lot in question was sold. For it does not decide that separate proceedings for partition must be commenced in each district or county where the lands of which partition is sought lie in several different districts or counties, but only that, in such cases, "several writs must issue," just as was done in the original case for partition.

The view contended for by the appellants would lead necessarily to the result that where a person died intestate, leaving real estate in several different counties, it would be necessary, for the purpose of partitioning his estate, to institute actions in each of such counties. Such a construction of the act, involving, as it would, unnecessary expense and likely to produce confusion, we would not be disposed to adopt, unless required so to do by the express terms of the statute, but, on the contrary, we prefer what seems to have been the construction adopted by the distinguished Chancellor under whose order the writs of partition were issued.

Next, it is insisted that the act of 1791 only purports to give a lien where land is sold under proceedings for the partition of an intestate's estate; so that where a sale is ordered for partition of lands held by tenants in common, under a deed or otherwise than as heirs of an intestate, the provision for the lien does not apply; and as the proceedings under which the sale in question was made were not for partition of lands of an intestate alone, but also for the partition of those lands embraced in the deed above referred to, the statutory lien did not attach. It might be a sufficient answer to this to say that the decree under which the sale was made treated all the lands as if they were lands of the intestate, and no exception thereto was taken by any of the parties, and they, as well as the appellants, who claim under them, are excluded from now raising the question. But a still more conclusive answer is, that however it may be as to the lands covered by said deeds, no such position could be maintained, so far as the lands in Sumter are concerned, as they are not embraced in either of the deeds, and were undoubtedly a portion of *the intestate's estate, and must, therefore, when sold for partition, have been bound by the statutory lien to secure the payment of the purchase money.

Again, it is argued that the requirement in the order of sale that the purchaser should give bond, with sufficient sureties, rebuts the presumption that any statutory lien was contemplated in this case, and shows that it was not the intention of the decree to rely upon any such security. When it is remembered that at the time this sale was made and up to the commencement of the recent war, it was the very general, if not universal practice, to require purchasers at judicial sales of real estate to give good and sufficient personal security, as well as a mortgage of the premises, it will be seen that such a presumption would have but little to support it. But what is more important, this argument proceeds upon the erroneous idea that a statutory lien is the creature of the court, whereas, in fact, it owes its origin solely to the provisions of the statute, and the courts could not, if they would, dispense with such a statutory provision any more than they could with the most solemn act of the legislature. Messervey v. Barelli, 2 Hill Eq. 575.

The next question raised by the exception is as to the effect of the repeal of that feature of the act of 1791, which provides for a statutory lien upon sale for partition. Gen. Stat. 801. The position taken by the appellants upon this question, that this provision of the act of 1791 having been repealed prior to the commencement of this action, the plaintiff is prevented from setting up the lien in this case, besides being in conflict with the general principles which govern in the construction of statutes, as laid down in Potter Dwar's. on Stat. 155–57, Pacific Mail Steamship Co. v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. 450 [17 L. Ed. 805], is likewise in conflict with the express provisions of Section 4, Chapter CXLVI., (Gen. Stat. 766), where, in speaking of the effect of the repeal of the several acts mentioned therein, this language is used: "It shall not affect any act done or

Now, certainly the statutory lien claimed in this case was a right which had accrued long before the repeal took effect, and, therefore, by the express terms of the general statutes, to say *nothing of the general rule of construction, such right cannot be affected by such repeal.

The next position taken by appellants is, that after the expiration of ten years from the day of sale, or at least from the maturity of the bond, the action could not be maintained. If by this is meant that payment is to be presumed after the lapse of such a time, it certainly cannot be maintained; but if the meaning is, as we presume from the argument of the appellant's counsel it is, that Moses having had possession for more than ten years before the lot in question was sold by the sheriff and bought by Ryttenberg, his title could be referred to such possession rather than to his deed from the commissioner in equity, the position is still without any foundation.

It must be remembered that in order to constitute title by possession it must be shown to be an adverse possession, and so far as we can discover, there is no evidence whatever upon that point. But, in addition to this, Moses, as we have seen, undoubtedly went into possession as a mortgagor, for, in this respect, a statutory lien does not differ from an ordinary mortgage, and no length of possession, as such, without proof of something more, will be a bar to an action to foreclose such lien. Norton v. Lewis, 3 S. C. 25, recognizing and affirming Wright v. Eaves, 10 Rich. Eq. 582.

The next exception is based upon the proposition, which we do not think well founded, that Ryttenberg had no notice of the statutory lien, and, therefore, when he purchased he took his title free from such encumbrance, and those who hold under him hold with like exemption. If a party has such notice as will be sufficient to put him on inquiry, that is enough. 1 Story Eq. Jur. 399, 400, and notes. That Ryttenberg had such notice, there can be no doubt. The recitals in the deed from the commissioner in equity to Moses, which, though not before us, must be presumed to be in the usual form, were sufficient to indicate to him that Moses derived his title from a judicial sale made for partition, and the law then informed him that at such a sale the land stood pledged for the payment of the purchase money. The most ordinary prudence, therefore, should have dictated to him the propriety of examining the record of the case under which such *sale was made, in order to ascertain whether such encumbrance had been removed. If he had done this he would have discovered that the bond had not been paid, but was still outstanding, as the proper place for the bond was in the office where such record was kept, and in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, we are bound to assume that it was there until it was taken out for the purpose of bringing an action upon it, and even then, if the officer who had charge of it did his duty, which, of course, is to be assumed, there would still be evidence that the bond was not paid. If he bought without making such inquiry, and upon the mistaken belief that the bond was paid, he having the means of correcting such mistake by an examination of the records of the case, he must take the consequences. In fact, we do not see how the purchaser of property, covered by a statutory lien, of which he has no express notice, can stand in any better position than the purchaser of property covered by a formal mortgage, duly recorded, of which he has no express notice. In the former case no recording is required, the proceedings under which it arises being regarded, doubtless, as a substitute for such recording, and which, therefore, operate as notice, just as the formal recording does in the latter.

The next exception is in these words: "Because his Honor held that without notice the land of defendant, Ryttenberg was liable to the demand of the plaintiff." If this exception was designed to represent the Circuit judge as holding that express notice was not necessary, then, as we have seen, there was no error; but if the purpose of it is to assail the decision on the ground that it was held therein that Ryttenberg's land would be liable, even though, at the time of his purchase, he had no notice of the lien of any kind, either express or such as would be implied, from the recitals in the deed to Moses and the records of the office in which the proceedings for partition were instituted, then the exception has been taken in entire misapprehension of the Circuit decree, as no such doctrine is announced therein.

The last ground taken by the appellants is that the penalty of the bond was larger than it should have been, and that the Circuit judge erred in decreeing for the amount of the penalty, as stated in the bond. This exception is based upon the idea that *the penalty of a bond for the payment of money must necessarily be exactly double the sum, the payment of which it is intended to secure. Now, while it may be and doubtless is the usual practice to fix the penalty of a money bond at double the amount of the condition, yet we know of no authority requiring this as matter of law, and none such has been cited. We do not see why a person may not bind himself in a penalty of any amount he pleases to pay a certain specified sum of money. Moses undoubtedly knew, or ought to have known at the time he signed the bond, the amount of the penalty named therein, and that it was more than double the sum of money which it was intended to secure, and if he assented to it then, as he did by signing the bond, he cannot now, nor can any one else, ask a court to change the terms of the contract which he then deliberately entered into.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLARD, C. J., and HASKELL, A. J., concurred.

GEORGE M. BROWN v. C. J. CONEY et al.

(April Term, 1879.)

[1. Partition ⟸84.]

The statutory lien given by the act of 1791, in cases of partition of an intestate's real estate, arises only when such partition has been made pursuant to the provisions of that act, and by a court of competent jurisdiction.

[2. Judgment ⟸951.]

In the absence of any evidence by record or parol, of the existence of a judgment in partition, such judgment will not be inferred from imperfect and incomplete records of proceedings prior to the writ of partition, showing, in themselves, that the proper parties were not all before the court, although such records are supplemented by parol evidence of an actual partition by certain persons, two of whom were named as commissioners in the order for the writ, and by proof of the loss of records of an adjoining county, in which the decree, if rendered, was signed, and of the papers in the office of the complainant's solicitor.

*Before Townsend, J., at Marion.

This was an action brought by George M. Brown, as assignee of his father, Moses W. Brown, against Christopher J. Coney, James A. Brown, Robert N. Brown, Mary P. Manheim and Michael Manheim. Mary E. Brown died intestate in 1844, leaving as her distributees her husband, Moses W. Brown, and five children, Robert N. Brown, J. A. Brown, Mary P. Brown, (afterwards Rugg and now Manheim), David W. Brown and George M. Brown; and possessed of a tract of land containing five thousand acres. The children were all minors, and they, with their father, lived upon this land until 1859 or 1860, when Moses W. Brown moved to Florida. In August, 1860, a bill was filed, as stated in the opinion of the court, by M. W. Brown and R. N. Brown against A. J. Rugg and wife and others, praying a partition of this land. The two elder children, R. N. and James A., were then of age; the other three were minors, and continued so to be until after the court held at Darlington, in February, 1861, with the possible exception of Mary, who was born in 1840, month not given. The fragments of the records of that case are stated in the opinion of the court. Julius Dargan was the solicitor who filed the bill. By common consent, Chancellor Carroll held a court at Darlington, in February, 1861, for the transaction of business for the counties of Marion, Marlborough, Chesterfield and Darlington. There was evidence that the bill and other papers in the cause were taken over to Darlington at that time. A day or two after the adjournment of this court, Mr. Dargan was taken ill and died within a few weeks. Mr. Dargan's papers afterwards suffered loss from several removals and from a fire. Many of the records of the court at Darlington have been destroyed by a fire occurring since 1861. The records of the court of Marion show no entries or copies of any papers in this cause.

According to parol evidence submitted by plaintiff in this action, including that of the commissioners in partition, there was a writ of partition executed by four commissioners, two of whom are named in the order for the writ introduced in evidence. From this testimony it appears that all of the children received, *under the return to this writ, about their share, except James A., who received over one thousand acres, charged with the payment of $1750 to his father, who received no land.

Subsequently Moses W. Brown sold this alleged claim to his son, George M. Brown, and James A. Brown sold the land to the defendant, C. J. Coney. George M. Brown then brought this action against C. J. Coney to enforce this demand, claiming a statutory lien under the act of 1791; † or, if the court determined that no partition of the lands of Mary E. Brown had ever been made, then judgment was prayed that the interest of the plaintiff in this tract of land, both as assignee of his father and also as heir-at-law of his mother, be set apart to him in severalty. The other defendants named are plaintiffs' brothers, his sister and her husband.

Under the view taken of this case by the court, a statement of the testimony is unnecessary. The defence was, purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, estoppel in pais and no partition; that if other defences fail there should be partition of all of Mary E. Brown's lands.

Upon the point decided by this court, the Circuit Court held that under the authority of Smith v. Smith, Rice. 232, and McQueen v. Fletcher, 4 Rich. Eq. 152, parol evidence was admissible to complete the record and show the partition; and that such parol evidence clearly showed a partition, and that J. A. Brown received more than his share and was to pay the excess, $1562.33, to M. W. Brown, which gave to M. W. Brown a lien under the statute on this tract of land.

From this decree the defendant, Coney, appealed.

Mr. W. W. Harllee, for appellant.

The first ground of appeal attacks the decree of the Circuit judge on his conclusion that there was a judgment in partition in this case as unsupported by evidence. It is submitted that his Honor is entirely at fault in his deductions from the cases of Smith v. Smith, Rice 232, and McQueen v. Fletcher, 4 Rich. Eq. 152, as in both of those cases it will be seen that the judgment of the court was produced as matter of record, and the questions there *were, could secondary evidence of the previous proceedings be received in proof of the service and preliminary proceedings to support the judgment, which, of itself, presumed that it was properly rendered with the proper parties before the court. But here it is sought to prove a judgment by parol by showing the commencement of the action, the service on a portion of the parties and the order for a writ of partition to issue. It is admitted that none of these proceedings amounted to a judgment, and it is conceded that there is no evidence that the return was ever before the court, or that it was ever heard by it. How, then, can the cases of Smith v. Smith and McQueen v. Fletcher apply, or even furnish an analogy, when in each the order confirming the returns was produced and made the judgment of the court? The only proof of a judgment is the production of the record.

It may be that positive proof of the existence of the judgment being furnished and the loss of the record established, the court might admit secondary evidence of its contents. But there is not only no proof here of the existence of the judgment or order confirming the return, but no proof of the loss of any record of it, where it should properly be. The fact that the Court of Equity was held at Darlington for the Circuit in 1861, and the loss of some records belonging to that district, is no evidence that a cause belonging to Marion was filed there or recorded on the minutes of the court for Darlington. The presumption would be that not only the records would be separate, but that the separate officers of the respective districts would have the custody of their own papers, as the law made it their duty to have.

It is a novel proposition, to say the least of it, that the death of the counsel having the case in charge is evidence that there was a judgment. Such a proposition shocks the judgment of every one looking to its consequences. But supposing there was a judgment, what was it? No one of the commissioners says what was to be paid to M. W. Brown by James A., or his sister, Mrs. Rugg.

M. W. Brown swears that no provision was made for him by the commissioners, but one of them, S. C. James, requested him to release, which he refused to do.

R. N. Brown and James A. Brown both prove that by the *return James A. was to pay M. W. Brown $1750, the excess over his share; and yet the Circuit judge finds $1562.33, the amount of the judgment, and orders it to be paid or the land sold. But this is not all. Could there have been a confirmation of the return with the pleadings in the shape they are proven to be?

1. Three of the defendant's distributees were minors, a blank order, not signed, appointing their guardian ad litem.

2. The consent of these infant defendants to the issuing of a writ of partition.

3. An order for a writ of partition to issue to Thomas Eaddy, Ezra Eaddy, Dr. Thomas R. Bass, I. R. Timmons and J. T. Bostick.

4. The evidence of the commissioners that neither of the three first named acted, but the two last, with two others (strangers to the record), undertook to divide the lands.

Can it be pretended that on this showing the Court of Equity of this state, in 1861, or any court of competent jurisdiction, would have confirmed such a return? To presume such a thing would be to stamp the ministers of justice with gross ignorance or recklessness, and affords a good reason why a gentleman of Mr. Dargan's experience, capacity and character did not have the return confirmed or made of record.

Messrs. Johnson & Johnson, for respondent.

The first question in this case is, was there, in 1860 and 1861, any division made of the tract of land described in the complaint, amongst the heirs-at-law of Mary E. Brown, by the Court of Equity?

As a question of fact, it has been decided in the affirmative by his Honor Judge Townsend, and this court will not reverse his finding unless the evidence is overbearing that his decision was wrong. It is not sufficient that this court, on the same evidence, might have come to a different conclusion. Rice 232; 1 S. C. 325.

The judge is fully supported by the evidence. The competency of the parol evidence is sustained, and the imperfection of the pleadings can in no way affect the validity of the partition. 4 Rich. Eq. 152; Rice 232.

*July 30th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. To sustain the Circuit decree in this case, it is necessary that this court should be satisfied that a partition of the real estate of the late Mrs. Mary E. Brown has been made, under the order of a court of competent jurisdiction, pursuant to the provisions of the act of 1791. Until this is established the statutory lien set up by the plaintiff cannot arise. Such a lien is a creature of the statute, and unless it is made to appear that partition has been made under that statute, such lien can have no existence. For, while it may be very true that the parties themselves may make a valid partition, by the terms of which one of them may be required to pay to another a sum of money for equality of partition, yet, certainly, such an agreement cannot give rise to the statutory lien sought to be set up in this case, but the amount thus agreed to be paid would be like any other debt arising from a promise to pay, which may or may not be secured by a lien, according as the parties may agree.

As we do not agree with the Circuit judge in the conclusion which he has reached, inasmuch as we do not think there was any legal evidence that a partition was ever made by the Court of Equity, this is the only matter necessary to be considered, for, until a partition by the order of a court has been established, the other questions discussed cannot properly arise. It is not pretended that there was any direct evidence whatever of any judgment or final order for the partition of the land in question, either by record or by parol. No such record was produced, and no witness testified that any such record had ever existed. The court below, however, inferred the existence of such a judgment from fragments of a record which were introduced, supplemented by parol testimony. The record evidence introduced is thus stated by the Circuit judge: "The original bill filed by M. W. Brown and R. N. Brown against A. J. Rugg and wife and others, in which are described the lands of Mary E. Brown, with a prayer for a partition of the same among her heirs-at-law, is before the court. The original bill was filed on the 29th of August, 1860. The original sub. ad res., with the return of the sheriff and a copy of the will of S. S. Anderson, is on exhibit and produced with the will. A written consent of three of the *parties for a writ of partition, the order of the commissioner in equity, dated November 20th, 1860, for the writ to issue, and an unsigned order for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the infants, are also produced. These papers constitute all the recorded evidence in relation to the partition. No writ of partition, return of the commissioners or order confirming the same, has been found, after diligent search in the public offices, or in the office or among the papers of J. A. Dargan, the attorney who was employed to institute the proceedings for partition. No copies of these papers can be found in the record books, either in the offices in Darlington or Marion counties." To this it may be added that it appears from the evidence as presented in the brief that the sheriff's return on the sub. ad res. shows that only one of the defendants, J. A. Brown, was personally served, a copy being left at his residence for G. M. Brown, who was a minor at that time; and the only other defendant mentioned in the return is D. W. Brown, also a minor, as to whom the return is, "cannot find D. W. Brown in my district, or that he has any dwelling place therein." An acceptance of service is endorsed upon the sub. ad res., signed by A. J. Rugg, "for self and wife," the latter probably being a minor at the time, as her name is embraced among the infant defendants named in the "unsigned order for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the infants." It also appears that this order is not only "unsigned," but it does not contain the name of the person to be appointed, a blank being left apparently for that purpose. The written consent for the writ of partition purports to be signed by Mary P. Rugg and G. M. Brown, one of whom was certainly, and the other probably, a minor at the time. Again, the order of the commissioner in equity for the writ of partition requires that it shall be directed to five persons named therein, while the parol evidence introduced shows that only two, not a majority, of those persons acted in making the division of the lands, assisted by two other persons whose names nowhere appear in any order or other part of the record introduced. It should also be added that while there was testimony as to the destruction of the records in Darlington, there was no such testimony as to those in Marion, where the *lands in question are situated, and where the records of any proceedings for partition properly belong.

Now, while the cases of Smith v. Smith, Rice 232, and McQueen v. Fletcher, 4 Rich. Eq. 152, upon which the Circuit judge bases his conclusion, may be sufficient to establish the proposition that where the record of the judgment in partition or final order confirming the return of the commissioners is introduced, that it shall be sufficient to warrant the conclusion that all the previous proceedings were regular, and that the missing portions of the record may be supplied by parol evidence, yet those cases do not support the conclusion reached by the court below, for, in both of those cases, the final order confirming the return of the commissioners was introduced, showing that the court had rendered judgment, while in this case no such evidence has been introduced. But when we are asked to infer the existence of a judgment or final order, of which there is no evidence, either by record or by parol, because of the fact that certain portions of a record, looking to such judgment or final order, are introduced, even though supplemented by the parol evidence offered in this case, the proposition assumes a very different shape and cannot command our assent. It may admit of grave doubt whether such an inference would be warranted, even if the portions of the record which were introduced, supplemented by the parol evidence introduced in this case, showed that all the previous proceedings were entirely regular up to the time when the commissioner in equity granted the order for the writ of partition, the last piece of record evidence which was introduced, and that all persons interested in the subject matter of the suit were properly made parties. But in this case the portions of the record which were introduced do not show that the previous proceedings were regular, or that the necessary parties were properly brought before the court. The sheriff's return shows that only one of the defendants was properly served with process, although it does appear that another, who, however, was only a party in right of his wife, did acknowledge service. The acceptance of service, signed by A. J. Rugg, "for self and wife," was, certainly, not sufficient to make her a party, especially if she was, as we are bound to presume she was, a minor at the time, for she is named *in the order drawn for the appointment of a guardian ad litem as one of the infant defendants, and there is nothing to show that she afterwards, and before the acceptance of service was signed, attained her majority. There is no evidence that a guardian ad litem had ever been appointed for the infant defendants, or, if appointed, there is no evidence to show that the person so appointed accepted the office, or appeared in the case as such. This, of itself, was a fatal defect, quite sufficient to negative the idea that a Court of Equity would have rendered judgment or granted a final order. For, while the cases of Bulow v. Witte, 3 S. C. 308, and Walker v. Veno, 6 S. C. 459, do announce the proposition that, under the former system of equity procedure, to make an infant a party defendant it was not necessary that he should be served with process of subpœna, or that an answer should be filed by a guardian ad litem for him; they both recognize the necessity of his appearing by a guardian ad litem, for, in both of those cases, a guardian ad litem had not only been duly appointed, but it appeared from the record that such guardian had consented to act, had appeared in the case and consented to the orders sought to be set aside, and this was regarded as sufficient. But in this case nothing of the kind appears upon the record, and, on the contrary, from what does there appear, it would seem that no guardian ad litem had ever been appointed. The only evidence upon the subject is that contained in the parol testimony of Robert Brown, where, in speaking of the division of the land, he says: "D. W. Brown and George M. Brown were minors at the time, and George J. Myers acted as their guardian ad litem in division, but when, or by what authority he was appointed as such, or whether, in fact, he ever was so appointed, or ever appeared in the case, he does not pretend to say." Again, the parol evidence shows that only two of those to whom the writ of partition was directed to issue acted in making the division of the lands, while it nowhere appears how or by what authority the other two persons who acted with them took upon themselves the performance of such duty. It will not do to say that the order of the commissioner in equity for the writ of partition to issue is sufficient to authorize the presumption that everything was regular up to that time, especially in the face of *the serious defects and irregularities just pointed out, for it must be remembered that, while by the act of 1840, (11 Stat. 157), the commissioner in equity was authorized to grant writs of partition, yet the statute requires that "all such writs shall be made returnable to the next succeeding sitting of the court for the adjudication of the Chancellor." And it is well known that where writs of partition were issued under an order from the commissioner, the general, if not universal, practice was for the Chancellor to scrutinize closely all the previous proceedings, to see that everything was regular, and especially to see that all necessary parties were properly brought before the court; whereas, when the writ was issued under the order of a Chancellor, it was not regarded as necessary to go behind such order. So that it seems to us, instead of inferring from such portions of the record as have been produced, even supplemented by the parol testimony introduced, that these proceedings culminated in a final judgment, the more natural inference would be that the Chancellor, looking into the proceedings and discovering the irregularities and defects to which we have alluded, declined to grant the final order, and, therefore, that there was no such judgment in partition as would give rise to the statutory lien set up by the plaintiff.

From the view which we have taken of this case the question raised in appellant's argument as to whether a statutory lien can arise where land is assigned to one or more of the parties who are required to pay something to the others to equalize the partition, or whether such lien can only be created where the land is ordered to be sold for the purpose of making partition, does not properly arise, and has not, therefore, been considered. The plaintiff, in his complaint, demands judgment in the alternative, first, for a foreclosure of the statutory lien, but "if the court is not satisfied that a legal partition was made of the lands of Mary E. Brown, then that the interest of the plaintiff in said lands, of which Coney is in possession, both as heir-at-law of his mother and as assignee of his father, be set apart to him in severalty," &c.; but as that part of the complaint could not well be considered or adjudicated by the court below, under the view taken by that court, and, as it may be worthy of consideration whether all the parties necessary to such adjudication are now before the *court, we do not propose to consider any of the questions which might arise in that aspect of the case, but to refer all such questions to the Circuit Court.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside, and that the case be remanded to that court for further proceedings, with leave to the plaintiff to apply to the Circuit Court for such amendments as may be deemed necessary to enable him properly to litigate any rights which he may claim to have to a partition and account for rents and profits.

Judgment reversed.

WILLIAM THORPE v. J. G. THORPE and J. R. ABNEY.

(April Term, 1879.)

[1. Evidence ⇐135.]

On a question of fraud, evidence of other transactions is only admissible as tending, by way of inducement, to unravel the intent of the transaction directly in issue, and where too remote in itself and unsustained by other evidence, it should not be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 405; Dec. Dig. ⇐135.]

[2. Fraudulent Conveyances ⇐166.]

While a mortgage given to secure a valid existing debt may hinder or delay other creditors of the mortgagor, it does not do so within the meaning of the statute, where there is no agreement or understanding on the part of the mortgagee by which, for valuable consideration, his debtor was induced to give the preference, to the injury of other creditors, nor any knowledge by the mortgagee of an intended fraud in the transaction, or collusion therewith.

[3. Fraudulent Conveyances ⇐118.]

That the creditor was a brother, and had shown kindness to the debtor in other matters, does not justify the conclusion that the debtor may have made the preference with a view to his own ultimate benefit.

[4. Equity ⇐409.]

It is the duty of the judge of the Court of Common Pleas to determine by his own judgment all questions of fact as well as of law arising in an equity cause. The report of a referee to whom all the issues in such a case were referred, like that of a former commissioner, or the verdict of a jury upon issues ordered out of chancery, is subject to exception, and merely aids the judge in reaching his judgment.

*Before Cooke, J., at Charleston, December, 1877.

This was an action brought by plaintiff to foreclose a mortgage upon a house and lot in the city of Charleston, executed by defendant Joseph G. Thorpe; and John R. Abney, who claimed the property under sheriff's deed, was made a party defendant.

Joseph G. Thorpe, a citizen of Graniteville, S. C., borrowed $1000 from his brother, William Thorpe, a citizen of Pennsylvania, July 25th, 1870, and gave his sealed note, payable at twelve months. In May, 1875, an action was commenced in Edgefield county against D. L. Turner, a former Probate judge, upon his official bond, and against J. G. Thorpe and others, the sureties thereto. In February, 1876, J. G. Thorpe executed a mortgage to his brother upon the lot in dispute, to secure the payment of this note. On March 26th, 1876, judgment was obtained at Edgefield against D. L. Turner, J. G. Thorpe, and others, for $3548.90. A transcript of this judgment was sent to Charleston, and, under it, the lot in that city was sold as the property of J. G. Thorpe in August, 1876, by the sheriff of Charleston county. At that sale notice was given of this mortgage, which had been duly recorded in that county, March 29th, 1876. John R. Abney was the purchaser.

This is the mortgage here sought to be foreclosed, and (J. G. Thorpe not answering,) John R. Abney resists the foreclosure, and claims the property to be his absolutely, upon the ground that the mortgage was fraudulent, and made to delay, hinder and defeat the just claims of the creditors of the defendant, and particularly the plaintiff in the suit against Turner and others.

All the issues of law and fact were referred to James Aldrich, Esq., special referee, to hear and determine. In his report, the referee states the pleadings and the facts, much of which has no bearing upon the points of the case decided by this court. The report continues:

J. G. Thorpe has not only failed to answer the complaint herein, but is a most willing witness in favor of plaintiff, and a most unwilling witness for John R. Abney. Indeed, to obtain his testimony he had to be called by John R. Abney, and in his evidence he speaks of the proceedings in the case of State, ex rel. *Abney, v. Turner and himself, as an attempt to rob him of his property. Again, J. G. Thorpe was the agent of the plaintiff in all his transactions, including even the management of the suit against himself, to the very payment of the fees of the plaintiff's attorney. See the testimony of plaintiff generally; that of J. G. Thorpe and D. S. Henderson. Plaintiff is bound by whatever J. G. Thorpe did as his agent. Bump on Fraud. Con. 203.

Even where the creditor is not aware of the debtor's intention to delay, hinder or defeat the claims of another creditor, but learns enough to excite a suspicion of that fact, or accepts the preference, or the fruits of it, after he has learned that such intention existed in the mind of the common debtor, he will not be allowed to retain the preference, nor can one avail himself of the fraud of another. Bump on Fraud. Con. 200; [Johnston v. South Wester Rail Road Bank] 3 Strob. Eq. 263; [Farr v. Sims] Rich. Eq. Cas. 122 [24 Am. Dec. 396].

While relationship between the parties (and here they are brothers) is not a badge of fraud that a secret trust existed, still "they are the persons with whom a secret trust is likely to exist. The same principle applies to all persons with whom the debtor has a confidential relation. [Here the debtor was the agent of the creditor.] Any relationship which gives rise to confidence, though not a badge of fraud, strengthens the presumption that may arise from other circumstances, and serves to elucidate, explain or give color to the transaction." Bump on Fraud. Con. 54, 55.

"In deciding upon the bona or mala fides of such a transaction, much importance is always attached to the fact that the security was taken, not as a pledge for money borrowed at the time, but for an antecedent debt." [Schmidt v. Gatewood] 2 Rich. Eq. 162.

Here the mortgages of May, 1875, were given to secure a debt alleged to have been contracted in May, 1873, and the mortgage in dispute was given in 1876, to secure a debt contracted in 1870.

"The omission of the grantee to testify or to produce the debtor, or any other important witness, is the ground for an unfavorable presumption, and frequently exercises an important influence upon the final determination of fraud."

Here the wife, son and daughter of plaintiff, and the wife of *J. G. Thorpe, were important witnesses, and were not produced by grantee, plaintiff. They saw plaintiff pay to J. G. Thorpe the $1000 for which the note in dispute was given, and yet they do not testify.

Where a judgment confessed is impeached by a creditor for fraud, it is a circumstance entitled to considerable weight where the transaction is of a doubtful character that it was confessed pending the creditor's suit. [Farr v. Sims] Rich. Eq. Cas. 410 [24 Am. Dec. 396].

I take it the same is applicable to mortgages. In this case the mortgage of 1876, the one involved herein, was given but a few weeks prior to the judgment in that case, and it reached Charleston for record but a week or two before the transcript in the Abney case reached the same point. There seems to be a method in this chance course of action.

I will briefly state some of the facts which indicate fraud: Plaintiff was a workman at $15 per week. If he worked all the time he made $780 per year, and it would require his entire earnings of nearly eight years to make a loan of $6000; and, allowing him but $280 per year to support himself and family, it would take his saving of twelve years to make the loan. $5000 of this money was sent in a registered letter (so J. G. Thorpe says) all the way from Pennsylvania to Graniteville, and yet no receipt, post-office registry, no witness even pretends to prove this remarkable transaction, save J. G. Thorpe, the debtor and agent, who kept them in his possession and had the mortgage foreclosed upon his own property. I never read of a case similar to this transaction. Again, J. G. Thorpe would give the mortgages and record them at his discretion. Again, when the $6000 mortgages were drawn by H. T. Wright, the $6000 note which they were given to secure was not shown to him.

The $1000 mortgage of 1876 is in J. G. Thorpe's handwriting.

I will now leave this class of evidence, and it is by no means exhausted, and examine the positive testimony as to the mala fides of the transaction.

Plaintiff says: "I knew that the property (this is dispute) was advertised for sale before it was sold, and I told J. G. Thorpe to go ahead, foreclose the mortgage and save the property." Plaintiff was not anxious to get his money, but wanted the mort*gage foreclosed for what? To "save the property," and J. G. Thorpe was the man selected to "save the property."

Plaintiff says J. G. Thorpe had the custody of the mortgage now in dispute all the time until it was handed to an attorney to foreclose, and that the mortgage was, in fact, given without his knowledge, and voluntarily. The agent of J. G. Thorpe, who gave notice of this mortgage at the sale in Charleston under the Abney execution, also bid upon the property.

Now I shall look over J. G. Thorpe's testimony. He says: "I had been sued on Turner's bond, and I gave the mortgage to William Thorpe, my brother, to secure him. I had a right to prefer a creditor." "I did not know that judgment was to be rendered against me at March Term, 1876. I was on the jury here in Aiken at that time. I asked you [G. W. Croft] how long a mortgage had to be recorded in. Croft's answer, sixty days. I said that I thought when a mortgagee was out of the state he had longer than sixty days. Croft's answer, no. The next day I told Croft that I had sent the mortgage to be recorded."

J. G. Thorpe was asked why he had not recorded the mortgage of 1875, which included his Aiken property as well as this in dispute, but which was recorded in Aiken only. "It would hurt the sale. * * * I put it in the first mortgage, intending to record it in Charleston, but changed my mind because of the sale."

If this is not proof plain of a benefit allowed by plaintiff to J. G. Thorpe, and that J. G. Thorpe did exercise his powers to delay, hinder and defeat other creditors, I don't know what is. J. G. Thorpe says that he got the $5000 on May 18th, 1873; it was all spent by the following fall, and can't tell where it went, except in vague generalities. "I don't remember that I mentioned to Mr. Wright about being sued on the Turner bond." In this he is contradicted by H. T. Wright, Esq., who says J. G. Thorpe mentioned the suit both before and when he drew the mortgages. "I knew the court was to meet in Edgefield in March, and apprehended danger. I gave my brother the mortgage to protect him."

Here J. G. Thorpe in substance contradicts his statement that he did not know judgment was to be rendered against him in

*March, 1876; he did not knew but apprehended danger. "I did not send this mortgage to be recorded until I heard of the judgment at Edgefield."

Here he contradicts both his other assertions as to knowledge of the judgment.

"I had an understanding that I was to live on the premises and pay rent after the sale." This alludes to the Aiken property. "I renewed the $5000 note of my own accord, because I knew of the suit."

H. T. Wright, Esq., says: "J. G. Thorpe, at both Graniteville and Johnston's, told me that he was indebted to his brother, and that he wanted to protect him—to fix it so that his brother could be protected; that he did not want his property to go to the Abney suit. Thorpe said his object was not only to protect his brother, but also to protect his property from the Abney suit." This is too plain for comment. G. W. Croft, Esq., in answer to what J. G. Thorpe said was the conversation between them at the Aiken court in March, 1876, says that J. G. Thorpe told him that "he would make a mortgage and send it to Charleston and have it recorded; and Thorpe is undoubtedly mistaken when he says that he told me he had a mortgage written. I am very positive of this."

This is most important, because the mortgage in dispute purports to have been executed three or four weeks prior to the date of this conversation.

This is all the discussion of the law and facts I shall make, and, after a careful and pains-taking consideration of the great mass of testimony, I feel convinced that the $6000 note and the two mortgage given to secure it are pretensive and fraudulent, and that the mortgage, the cause of this action, was intended to delay, hinder and defeat the creditors of J. G. Thorpe, and particularly the judgment in the case of State, ex rel. Carey M. Abney, v. D. L. Turner and J. G. Thorpe. I have grave doubts but that this mortgage was intended only to defeat the Abney judgment, and that plaintiff knew all the facts.

I was requested by the attorney of plaintiff to decide as to the validity of the note of 1870 for $1000, given to secure the money said to be borrowed, and which this mortgage was given to *secure. I might reply as the court did in the cases of Fryer v. Bryan, 2 Hill's Eq. 56; Dickinson v. Way, 3 Rich. Eq. 412, and Bowie v. Free, 3 Rich. Eq. 403, that "a court is not bound to disentangle a web of fraud, to ascertain if any good material be mixed in it;" but I will do as requested, though I am not certain but that my decision will be an obiter dictum.

The note must stand, not so much from the evidence in favor of it, but because there has been no strong evidence against it. It has not been successfully impeached.

My conclusions of the facts are that the mortgage, the subject of this action, was given to hinder, delay and defraud the creditors of J. G. Thorpe, especially the judgment in the case of State, ex rel. Carey M. Abney, v. D. L. Turner and J. G. Thorpe, and that the same is null and void.

That the note is valid. My conclusions of law are that said mortgage must be and hereby is set aside and made of no effect, the same being void because of fraud.

That no judgment can be given as to the note, because this action is for foreclosure of the mortgage only. It has no demand for general relief, hence the complaint as to the note must also be dismissed, but without prejudice to the plaintiff's right to proceed therein in any manner as he may be advised.

That the complaint be dismissed, and the costs of this suit to be paid by the defendant, J. G. Thorpe, and the plaintiff, William Thorpe.

The letters referred to are as follows:

"Philadelphia, Pa., June 20th, 1874.

"Dear Brother:—I have contracting. I want all the money I have loaned paid to me as soon as possible; if I cannot get the money right away, I want it secured by a mortgage of your property. My family is all well, and they send regards to you all.

"Yours, a faithful brother,

"Wm. Thorpe."

*"Graniteville, S. C., July 3d, 1874.

"Dear Brother:—Yours of June 20th was duly received and particularly noticed, and in answer will say that I am willing to give a mortgage on all I have got to secure you in the payment of the money I borrowed from you. If I do not sell the two houses at auction this month or fall in Charleston, I will certainly give you a mortgage to secure the payment of the note for $1000 I gave you in July, 1870. I know I promised to pay it several times before, but Mr. Leitch has tried to sell the two houses so often at auction, and failed to sell them, that I have been disappointed so often and could not help it. I will send you more interest as soon as I can, and you can credit it on the back of the note, as you did the other. I have nothing more of interest to write, only we are all well and hope this may find you all the same; and with best wishes I remain as ever

"Your affectionate brother,

"J. G. Thorpe."

The mortgage in dispute remained in possession of J. G. Thorpe until July, 1876, when he turned it over to D. S. Henderson, Esq., Mr. Henderson having shortly before received a letter from Wm. Thorpe, saying it would be turned over, and instructed that it be foreclosed.

To this report of the referee exceptions were filed by the plaintiff as follows:

1. That the referee erred in finding as matter of fact that the mortgage, the subject of this action, was given to hinder and delay the creditors of J. G. Thorpe, and especially the judgment in the case of Abney v. Turner, and that the same is null and void.

2. That the referee erred in not finding as matter of fact that said mortgage was given as a bona fide preference to a creditor who held a valid, subsisting and meritorious debt.

3. That the referee erred in finding, as matter of law, that said mortgage must be set aside and made of no effect, the same being void because of fraud.

4. That the referee erred in not finding, as a matter of law, that said mortgage was valid, having found that it was given to secure a valid debt, and that the mortgage was really executed, *though the effect of said transfer was to delay, hinder or defeat a creditor, yet the preference is valid in law; and even if the mortgage was given "for the express purpose of defeating an execution," yet it is valid, the debt being bona fide.

5. That the referee erred, as matter of law, in not giving judgment against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff, as against J. G. Thorpe for the debt and costs by default, and as against Abney for the costs of trial; for, no matter what is the prayer, the judgment must conform to the facts proven.

6. That said report is in many other respects inconsistent and contrary to the law and the evidence.

On the 21st of December, 1877, the exceptions to the report of the referee were heard at Charleston before his Honor Judge Cooke, and on the same day his Honor announced his decision reversing the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the referee, and afterwards, on the 9th day of January, 1878, filed the following decree:

This cause came on to be heard before me at Charleston, at the present fall term, upon the report of the special referee, James Aldrich, Esq., to whom had been referred all the issues, the testimony taken by him, the pleadings and the exceptions filed to said report by the plaintiff.

The action is for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon the property hereinafter mentioned, found by the referee to be executed on the 17th of February, 1876, by the defendant, J. G. Thorpe, and delivered to the plaintiff. Said mortgage was given to secure a note for $1000, borrowed money, signed by said defendant, J. G. Thorpe, and made payable to the plaintiff. The referee finds, as matter of fact, that the said note is, and was, at the time of the making of the mortgage, a valid and subsisting debt, but that the said mortgage was given to hinder and delay the creditors of J. G. Thorpe, and especially the judgment in the case of State, ex rel. Abney et al., v. Turner and Thorpe, (under which the defendant, Abney, claims title by deed subsequent to the recording of the mortgage, the said judgment also having been filed in Charleston county subsequent to said recording,) and that the same is null and void.

The exceptions, taken together, raise two objections to the *report: First, that the referee having found that the debt was valid and subsisting as matter of law, he should have found the mortgage, given to secure said valid debt, valid and binding; and, second, that the referee was not warranted by the weight of the testimony in his finding that the mortgage was given to delay, hinder and defeat the creditors of J. G. Thorpe. After hearing argument from Mr. Henderson in support of the exceptions, and Mr. Croft, contra, and upon full consideration of the case, I am constrained to sustain said exceptions.

The debt being valid and subsisting, and the mortgage, the incident thereof, being fully perfected by signature, delivery and record, it follows, as a matter of law, that the same is valid, and as a preference it could only be vacated in the court of bankruptcy, if contrary to the act of congress in such case made and provided.

This disposes of the report, and settles the case in favor of the plaintiff; but, upon a review of the case, I am satisfied that the referee is wrong in his finding of fact that the mortgage is fraudulent, null and void, and said finding is set aside as contrary to the testimony.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the said exceptions, as above set forth, be sustained, and the said report, as above indicated, be, and the same is hereby set aside, with costs for the plaintiff, to be taxed by the clerk—the plaintiff's costs, as allowed by law, to be paid out of the sale of the property; the defendant, John R. Abney, the answering and contesting defendant, to pay the referee's fee and all other costs of the action.

In furtherance of this decree, it is adjudged that the mortgaged premises described in the complaint be sold at public auction in the county of Charleston, by the sheriff of said county, upon the following terms, for cash: said sale to be on sale-day, in February next, or some convenient sale-day thereafter, after due legal notice; that the said sheriff execute to the purchaser or purchasers a deed of the premises sold; that, out of the moneys arising from said sale, after deducting the amount of his fees and expenses on such sale, the said sheriff do pay to the plaintiff or his attorney the sum of $1432.60 now due on said note, and dollars for plaintiff's costs, (the clerk authorized *to fill said blank,) with interest on $1432.60 from this date; that he hold the surplus money, if any there should be, subject to the further order of this court; that he make a report of such sale to this court at its next sitting; that, should there be deficiency as shown by said report, that the defendant, J. G. Thorpe, pay the same to the plaintiff, leave being hereby given for issuance of execution therefor.

It is further ordered and adjudged that the defendants, and all persons claiming under them, be forever barred and foreclosed of all right, title, interest and equity of redemption in said mortgaged premises so sold, or any part thereof.

The following is a description of the mortgaged premises:

[Then follows a description of the premises.]

Thompson H. Cooke.

Charleston, S. C., December 21st, 1877.

On the 16th of January, the defendant, Abney, served the following exceptions to the decision of Judge Cooke, to wit:

Take notice, that the defendant, J. R. Abney, excepts to the decision of his Honor Judge Cooke herein, filed on the 9th day of January, 1878, and will move the Supreme Court to reverse said decision on the following grounds, to wit:

1. That his Honor the presiding judge had no jurisdiction to hear exceptions to the report of the referee herein, and his decree is therefore null and void.

2. Because his Honor erred in holding as a matter of fact that the mortgage was not given with the fraudulent intention of defeating the judgment in the case of State, ex rel. Carey M. Abney et al., v. D. L. Turner et al.

3. Because his Honor erred in not sustaining the conclusions of fact as found by the referee, adjudging the mortgage mentioned in the complaint to have been given mala fide, and with the fraudulent intention to hinder and delay the claims of the creditors of J. G. Thorpe, and particularly the judgment in the case of State, ex rel. Carey M. Abney et al., v. D. L. Turner et al.

4. Because his Honor held that, inasmuch as the referee found the note valid, it followed as a matter of law that the mortgage was also valid, for it is respectfully submitted that such ruling *is not the law, but is in direct conflict to the adjudicated cases in this state.

5. Because the decree of his Honor the presiding judge is against the evidence, and contrary to law.

Messrs. G. W. Croft and G. D. Bryan, for appellant.

1. If the debt is valid, does it follow, as a matter of law, that the mortgage is valid and bona fide; or, may not the mortgage be made mala fide and with the fraudulent intent of hindering and defeating the right of a creditor, notwithstanding the debt intended to be secured is valid, and therefore null and void? Bump on Fraud. Con. 197, 483; 4 S. C. 257; 2 Bail. 324; Rich. Eq. Cas. 410; 9 Rich. 106.

2. It is contended that the referee's conclusion as to the facts is the same as the verdict of a jury, and his findings must stand unless they are clearly against the weight of evidence. Code, § 296; 6 S. C. 312.

3. The evidence before the referee was sufficient to support his findings of fact. They disclosed several badges of fraud. Bump on Fraud. Con. 43–57, 202, 203; 1 Hill 16; 10 Rich. 72; Rich. Eq. Cas. 4, 10, 122; 2 Bail. 328. His conclusions should be sustained. 6 S. C. 140, 310.

Mr. D. S. Henderson, for respondent.

As to first exception, see Code, § 296. As to fourth exception, see Rice Eq. 78; 10 Rich. Eq. 413. The security may be void when debt is valid, but only when the facts show an intention of aiding the common debtor. Rich. Eq. Cas. 410; 9 Rich. 110; Bump on Fraud. Con. 186. The facts do not sustain referee's conclusion of law, and the Circuit ju lge properly overruled the finding. 5 S. C. 142; 4 S. C. 249; 2 Hill Ch. 32; Bump on Fraud. Con. 563. And this reversal should stand, notwithstanding the rule laid down in 6 S. C. 140; 6 S. C. 90, 379.

Mr. Croft, in reply.

The Circuit judge had no power to reverse the referee's report. See Code, § 296, as interpreted in 41 How. Pr. 11. Objection to jurisdiction never comes too late. Code, § 171.

*July 30th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. This was an action brought to foreclose a mortgage of real estate given by J. G. Thorpe to William Thorpe, to secure a pre-existing debt. After the mortgage had been recorded the land was levied on and sold by the sheriff under a lien junior to that of the mortgage. The mortgagor made no answer. The purchaser at sheriff's sale, however, having been made a party defendant, filed his answer, in which he charges that the mortgage and the note it was given to secure, were given in fraud and to hinder, delay and defeat the claims of creditors of the mortgagor. He prays, therefore, that the note and mortgage be set aside as null and void. By an order of the court, all the issues in the action were submitted to a referee. The referee, in his report, finds the note to be a valid and subsisting debt; but he finds that the mortgage "was given to hinder and delay the creditors" of the mortgagor, "and that the same is null and void." His conclusion of law is that the mortgage must be "set aside and made of no effect, the same being void because of fraud." The report, so far as it relates to the mortgage, is not confirmed by the Circuit judge, who decides that the evidence is insufficient to establish fraud or to otherwise affect the mortgage, and foreclosure in the usual form is ordered. The appeal is from such judgment. The evidence which we are obliged to examine in an appeal from the finding of facts in an equity case can be much reduced by inquiring into its relevancy. So much as relates to what is called the $6000 note and the mortgage to secure it, is only admissible as tending, by way of inducement, to unravel the intent in the transactions directly in issue, and is too remote unless sustained by other evidence. That much, therefore, of the evidence need not be separately considered. As regards the $1000 note and mortgage, which are the cause of action, the validity of the note is admitted. There is evidence that the debt had been for some years past due and unpaid, and that the holder of the note, in 1874, urged payment, and that the maker promised to pay as soon as he could sell certain real estate then in the hands of a broker, or, if he failed to sell, that he would secure the note by mortgage. The land is the same which is now in question.

Further, there is no evi*dence of any promise or agreement or understanding on the part of the mortgagee, by which, for valuable consideration, his debtor was induced to give security or preference to the injury of other creditors. Nor is there evidence of any fraud in this transaction by which other creditors have been injured; but, even if there had been fraud as to the other creditors on the part of the mortgagor, there is no evidence of any knowledge of the same, or collusion therewith on the part of the mortgagee. It is difficult to perceive more than the facts that the debtor, J. G. Thorpe, being sued as surety on the bond of a public officer, and apprehending judgment, sought to secure his own creditor, who happened to be his brother, and, to do so, executed a mortgage which he had promised nearly two years before. An effort is made to cast doubt upon the letters which were produced in evidence to prove that J. G. Thorpe had promised this security in 1874, but we are unable to perceive any force in the objection, even if the evidence were much more important to the case. It only strengthens what could have stood without it. Such measures as were pursued by J. G. Thorpe amount merely to a preference. It is entirely settled that such preference is lawful; and while, practically, it may hinder or delay some of the creditors, it does not hinder, delay or defraud creditors in the sense in which those words are used in the statute. Maples v. Maples, Rice Eq. 300. And while a preference to secure a valid debt may, under some circumstances, be impeached, one of the essential grounds is that the preferred creditor has conspired with the debtor at the expense of the other creditors. Bird v. Aitken, Rice Eq. 73. We perceive no evidence of such fact in the preference now in question. There is no merit in the ground that because the creditor was a brother, and had shown kindness to the debtor in other matters, that the debtor may have made the preference with a view to his own ultimate benefit. Cureton v. Doby, 10 Rich. Eq. 411 [73 Am. Dec. 96]. The referee does not place his conclusion distinctly upon such ground; but that impression seems to have influenced his mind. It is not, however, the report of the referee which is before us on appeal, but the judgment of the court, which, in our opinion, is fully sustained by the evidence.

The other question to be decided is, whether the Court of *Common Pleas has jurisdiction to hear exceptions to the report of a referee of the whole issue. The appellant relies upon Section 296 of the code and Perry v. Sullivan Manufacturing Company, 6 S. C. 312. The case cited does not consider the question of jurisdiction, and we deem it unnecessary to enter into an inquiry as to the whole force and effect of Section 296 of the code. The Court of Common Pleas is clothed with equity jurisdiction. Const., Art. IV., § 16. And in all cases which come within that classification, the judge, in the exercise of his chancery powers, is obliged to determine, by his judgment or decree, all questions of fact as well as of law. There is no difference between the report of a referee in an equity case now and that of a master, commissioner or referee, under the former practice. The report comes up subject to exceptions, and stands for confirmation by the judge. It may be confirmed in whole or in part, or entirely rejected, and the judgment be entered up accordingly. The judge is not more bound by the finding of a referee in a chancery case than by the verdict of a jury, where feigned issues are sent over from the chancery side to the law side of the court. He is not bound by the finding of fact in either mode, but is merely aided in arriving at the conclusion on which his judgment must rest. The action cannot be determined except by a judgment of the court in the exercise of its equity power, and that judgment can only be rendered by a judge of that court. See Sloan v. Westfield, 11 S. C. 445; Charlotte, Columbia and Augusta Railroad Company v. Earle et al., 12 S. C. 53.

The judgment is affirmed. Motion refused.

Before Kershaw, J., at Spartanburg, March, 1878.

Thomas Farrow died, leaving a last will and testament. The only question arising thereunder is as to the construction of so much thereof as is stated in the opinion of this court. After the death of John W. Farrow, four of his children leaving issue surviving, and his wife, Emma, having died before him, but after the death of Thomas Farrow, Dr. Samuel Farrow being dead also, proceedings were had in the Court of Equity, instituted in 1862, for the partition of this property. Three children survived John W. Farrow, and they, together with the husband of one of them, filed this bill against D. B. Clayton et al., but who the others were nowhere appears. D. B. Clayton seems to have been the husband of one of the daughters who predeceased John W. Farrow. Nor does it appear whether the order for partition determined the interest of the parties to the cause. The court ordered a sale. L. M. Littlefield, the husband of Maria A. Littlefield, who was one of J. W. Farrow's surviving daughters, purchased some of the property sold and gave his bond to the commissioner in equity for the amount of his purchases. Some of the other purchasers having paid some money into court, the question arose as to its proper distribution.

F. M. Trimmier, Esq., clerk and referee, reported that Mrs. Maria A. Littlefield was entitled to a share of this money in court, and that the legal representatives of Mrs. Emma Farrow were also entitled to a share. The surviving children of John W. Farrow excepted to this report, upon the ground that the legal representatives of Emma Farrow were not entitled to a share; and the legal representatives of Emma Farrow excepted, upon the ground that Maria Littlefield's share should be applied to the debt due by her husband.

The Circuit decree is as follows:

This case was heard upon exceptions to report of referee.

It appears to me evident that Mrs. Emma

Farrow took no *transmissible interest in the estate. It was part of the trust that at the death of John W. Farrow, the property was to be divided between certain persons, Emma Farrow being one.

Before the time for the division arrived she had died. The division, under these circumstances, is to be made as if she had not been named in the will. The will conveyed personal property and real estate to the trustee, "in trust for the uses and purposes hereinafter mentioned." * * * "To be held by the said Samuel Farrow, in trust for the use and benefit of my son, John W. Farrow, during his life, and at his death to be equally divided between his wife, Emma Farrow, and the children he may leave living, share and share alike." The legal estate was in the trustee, to be transmitted from them at the termination of the life of John W. Farrow, by division among the ultimate objects of his bounty. At that time the trustee was to divide the property among the persons then entitled.

Emma Farrow not then being in esse, the trust could only be fulfilled by a division among the children of John W. Farrow then living.

The exception of John D. Farrow and Maria A. Littlefield is sustained; those of Mary Farrow and M. C. Farrow are overruled.

It is ordered that the report of the referee be recommitted, and that the same be made to conform to the principles of this decree.

From which decree the defendants, Mrs. Mary A. Farrow and M. C. Farrow, by their attorney, gave notice of appeal upon the following grounds, viz.:

1. Because his Honor the presiding judge erred in decreeing that Mrs. Emma Farrow "took no transmissible interest in the estate."

2. Because it is error in his Honor the presiding judge to decree in this case "the legal estate was in the trustee," and that at the death of John W. Farrow, the life tenant, the "trustee was to divide the property among the persons then entitled," and that "Emma Farrow not then being in esse, the trust could only be fulfilled by dividing the property among the children of John W. Farrow then living."

*3. Because it is error in his Honor the presiding judge to overrule the exceptions taken by Mrs. Mary A. Farrow and M. C. Farrow to referee's report in above-stated case.

August 4th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by HASKELL, A. J. Thomas Farrow, by will, devised "to Dr. Samuel Farrow, in trust for the use and purposes hereinafter mentioned," certain property, real and personal, "all of which is to be held by the said Samuel Farrow in trust for the use and benefit of my son, John W. Farrow, during his life, and at his death to be equally divided between his wife, Emma Farrow, and the children he may leave living, share and share alike." The wife, Emma Farrow, survived the testator, but predeceased her husband. Three children were alive at the death of John W. Farrow. The appellants are legal representatives of Mrs. Emma Farrow. It is held by the Circuit judge that Emma Farrow took in the property no transmissible interest; that the legal estate was in the trustee, and that it was part of the trust, that, at the death of John W. Farrow, the property should be divided among certain persons, of whom Emma

Farrow was *one, and that no interest could vest until the arrival of the time fixed for division.

We take a different view of the will. We think that the uses and purposes of the trust are confined to the lifetime of John W. Farrow, and are, first, to allow John W. to enjoy the property during his life, and, second, to protect the estate for the remaindermen. It is a well-recognized principle that "the legal estate, limited to the trustee, shall not be carried further than the complete execution of the trust necessarily requires." Lewin on Trusts *250. Thus, "if an estate be devised to A and his heirs, in trust, to pay the rents to B for his life, and, on his death, the testator devises the estate to C in fee, here the legal estate for the life of B is in the trustee, and the legal estate in the remainder is vested in C." Id. *250.

The only question is whether an estate in remainder vested in Emma Farrow on the death of this testator, or was it contingent upon the event of her surviving John W. Farrow. Where the estate is in trust for one for life, "and at her death to the use of or in trust for some ascertained individual, and on an event that was certain, it would certainly be a vested remainder." Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq. 481. The rule, as thus expressed, applies strictly to the case before us, even upon the assumption that grammatical construction would permit the expression of trust to extend beyond the lifetime of John. It seems to be thought, however, that the division of the property, after the death of John, is a part of the trust. The language does not sustain such a view; but if it did, then the testator has himself done the work by saying "to be equally divided," and has thus left nothing for the trustee to do. The same language occurs in the case of Wilson v. McJunkin, 11 Rich. Eq. 527, but there it was not even contended the words "at her death to be equally divided" made the remainder contingent; the point was made, but upon different grounds. The devise was of real and personal property, in trust for the use of N., "for and during the term of her natural life, and at her death, to be equally divided amongst her children in fee simple." It was held that the estate vested in remainder in each child of N., whether living at the death of N. or not. The reasoning applies fully to the case be*fore us. Emma Farrow was a person in being, and ascertained at the time the limitation was made, and the event was certain. The interest, therefore, vested in her, dependent as to its quantity upon the number of children John might leave living at the time of his death. It is thus stated upon the assumption that the division is to be made per capita, as that is all for which the appellants contend. The interest thus vested is transmissible, and passes to the representatives of Emma Farrow.

The other appeal is not well taken. The marital right of the husband does not attach to the undivided interest coming to his wife. It must have come into possession. Verdier v. Hyrne, 4 Strob. 464. The note held against the husband for the purchase of part of the property sold under order of the court, cannot, therefore, be set off against the claim held by the wife. Roberts v. Adams, 2 S. C. 337.

The case is remanded for further proceedings in conformity with the views herein expressed.

Judgment modified.

*Before Thomson, J., at Aiken, April, 1878.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of the court, and in the dissenting opinion of Associate Justice McIver.

Mr. J. P. Carroll, for appellant.

Mr. D. S. Henderson, for respondent.

September 18th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The action is in the nature of indebitatus assumpsit, for wrongful misconduct of the defendant, as the agent of the plaintiffs, in giving credit for freight on goods delivered to certain parties, in the place of demanding payment upon said delivery, as by the contract and duty of defendant as such agent, he was bound to do, and seeking to charge such amount against the defendant. The answer alleges that, at the time of the delivery of said goods, without demanding freight thereon, the plaintiffs were indebted to the parties to whom the goods were so delivered, in an amount exceeding the amount of freight due.

The cause was referred by consent, and judgment was given for the plaintiffs. Certain exceptions to the rulings of the referee, that have been passed upon and overruled by the Circuit Court, are brought up by the present appeal.

The defendant moved for a nonsuit, on the ground of a variance between the pleadings and the proofs. The facts out of which such exception arises are that, on the trial, the plaintiff offered in proof a bond, executed by the defendant with sureties, prior to the transactions stated in the complaint, conditioned for the due observance of the duties of his office as such agent, and stating the character of such duties. No objection appears to have been made to such proof on the part of the defendant, and it must be regarded as primarily the proof of the terms of contract between the parties relative to the matters alleged in the complaint.

Whether the defendant could have, by his objection, excluded *the bond, or put the plaintiff to demanding an amendment of his complaint before introducing such proof, need not be considered, as no such objection appears to have been made. Having failed to object to the introduction in evidence of the bond, all objection on the ground of variance between the pleadings and proofs in that respect was waived, and that question could not be opened upon a motion for nonsuit. The only ground for a nonsuit was that the bond did not set forth an agreement sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or that a breach thereof could not be legally inferred from the evidence; but no such ground of motion appears to have been presented to the referee. The defendant not having objected to the evidence, it was the duty of the referee to proceed with the hearing. S. P. Manufacturing Company v. Thew, 5 S. C. 10.

Another objection is, that the referree permitted the plaintiff to amend by setting forth the bond in his complaint. It is not distinctly stated, but must be inferred, that this amendment was made after the hearing before the referee for the purpose of conforming the pleadings to the facts proved. Such an amendment is allowed by Section 196 of the code, and is designed to meet the case of a variance between the pleadings and the proofs as a means of exhibiting on the record the issues actually tried, when there has been a departure of the proofs from the original pleadings.

There was no error in allowing such amendment, nor was it necessary that such amendment should be made in order to enable plaintiffs to obtain judgment.

The appeal should be dismissed.

HASKELL, A. J., concurred.

McIVER, A. J. Being unable to concur in the conclusion reached by a majority of the court in this case, it is but proper that I should indicate the grounds of my dissent. To do this intelligibly, it will be necessary to make a brief statement showing the nature of the case, and the facts developed on the trial as gathered from the record presented here.

The cause of action, as stated in the original complaint, was the alleged breach of parol contract entered into in April, 1873, *whereby the defendant was appointed the agent of the plaintiff, at Bath, by one of the terms of which the defendant undertook and promised not to deliver any goods or articles brought to that place by plaintiffs until the freight due thereon was paid; and the breach alleged was that defendant, "at divers times and on divers occasions before the 19th day of October, 1875," did deliver such goods and articles to a certain consignee without requiring the freight to be paid, and that the defendant has never accounted to plaintiff for such freight. The issues in the actions were referred to a referee for trial. It would seem, though the facts are very meagerly stated in the brief, that the plaintiff put in evidence, without objection from defendant, the bond of defendant set out in the brief, which seems to be a bond for the faithful performance of the duties of the office of agent.

This bond bears date July 1st, 1873, and was signed by two other persons as sureties, and it does not contain any provision binding the obligors to make good any defaults committed prior to its date.

Whether any other evidence, and if so, what, was offered does not appear. The defendant moved for a non-suit, upon the ground that the only contract proven was that evidenced by the bond, and as that was not alleged in the complaint the action should be dismissed. The motion was overruled by the referee, upon the ground that under the provisions of the code "the pleadings can be amended so as to conform to the facts as proven," and his ruling as sustained by the Circuit judge. It would seem, however, that the referee did not then grant an order that the complaint should be then amended and the defendant allowed an opportunity to answer such amended complaint, but that he then proceeded to render his decision, in which he says "the pleadings may be so amended as to conform to the proof." Accordingly, after exceptions to the report had been filed, the plaintiff's attorney served upon the defendant's attorney a notice that he would, "at the hearing of this cause, upon the exceptions filed, present to the Court of Common Pleas of this county the amended complaint herewith annexed, as in compliance with the requirement of said report in regard to the variance between the pleadings and proof herein."

*The report of the referee was filed January 4th, 1878, but at what particular time the exceptions thereto were filed does not appear; manifestly, however, from the terms of the notice above quoted, before the notice of the amended complaint was served, which was on February 2d, 1878. The amended complaint alleges the bond as the cause of action.

From this statement it is clear that two separate and distinct contracts were set up against the defendant—one a parol contract, embracing the period between April and July 1st, 1873, upon which the defendant alone was liable, the other a contract by specialty, embracing the period after July 1st, 1873, upon which two other parties were liable, jointly and severally, with the defendant. To maintain the action on the first contract, which was the one alleged in the original complaint, it was necessary not only to prove such contract, but also to prove a breach of it during the time it was in force, between April and July 1st, 1873, and of this the bond certainly furnished no evidence whatever. In fact it only served to show that such a contract had been put an end to by merger. So that it is clear to my mind that there was an entire failure of proof, not only as to the contract sued upon but as to its breach.

It is said, however, that under the liberal provisions of the code, in regard to amendments, that the referee was justified in allowing the amendment. I am always disposed to give such a construction to the provisions of the code as will tend to simplify the pleadings in an action, but there certainly is a limit beyond which we should not go, and too great liberality, in this respect, will not only encourage careless and slovenly pleading, but will oftentimes defeat the ends of justice. To say that a party may bring his action upon one contract, and be allowed to recover upon another, which he has been permitted to prove without objection at the trial, is, in my judgment, a dangerous stretch of liberality. For aught that appears, in this very case, it may be that the defendant had one defence to the parol contract, commencing in April and ending July 1st, 1873, which was set out in the original complaint, and a totally different defence to the specialty contract commencing July 1st, 1873, which was proved by the bond offered in evidence. The fact that the bond was *received in evidence, without objection from defendant, cannot alter the case, for he might very well have thought that, though this evidence was irrelevant, and therefore, objectionable, its admission could do him no harm, as so far from proving the fact in issue—the parol contract—upon which the action was brought, it rather tended to show that such parol contract was limited to a very short period of time. As is said in Pom. on Rem., § 557, p. 603, upon the authority of Johnson v. Moses, 45 Cal. 515, in speaking of the rule upon this subject: "When the complaint sets forth a contract, and, on the trial, the plaintiff proved, without objection, a materially different one, and was, thereupon, non-suited, the non-suit was sustained; the court adding that the admission of the evidence, without objection, made no difference with the operation of the rule."

These two contracts are certainly materially different—one acts upon parol evidence, the other upon evidence, in writing, under seal; one embraces a particular period of time, the other embraces a different period; on the one the defendant is alone liable, while on the other he is jointly and severally liable with two other persons; and upon one the action, as the law then stood, would have been barred in six years, while on the other the statutory period was twenty years. It seems to me, therefore, that this was a case of entire failure of proof, and not a case of mere variance between the allegations and the proofs, and that under the rule, as stated by Pomeroy, §§ 553, 554, pp. 598-600, no amendment was allowable.

It was argued that there was really no need for an amendment, and that, in fact, the so-called amended complaint did not set out any different contract from that set out in the original complaint, and, therefore, the judgment below is not liable to any objection. Whether this be so may well be questioned, inasmuch as it is very certain that in the original complaint no mention whatever is made of the bond, and the only contract alluded to is that resting in parol, made when defendant was first appointed agent in April, 1873, while in the amended complaint the only contract mentioned is that evidenced by the bond made July 1st, 1873, and it is for the breach of that contract that damages are asked, as appears from the words "that not-with*standing his obligation and bond, as aforesaid, but in violation of the conditions of same," &c. But even were this so, and the amended complaint be regarded as based upon the parol contract alone, then there was no evidence of any such contract, the only evidence adduced upon that subject being the bond, which certainly did not prove the parol contract.

But even if the amendment were allowable, it does seem to me that the defendant should at least have been allowed the opportunity of answering the amended complaint, for, as I have heretofore suggested, it might be that his defence to the action on the contract, evidenced by the bond, was different from that to the action on the contract resting only in parol; whereas by the course pursued in this case the defendant who has been sued upon one contract has judgment rendered against him upon another contract, which, by amendment to the pleadings, has been inserted as the cause of action, which he has had no opportunity of answering. For, although the Circuit judge does say that to the amended complaint there is no answer, an expression well calculated to convey the impression that defendant had neglected to answer, yet, from what is above stated, it is very obvious that such was not his intention, for the defendant never had any opportunity of answering the amended complaint; or, at least, if he had answered, such answer could not have been considered, and, therefore, would have been of no avail, for no amendment was made until after the referee had filed his report finding judgment against the defendant, and after exceptions thereto had been filed, as is shown by the terms of the notice from the plaintiffs' attorney that he would, "at the hearing of this case, upon the exceptions filed, present to the Court of Common Pleas of this county the amended complaint hereto annexed," and at that stage of the case it is difficult to conceive of what avail an answer to the amended complaint would be, as the hearing then would necessarily be upon the exceptions to the report, and no new issues which might be raised by an answer to the amended complaint could have been considered.

I think, therefore, that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be set aside and a new trial ordered.

Appeal dismissed.

THE STATE v. LOUISA PITTS.

(April Term, 1879.)

[1. Criminal Law ⟸1069.]

The changes made by the code of procedure in the methods of appeal, do not affect criminal causes. In such cases there should be a report of the Circuit judge, unaccompanied by a statement of counsel, unless the agreement of counsel made in good faith is submitted as a substitute for such report. But query: Whether the solicitor, by his admissions, can so bind the state as to prevent this court from interfering in the interests of justice; and whether the report of the Circuit judge can be modified by agreement of counsel?

[2. Larceny ⟸40.]

Prior to 1868, a conviction could be had upon an indictment for larceny alleging the property to be in the husband, when the goods were the clothing of the wife.

[3. Husband and Wife ⟸116.]

Under the constitution of 1868, Article XIV., Section 8, a married woman may acquire separate property by gift from her husband, but the mere use and enjoyment by her of personal property purchased by the husband, does not establish her right to a separate estate therein.

[4. Larceny ⟸73.]

A prisoner should not be convicted of stealing goods which belonged to a married woman, under an indictment charging them to be the property of her husband; and when they were purchased by the husband and used by the wife, it is for the jury to say whether the wife had acquired a separate property therein.

Before Aldrich, J., at Laurens, February, 1879.

This was an indictment for grand larceny. The goods stolen were a silk dress and other articles of ladies' clothing, laid in the indictment as the property of John T. Duncan. The silk dress was bought by John T. Duncan for his first wife, who died in 1855; the other articles were purchased by him for his present wife. The goods were stolen July 21st, 1878. Verdict—guilty. Defendant appealed. Counsel for appellant prepared a statement of the case for the appeal court; the solicitor not accepting it, prepared his statement. The two were submitted to the Circuit judge, who adopted the solicitor's statement. Subsequently counsel signed the following paper:

We agree on the following statement, and consent that it [this case] be heard on this statement and brief filed:

*The defendant's attorney asked his Honor to charge as a matter of law, that prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1868, the paraphernalia of a married woman consisted of clothing and jewels, and in these she had a separate estate; that since the adoption of the present constitution, a married woman has a separate estate in her clothing and all other property, and the marital rights of her husband cannot attach; and if they believed the clothes stolen were the property of Mrs. John T. Duncan, the prisoner should be found not guilty. His Honor Judge Aldrich refused so to charge, and defendant's counsel excepted. His Honor sentenced the defendant in open court to one year's imprisonment in the penitentiary, and afterwards, through a clerical error, wrote it two on the indictment.

Messrs. Pope & Watts, for appellant.

Mr. B. W. Ball, solicitor, contra.

September 19th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. This case originally came up for hearing on a report from the Circuit judge. This report, as set forth on the record, was accompanied by conflicting statements of the proceedings, made by the respective counsel. A defect being found in the statement, permission was given to the counsel for the defendant to procure a further statement of the case. Finally a statement was produced, as part of the record in the cause, agreed to by the counsel for both parties. The proper mode of bringing up an appeal to this court on exceptions taken in a criminal case, is by a report of the Circuit judge.

Such was the practice before the adoption of the code, and that has made no change in the mode of procedure, in that respect, in criminal cases.

The provisions of Part II. of the code are expressly confined to "civil actions in the courts of this state" (Code, § 8), criminal proceedings being excluded from that class (§ 5.) The changes that have been made by the code in the method of appeal in civil causes are made in the second part of the code, and do not affect criminal causes.

*When a criminal case comes up on a report of the Circuit judge, it should not be accompanied by any statements of the counsel that are not intended by the Circuit judge to be embodied in and form part of his report. This, of course, does not apply to the grounds of appeal in that class of cases.

When counsel agree upon a statement of the case, as a substitute for a report of the Circuit judge, only those matters that are so agreed upon will be considered, and unless the good faith of such agreement is successfully impeached, the parties in the cause will be concluded by such statement.

We do not intend by this to imply that the solicitor for the state can, at his discretion, bind the state by his admissions, under all circumstances, so that the court cannot interfere in the interest of justice; but as no abuse of the authority of the solicitor appears in the present case, the authority of this court in exceptional cases need not be considered.

In the present case the appeal originally came up upon the report of the Circuit judge, and was sought to be amended by the agreed statement of counsel. We do not deem it necessary to raise any question as to the right of counsel in a criminal cause to modify, by an agreement between themselves, the case as reported by the judge—no such question having been suggested by counsel on either side. It appears to us that the report was defective, and as the case is a criminal case, and as it would lead to delay to require the statement of counsel to be submitted to the Circuit judge for his remarks, we do not feel bound to consider that question at the present time.

The indictment was for larceny of clothing, and the property therein was laid in John T. Duncan. The evidence tended to prove that part of the property alleged to have been stolen consisted of clothing of a deceased wife of Duncan, who died in 1855, and the residue of the clothing of his present wife.

It does not appear when Duncan was married to his present wife. The larceny was alleged to have occurred July 21st, 1878. The requests to charge, as stated in the agreed statement of counsel, contains three propositions. The first proposition is, "that prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1868, the paraphernalia of a married woman consisted of clothing and jewels, *and in this she had a separate estate." This proposition is immaterial, and no regard need be paid to the question whether it is strictly accurate.

There is no doubt that before the adoption of the present constitution a conviction could be had upon an indictment for larceny alleging the property in the goods to be in the husband, when the goods were the clothing of the wife. The question of the nature and extent of the wife's paraphernalia had no bearing on that question.

The second proposition is, "that since the adoption of the present constitution a married woman has a separate estate in her clothing and all other property, and the marital rights of her husband cannot attach." This proposition is inaccurate.

It is true that under the constitution she may have a separate estate in her clothing and all other property, and the marital rights of her husband cannot attach to such separate estate: but the question whether in point of fact she has such separate estate depends on whether such property was acquired in the manner prescribed by the constitution as the means requisite to create in her such separate estate.

Article XIV. of the constitution, Section 8, provides that "the real and personal property of a woman, held at the time of her marriage, or that which she may thereafter acquire, either by gift, grant, inheritance or otherwise, shall not be subject to levy and sale for her husband's debts, but shall be held as her separate property, and may be bequeathed, devised or alienated by her the same as if she were unmarried; provided that no gift or grant from the husband to the wife shall be detrimental to the just claims of his creditors." It is clear that a wife can acquire, as her separate estate, real and personal property by gift or grant from her husband, for, in the first place, her power to acquire is in terms unlimited as to the person from whom she may so acquire, and in the second place the proviso necessarily implies that such acquisition may be directly from her husband. It must therefore appear, either by proof or a proper presumption, that either expressly or by implication such an act of acquisition has occurred. Such an act implies the transfer to the wife of real or personal property, with the intention that title *thereto should pass to and vest in her, in order that the character of a separate estate should be imposed upon it as intended by the constitution.

The second proposition is defective in assuming, as matter of law, that the mere fact that a wife is in the use and enjoyment of clothing or other personal property is sufficient to establish her right to a separate estate therein.

The third proposition is to the effect that "if the jury believed the clothes were the property of Mrs. John T. Duncan, the prisoner should be found not guilty." This proposition was improperly refused. The fact that Mr. and Mrs. Duncan bore towards each other the relation of husband and wife may have been calculated to raise a presumption that he had such a possession of the articles alleged to have been stolen as to warrant the allegation made in the indictment, yet that would give rise to a question of fact which the judge could not decide.

It was for the jury to determine what was the fact, under proper instructions, as to the rule of presumption in such cases.

There was therefore error in the refusal to charge the third proposition embraced in the requests to charge in behalf of the prisoner.

As there should be a new trial it is unimportant to examine the effect of a discrepancy between the terms of the sentence pronounced in open court and that recorded.

There should be a new trial.

New trial granted.

[This case is also cited in Stackhouse v. Wheeler, 17 S. C. 95, as to facts.]

Before Townsend, J., at Marion, July, 1877.

This was an action instituted by M. S. McIntyre (formerly McClenaghan), the widow of John C. McClenaghan and executrix of his will, for a settlement of his estate. John C. McClenaghan, during his lifetime, was an attorney-at-law, and a member of the law firm of McClenaghan & Fairlee. Under the assignment of Dillon & Russ, Caldwell & Robinson were preferred creditors. The fifty-dollar note mentioned in the decree was made by J. C. McClenaghan on June 7th, 1858, payable on January 1st, 1859, to "E. T. Stackhouse, assignee of J. W. Dillon."

The other matters are fully stated in Judge Townsend's decree, which is as follows:

This is a proceeding to marshal the assets of the estate of *John C. McClenaghan, deceased. In compliance with an order of the court directing creditors to establish their claims, E. T. Stackhouse and Robinson & Caldwell appeared before W. W. Harllee, Esq., special referee, for this purpose.

The referee heard testimony relating to the claims, and has submitted a report, in which judgment against the creditors is recommended. To this report the creditors, Stackhouse and Caldwell & Robinson, file exceptions. These suggest the questions for the consideration of the court. It appears that the testator, McClenaghan, was an agent appointed by the creditors of Dillon and Dillon & Russ, who had made an assignment for the benefit of creditors.

E. T. Stackhouse and one McCormick were appointed assignees under the assignment. Certain funds came into the hands of McClenaghan, as the agent, and E. T. Stackhouse, as assignee and the owner of all the claims of the creditors of Dillon and Dillon & Russ, by purchase and compromise, except those of Robinson & Caldwell, presents this claim for the amount now claimed to be in the hands of the executrix. The plea of the statute of limitations was interposed as a bar to the recovery, and this has been sustained by the referee. It is contended by the creditors presenting the claims, that McClenaghan, as agent, was a trustee, and that his trusts were continuing, technical trusts, only cognizable in equity, and the statute is not applicable. This is the main question in the case.

Was McClenaghan, as agent, a trustee? He was appointed under the provisions of the act of 1828. The first section of the act provides that creditors may name and appoint an agent or agents to act in their behalf, jointly with the assignee or assignees appointed by the assignor. In the second section, the assignees are required to call the creditors together and have the agent or agents appointed by them, and in the meantime are inhibited from making any sales or transfers of the assigned property; and in case of their refusal or neglect to do so within the time prescribed, the agent or agents are authorized, under the order of the court, to take possession of and sell the assigned property. The third section gives equal power and authority to the agent or agents with the assignees, to sell and dispose of the *property assigned, and to distribute and pay the proceeds according to the intent and provisions of the deed of assignment. The remaining sections prescribe the duties of the assignees and agents. What is the purpose of the appointment of the agents under the act? This question is answered in the case of Miller v. Sligh, 10 Rich. Eq. 251, by the Chancellor delivering the opinion of the court.

There is no controversy as to whether an assignee is a trustee, and his trusts of such a continuing technical character as is alone cognizable in equity, and not subject to the operation of the statute of limitations. This fiduciary character is impressed upon him by the law in analogy to that relation created by the third section of the act of 1759, declaring that the persons to whom assignments are made by an insolvent debtor shall be trustees for all and singular the creditors. Cannot the same fiduciary relation be created by analogy in the case of the agents appointed by the creditors under the act of 1828? The act of 1759 relates to assignments made by insolvent debtors, while that of 1828 refers to those made by unfortunate debtors not in custody. These acts constitute parts of a system of legislation adopted for the relief of debtors. They should be construed in pari materia, as authorized by writers in laying down rules for construction, if the acts are to be considered together. Why, then, by the same analogy, should not the agents by law be held and declared to be trustees equally with the assignees?

In the case of Miller v. Sligh, before cited, the court says that the "general tenor of the statute is to create a joint authority of agents and assignees over the subjects of their trusts." The inference plainly deducible from the decision in this case is, that the agents were regarded as trustees as well as the assignees, and all would have been held liable alike, if joint dereliction of duty had been established. The act of 1828 provides that the agents shall have all the powers of the assignees in certain contingencies. If they are thus invested by law, they certainly partake of the fiduciary character of a trustee, because the assignee is declared to be such. The mere assumption of their powers cannot make them trustees; and it would seem that it was intended by the act that they should become trustees eo instanti on their appoint*ment by the creditors. So that they would be trustees when authorized by the court to act as assignees.

The whole duty of the assignees is to collect the debts due, sell the assigned property, distribute and pay it out, make reports, and pay over any residue to the debtor. In all these acts the agents are required and permitted to participate. They are authorized to receive moneys, hold them as the custodians of the creditors, and to exercise equal power with the assignees. There is no reason, then, why the agents as well as the assignees should not be declared and held to be trustees. It frequently happens that the agents are the active managers of an assigned estate. To make them trustees for the creditors is equally as important and necessary as to constitute the assignees such. The purpose of the act in providing for the appointment of the agents was to give the creditors a voice in the management of the assigned property. The debtor appoints the assignees, and the creditors the agents, and they act jointly and have equal powers; and I can conceive of no valid reason why the one should be declared trustees and the other not.

But the referee bases his judgment on this question on the decision in the case of Salas v. Cay, Mortimer & Co., 12 Rich. L. 558. The doctrine it announces is that "where there is an assignment for the benefit of creditors, the assignee should sue alone for the recovery of the assets; the agent should not be joined with him in the action." The reason of this rule is briefly stated in the case to be that "the assignment conveys the assignor's interest to the assignee. The appointment of the agent is subsequent; he is merely appointed as a sort of custodian for the creditors." But notwithstanding the legal title to the property is in the assignees, yet the statute confers a power upon the agents, and is full of provisions directing them to act jointly with the assignees in selling the property and distributing the proceeds; and actually provides, in certain contingencies, that the agents shall act as assignees, and translates title to them. Everything else can be done by the agents, except to bring action; and the subsequent appointment of them necessarily is the reason of this. I do not regard the want of power in the agents to join with the assignees in bringing actions as conclu*sive of the question whether they are trustees or not. The referee says the right to receive on the part of the agent depends upon the right to sue. The statute confers the right to receive after the action is brought by the assignees. Without this authority, the position of the referee might be maintainable.

The referee further says that it is as to the sale and disposition of the property assigned that the agents are empowered to act with the assignees. In the case of Miller v. Sligh, the court says the statute empowers the agents not only to sell the property, but to act jointly with the assignees in distributing its proceeds. It would seem also that they could act jointly in distributing the proceeds arising from an action brought by the assignees. It is further ruled by the referee that the assignees and agents are required to make deposits in a certain bank. The statute directs that it can only be drawn out by them jointly; thus giving to the agents authority equal with that of the assignees over all funds collected, no matter from what source or in what way. It is also stated by the referee that the choses in action belonging to the assigned estate were lodged with McClenaghan as attorney, except those turned over by the retiring assignee, McCormick. It appears that such was the case; but after suits brought and judgments obtained, he realized the money and took possession of it as agent, as indicated by his report made to the creditors in 1860. He exercised the power here of collecting moneys in judgments obtained in the name of the assignee; and these are now the subject of controversy. The referee holds, under all the circumstances, that the testator does not occupy the position of one in whom was vested a technical continual trust, only enjoyable in equity, and that Stackhouse had the right, at any time, to bring action against him; especially after 1862, when all the rights of the creditors of the assigned estate vested in him by virtue of assignments made. There is a controversy as to whether Stackhouse is the assignee of all the claims. It appears that he is not of those of Robinson & Caldwell. The referee, however, concludes that these claims are paid by operation of law, or in some way, by reason of their being preferred, and money sufficient for their payment being in the hands of the assignee. Suppose Stackhouse were the assignee *of all the claims of creditors, he stands in their shoes, and sustains the double character of assignee under the deed and creditor. As the trustee, he has the right to recover from the agent, if there are funds of the assigned estate in his hands. This is the character in which he presents his claim.

I feel constrained, though with hesitation, to differ in judgment with the referee, and conclude, as matter of law, that J. C. McClenaghan, the testator, was a trustee, and that his trusts were technical continuing trusts, such as are cognizable only in equity, and not barred in four years by the statute of limitations. If it was a technical trust as to the claims between these parties and McClenaghan, it was not within the statute of limitations. But "if the trustee does an act which imports to be a termination of the trust; if he has a settlement which is intended to be in full; if he settles as to part, and claims the residue in his own right; if he denies the trust in the presence of the cestui que trust, these acts, or any of them, will so far disturb and dissolve the strictly fiduciary relation between the trustee and the cestui que trust, as that the statute of limitations will commence to run from the date of such acts. This doctrine is fully supported by authority." Long v. Cason, 4 Rich. Eq. 63, Colburn v. Holland, 14 Rich. Eq. 213.

Was any act done by McClenaghan in his lifetime which imported to be a termination of the trust? The testimony does not disclose any such. He had no settlement which was declared or intended to be in full. He never openly denied his trust character or openly asserted an adverse holding. In 1860, when he made his report, acknowledging the possession of trust funds, he admitted the rights of the cestui que trust. From the testimony, I can discover no act or declaration on his part, while living, that indicated a purpose, on his part, to discharge or throw off his trust, so as to free him from accountability under it for the money in his hands. So long as he lived, the relation of trustee and cestui que trust existed, and the trust was not within the statute of limitations.

Was the trust executed at any time during the life of the trustee? In 1860 the assignee and agents were required by the creditors to submit a report showing the funds in hand belonging *to the assigned estate. A distribution of them among the creditors was contemplated. This was prevented by a threatened suit from some of the creditors who had not accepted under the assignment. This state of things caused the creditors to direct the assignee and agents to loan out the funds pending the litigation. No settlement was then made, and none ever has been since. The creditors are still unpaid, and there has been no final accounting under the deed of assignment. The trust was not executed by the agent in turning over the fund to the assignee, or by its payment to creditors entitled to receive it. The trusts under the deed are not yet executed. So that, in this view of the case, the statute has not yet had any currency as against the assignee or the agents. But the referee says that E. T. Stackhouse purchased all the claims against the assigned estate, and from that period, which is fixed as 1862, the statute commenced to run, because Stackhouse had the right to maintain action against the agent. As a fact, Stackhouse did not buy all the claims. Those of Caldwell & Robinson were not assigned to him. Let it be assumed that he did. Thus he became the creditor or assignee of all these claims, and was substituted in the stead of the original cestui que trust, and enjoyed all the rights they did as against the agents. He sustained the double character of assignee and cestui que trust so far as the agents were concerned. If the original cestui que trust could not be barred by the statute of limitations, clearly Stackhouse, standing in their shoes, could not be, after his purchase in 1862. These purchases by Stackhouse did not end the trust. The agent did not turn over the funds in his hands so as to end his trust. He still held them, and so far as Stackhouse and the other creditors were concerned, he continued to occupy the position of a trustee. The death of McClenaghan, in 1863, could not terminate the trust. The fund in his hands passed into the possession of his executrix, who was his sole legatee and devisee likewise.

From books and papers of her testator, she must have been cognizant of the existence of the trust. In 1869 she had express notice of it when the claim for the fund was formally preferred. The will provides for the payment of all the debts of the testator, and this claim for trust funds, was to be also discharged. The *trust then continued to exist after his death, and his executrix was accountable for the funds equally with the testator as trustee. [Parks v. Noble] 9 Rich. Eq. 85.

As the testator, J. C. McClenaghan, by virtue of his agency under the deed of assignment, was a trustee, and his technical trusts have never been ended by any act of his, by an execution of them, or in any other way, I conclude that the claims of E. T. Stackhouse, as creditor, have not been barred by the statute of limitations. Nor have the claims of Robinson & Caldwell. I concur in judgment with the referee, that the note of fifty dollars is nothing more than a simple money demand; but is it barred by the statute?

But let it be assumed that McClenaghan was not a trustee, whose trust was technical and continuing as agent for the creditors, are not these creditors still entitled to a recovery of their claims? He held the funds as agent, as evidenced by his own admission. The claims were collected, the proceeds reported or had by him as agent, and the relation of attorney and client after this act no longer existed. If he held the funds as agent for the creditors, there was an implied trust created by operation of law, and the statute would not begin to run until after demand. This doctrine is announced in the case of Lever v. Lever, 1 Hill Eq. 67. In such cases there is no live act until a failure to pay on demand, and hence until then the statute has no currency. In the case of Salus v. Cay, Mortimer & Co., the court held that the agents are the custodians for the creditors. If so, McClenaghan was a bailee holding funds for others, and until demand made no cause of action occurred and the statute did not run. There was no demand made upon him in his lifetime. But the referee holds that the rule depends upon the continuance of the relation, and necessarily ceases when such relation is dissolved; the relation of principal and agent and attorney and client is dissolved by the death of one of the parties, because the confidence reposed is personal and the substratum of the relation is gone. The rule might be different as to the bailor and bailee, under some circumstances. Where the relation of principal and agent is dissolved by the death of either party, the trust may continue and be capable of execution by the representatives of the deceased *party. Authority may be confirmed by will or otherwise for this purpose. The executrix of McClenaghan is directed by the will to pay all his debts. This fund went into her possession with other property with her knowledge. With the authority conferred under the will she continued to hold it as trust funds, and to act in the stead of the testator in the further execution of the trust. It would seem, then, that demand upon her was necessary to give currency to the statute of limitations. None was ever made upon her until 1863. From that period the four years necessary have not elapsed so as to furnish a bar to the recovery of the funds. But suppose the relation, whatever it was, subsisting between McClenaghan and the creditors, was dissolved by his death, even then the statutory period has not elapsed. The agent died in 1863. At that time the statute of limitations in this state was suspended, and continued to be until December 21st, 1866. The complaint in this case was filed on May 6th, 1871. The executrix was protected from suit for nine months after December 21st, 1866. From the period at which the statute commenced to run in 1867 to the time of filing the complaint, was not four years, and therefore the creditors are not barred by the statute of limitations. The referee says the stay law has been declared unconstitutional as to debts existing antecedently to its enactment, and there was no suspension of the statute as to the claims of these creditors. It might be a question whether the debt in this case did not arise, or at least the cause of action accrue, after the first act in 1861. But the discussion of this question is unnecessary. In this state the suspension of the statute is not considered an impairment of a contract. And in regard to these claims it can be held that the statute was suspended.

Objection was urged against the form in which the claims of Stackhouse were presented. Two accounts have been filed—one against McClenaghan & Fairlee; and the other against J. C. McClenaghan as agent. These are not proof of the facts of the case. It appears that McClenaghan, by his own admission, held the funds as agent, either as an express trustee or implied as bailor, and not as an attorney. These claims, therefore, are presented against him as agent, and it is for the court to determine *in any view of the case, whether his estate is now liable for the funds received by him. If the estate is liable to account for the funds so received by him, there can be no doubt of the right of E. T. Stackhouse to recover. He occupies the position of a creditor by reason of the assignments made to him. As he compromised the claims, he is entitled to be reimbursed out of the funds to the extent of what he actually paid and interest. Farrar v. Farley, 3 S. C. 11. If he recovers more money from the estate than he is entitled to receive, his trusts have not yet been executed, and he can be called to an account under the deed of assignment by any other creditors or the debtor. His trust still continues. He is now the proper custodian of this fund, if it is recoverable from the estate of McClenaghan. The executrix has no right to hold it, or to question the right of Stackhouse, as assignee and creditor to receive it.

The claims of Robinson & Caldwell have not been extinguished in the way indicated by the referee in his report. They are entitled to recover out of the estate of J. C. McClenaghan the amount of principal and interest due them. E. T. Stackhouse will be entitled to judgment for the balance found to be in the hands of the executrix or of the court, after the payment of the claims of Robinson & Caldwell, exclusive of the $50 note, which is not barred by the statute of limitations.

The view the court takes of the character that McClenaghan and his executrix sustained as express trustees, justifies the conclusion that interest on the fund is recoverable. As there seems to be some doubt about the true amount of trust funds held by John C. McClenaghan, it is deemed advisable to refer this question again to the referee to ascertain what it is, including interest. When this is done and commissions are allowed, the claims of Robinson & Caldwell will first be deducted from this amount, and E. T. Stackhouse will be entitled to a judgment for the residue.

It is adjudged and ordered, That the exceptions to the referee's report, in so far as they have been considered in this decree, be sustained, and that E. T. Stackhouse and Robinson & Caldwell are entitled to judgment against the executrix of J. C. McClena-*ghan, deceased, for the amounts respectively, to be ascertained in the manner herein indicated.

It is further ordered, That the special referee do hear further testimony with a view of ascertaining the true amount of the trust fund, including interest now in the possession and custody of the executrix of John C. McClenaghan, deceased; and that he allow judgments in favor of E. T. Stackhouse and Robinson & Caldwell against her for the amounts to which they are respectively entitled, according to the directions heretofore given.

It is further adjudged and ordered, That the plea of the statute of limitations, as to the $50 note held by E. T. Stackhouse, be sustained.

The plaintiffs appealed upon the following grounds, assigned as errors:

1. In that the judge held that John C. McClenaghan, as agent of the creditors of J. W. Dillon and of Dillon & Russ, was a trustee, and that his trusts were technical continuing trusts, such as were only cognizable in a Court of Equity and not subject to the bar of the statute of limitations.

2. In that the judge held that E. T. Stackhouse, one of the assignees of J. W. Dillon and of Dillon & Russ, by the purchase of the claims of creditors of said assignor, "stood in the shoes of the creditors," and was protected from the operation of the statute of limitations to the same extent they would be had they not sold their claims.

3. In that the judge held that the claims of Caldwell & Robinson were subsisting claims, though the evidence showed that E. T. Stackhouse, in April, 1860, had in hand an amount of money, which was, by the terms of assignment, applicable to their payment, and which was more than sufficient for that purpose, and though Caldwell & Robinson did not prove their claims before the referee.

4. In that the judge held that the claims of Caldwell & Robinson were still subsisting claims, when the evidence showed that one of them had been paid by the notes of J. W. and E. R. Bethea, and the balance of the same had been paid by J. W. Dillon on the —— day of ———, A. D. 1868; and that the other claim had been partly paid by E. T. Stackhouse, and that *he had relieved D. W. Bethea, one of the joint makers, from all liability for the balance due on same.

5. In that the judge held that there was any amount due by J. C. McClenaghan, or his estate, to the assigned estate of J. W. Dillon and of Dillon & Russ, there having been no settlement or accounting between the assignee and the agents of creditors, as it is submitted should have been done, before the claims could be properly proved in this cause.

6. In that the judge held that the claims now set up by E. T. Stackhouse, against the estate of John C. McClenaghan, for money received by him as agent of creditors, could be sustained, though in November, 1871, he proved the same claims against McClenaghan & Fairlee, as attorneys-at-law.

7. In that the judge held that the estate of J. C. McClenaghan is liable for interest before demand made for payment of principal.

8. In that the judge held that the death of J. C. McClenaghan, in March, 1863, did not give currency to the statute of limitations, supposing him to have been either a trustee and not entitled to its protection, or an agent and not entitled to its protection till after demand made.

9. In that the court held that if the statute of limitations ran, that E. T. Stackhouse, assignee, and the creditors, had four years and nine months after the 21st of December, 1866, within which to bring their suits.

10. In that the judge reversed the report of the special referee, which, it is respectfully submitted, was error.

September 24th, 1879. The opinion of the court was delivered by WILLARD, C. J. The principal question is whether the demands against the estate of McClenaghan, made by E. T. Stackhouse, are barred by the statute of limitations.

The facts out of which the question arises are that Stackhouse and McCormick were the assignees of Dillon, an insolvent *debtor, and McClenaghan and Sellers were appointed agents under the act regulating assignments of debtors (6 Stat. 365), and a committee in behalf of creditors was also appointed. McClenaghan was an attorney-at-law, and certain choses in action were placed in his hands for collection by the assignees, which do not appear to have been accounted for. The demands of all the creditors interested under the assignment, except those of Caldwell and Robinson, who were preferred, have been purchased, and are now held by Stackhouse. McClenaghan is dead, and his executrix is now called upon to account for so much of the assigned estate as came into the hands of her testator, as already stated. The statute of limitations is interposed as a defence to this demand.

It is contended, on the one hand, that McClenaghan was a trustee of an express trust, as it regarded all the assets of the assigned estate that came into his hands while acting as agent for the creditors, and that his executrix being charged with the execution of such trust to the extent of accounting for all such assets, she cannot take advantage of the bar of the statute; on the other hand, it is contended that the only demand against the estate of McClenaghan, existing under the circumstances already briefly stated, arises upon a simple contract obligation incident to the relation of attorney and client, existing between the assignees and McClenaghan as it regards the choses in action placed in his hands for collection, and, as such, is barred by lapse of four years after maturity.

It cannot be doubted that McClenaghan, as agent, was a trustee of a power under the deed of assignment to be exercised for the benefit of creditors. The statute must be regarded as a part of the assignment made under it, and all the powers and responsibilities conferred and imposed by the statute upon the agents appointed by creditors have the same efficacy as if expressly created by the deed of assignment. Assuming the view taken in Salas v. Cay, 12 Rich. 559, and Miller v. Sligh, 10 Rich. Eq. 247, to be conclusive, and it is clear that McClenaghan, by accepting the appointment of agent, became bound to an active participation in the disposition of the assigned estate. He was bound to inform himself of the condition of the assets and of the *indebtedness of the estate, and to protect and apply the assets. If it be conceded that the legal title to the assigned estate remained exclusively in the assignees, yet it is clear that the legal powers of the agents and the assignees are equal as it regarded the control of the assigned estate. This ample power of control over this disposition of the estate was placed in the hands of McClenaghan as a trust for the benefit of creditors, and equity regards the depositaries of such powers, whether coupled with the legal title or without it, as chargeable with responsibilities of the same nature, and of a strictly fiduciary character.

It remains, then, to consider, in the next place, what position an agent, under the act, occupies as it regards creditors, where, for any reasons, assets of the assigned estate, subject to distribution, come into his hands.

There can be no doubt that in such a case the agent is chargeable, in equity, as a trustee, with liability to account for such assets. If, as must be concluded, he is liable to account in the character of a trustee for the mode in which his powers as agent are exercised, it would follow that such an accounting would draw after it responsibility in the character of trustee for the assets in his hands. It matters not, under this view, from what source or by what authority the agent came into possession, for the nature of his powers and responsibilities are such that he could not acquire possession of such property by any means that would give less or different responsibilities than those imposed by the nature of his office. It is, therefore, unimportant to notice the circumstances under which McClenaghan became possessed of such estate, or by whom or for what immediate purpose they were placed in his hands, so far as it concerns the nature of his liability to creditors.

From the foregoing it must be concluded that McClenaghan was liable to the creditors, under the deed of assignment, to account, in equity, for the choses and their product in his hands at the time the demands of all those creditors, except Caldwell and Robinson, were assigned to Stackhouse. The right of Stackhouse to stand in the place of creditors, whose claims he purchased, is not questioned by any party entitled to question it, and must be deemed perfect.

*The representative of McClenaghan has no interest to contest it. Such being the case, no reason exists why Stackhouse should not have acquired all the right, legal and equitable, of his assignors, and, among others, the right to pursue the assets in the hands of McClenaghan as a trust. The fact that, as assignee, he had a more restricted right of procedure against McClenaghan, did not prevent his acquiring a more full remedy by succeeding to the rights of the creditors. Nor did the fact that Stackhouse united in himself the characters of assignee and of cestui que trust, having a beneficial interest as to part of the entire beneficial interest, have the effect to terminate the trust.

The claims of Caldwell and Robinson were entitled to participate in the execution of the trust, and the trust could not be considered as fully executed until those claims had been satisfied.

It must, therefore, be concluded that the trust is subsisting, and that Stackhouse, through it, is entitled to pursue the assets in question. This disposes of the question of the statute of limitations as affecting the claims for the assets that came into the hands of McClenaghan while acting as agent, and not fully accounted for. The conclusion of the Circuit Court, sustaining the statute of limitations as against the note of E. T. Stackhouse, falling due January 1st, 1859, is free from error.

The third and fourth grounds of exception to the decree are immaterial. The question of the liability of the estate of McClenaghan is the only one in which the plaintiffs are concerned. As to the disposition of those assets, under the assignment, the executrix of McClenaghan has no concern. The powers of the agency of McClenaghan ceased at his death, and the executrix has no further duty than to account for what was due from McClenaghan.

The fifth ground of exception is disposed of by what has already been said. Nor is the fact alleged in the sixth exception at all material. Had it appeared that the amount now claimed had been satisfied out of the estate of McClenaghan & Fairlee, that fact might be available, but it does not appear in the case.

It does not appear that the interest account of McClenaghan has yet been stated, nor, indeed, that the accounting is complete *as to the principal sum due, for a further hearing is ordered by the decree upon additional testimony.

As the decree does not fix the principles upon which the computation of interest should be made, it must be premature to consider that question at the present time.

The decree should be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Bills of the Bank of the State of South Carolina—a corporation created by the state, and of which it was the only stockholder—issued under the express authority of the state for its sole benefit, and to the payment of which the faith of the state was pledged, are "evidences of indebtedness" within the meaning of the provision in Section 10, Article IX., of the constitution, that "no scrip * * * shall be issued except for the redemption of stock, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness previously issued." And bonds issued in exchange for such bank bills do not create a new debt.

"An act to authorize a loan for the relief of the treasury," approved February 17th, 1869, which provides that money not exceeding a specified sum may be borrowed "for the relief of the treasury of the state," violates the constitutional limitation, Section 7, Article IX., that "for the purpose of defraying extraordinary expenditures, the state may contract public debts; but such debts shall be authorized by law for some single object, to be distinctly specified therein." (1.) In that it purports to create a debt which was not for the purpose of defraying extraordinary expenditures; and (2.) In that the debt is not authorized for some single object distinctly specified therein. And bonds resting upon the authority of that act, and all consolidation bonds issued in exchange for such bonds, are not valid debts of the state. Haskell, A. J., dissenting.

Before Court of Claims, May, 1879.

In the constitution adopted for South Carolina in 1868, under the authority of the acts of congress generally called the reconstruction acts, the following provisions occur:

*Article II., Section 14. * * * A majority of each house shall constitute a quorum to do business. * * *

Article II., Section 20. Every act or resolution having the force of law shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title.

Article II., Section 26. Each house shall keep a journal of its own proceedings, and cause the same to be published immediately after its adjournment, excepting such parts as, in its judgment, may require secrecy, &c.

Article IX., Section 3. The general assembly shall provide for an annual tax sufficient to defray the estimated expenses of the state for each year; and whenever it shall happen that such ordinary expenses of the state for any year shall exceed the income of the state for such year, the general assembly shall provide for levying a tax for the ensuing year sufficient, with other sources of income, to pay the deficiency of the preceding year, together with the estimated expenses of the ensuing year.

Section 4. No tax shall be levied except in pursuance of a law which shall distinctly state the object of the same; to which object such tax shall be applied.

Section 7. For the purpose of defraying extraordinary expenditures, the state may contract public debts; but such debts shall be authorized by law for some single object, to be distinctly specified therein; and no such law shall take effect until it shall have been passed by the vote of two-thirds of the members of each branch of the general assembly, to be recorded by yeas and nays on the journals of each house respectively; and every such law shall levy a tax annually, sufficient to pay the annual interest of such debt.

Section 10. No scrip, certificate, or other evidence of state indebtedness, shall be issued except for the redemption of stock, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness previously issued, or for such debts as are expressly authorized in this constitution.

Section 14. Any debt contracted by the state shall be by loan on state bonds of amounts not less than fifty dollars each, on interest payable within twenty years after the final passage of the law authorizing such debt. A correct registry of all such bonds shall be kept by the treasurer in numerical order, so as *always to exhibit the number and amount unpaid, and to whom severally made payable.

No question is made, in any of these cases, as to the validity of any of the bonds or stocks of the state issued prior to 1868; their validity is conceded.

The first act authorizing a public debt passed by the government instituted under this new constitution of 1868, was approved August 26th, 1868, and is entitled "An act to authorize a loan to redeem the obligations known as the Bills Receivable of the State of South Carolina." 14 Stat. at L. 17. It authorized the governor to borrow, on the credit of the State of South Carolina, on coupon bonds, within twelve months from the passage of this act, a sum not exceeding $500,000, or as much thereof as he may deem necessary to redeem the bills receivable of the State of South Carolina; and that an annual tax, in addition to all other taxes, shall be levied upon the property of the state, sufficient to pay the interest on the loan hereinbefore authorized, at the times when such interest shall fall due. These bills receivable were issued under the authority of an act of the legislature of December 21st, 1865, and were receivable for all taxes due the state. This act was passed in both houses, by a two-thirds vote of the members present in each, a quorum voting, but not by a two-thirds vote of the entire number of members qualified.

On the same day was passed another act, (14 Stat. 18), entitled "An act to authorize a state loan to pay interest on the public debt." It authorized the governor to borrow on the credit of the state, &c., "a sum not exceeding $1,000,000, or as much thereof as he may deem necessary to pay interest on the public debt;" and it contained the same provision as to the annual tax as the act to redeem bills receivable.

The next act in date was ratified September 15th, 1868, and is entitled "An act to close the operations of the Bank of the State of South Carolina." It provided, among other things, for the issue of bonds in payment and redemption of bills of the bank of the state, but made no provision for an annual tax levy. The character of these bank bills is sufficiently stated in the *opinion of the court. They have been repeatedly recognized as debts binding upon this state.

Next follows "An act to authorize a loan for the relief of the treasury," approved February 17th, 1869. 14 Stat. 182. It authorized the governor to borrow, within twelve months from its passage, a sum not exceeding $1,000,000, or as much thereof as may be deemed necessary, for the relief of the treasury of the state." The loan was to be effected by a deposit of the bonds herein authorized, as collateral security for loans by the financial agent of the state, in the city of New York, in accordance with the directions of the governor, attorney-general, comptroller-general and treasurer, or by the sale of said bonds at the highest market price, but not less than for a sum to be fixed by them. And an annual tax levy was provided in the same terms as in the act to redeem bills receivable.

The conversion act, entitled "An act to provide for the conversation of state securities," approved March 23d, 1869, (14 Stat. 241), simply authorized the issue of coupon bonds in exchange for outstanding state stock, and of state stock in exchange for outstanding coupon bonds. None of the special provisions required by the constitution in cases of the creation of a public debt, were complied with.

Next followed "An act to authorize the financial agent of the State of South Carolina, in the city of New York, to pledge state bonds as collateral security and for other purposes," approved March 26th, 1869. 14 Stat. 258. It authorized the financial agent of the state in New York, to pledge bonds of the state, then or hereafter in the possession of the state as collateral security for state loans; and the time within which the loans authorized under the act to redeem bills receivable, and under the act to pay interest on the public debt, might be negotiated, was extended twenty-four months from the passage of those acts.

"An act to provide for the appointment of a land commissioner, and to define his powers and duties," was approved March 27th, 1869. 14 Stat. 275. Section 5 provided: "The treasurer of the state is hereby authorized and directed to issue to the land commissioner bonds of this state in the sum of $200,000, with coupons attached, if, in the opinion of the said advisory board, so *much be necessary, bearing six per cent interest. * * * The faith and credit of the state is hereby pledged to the payment of the principal and interest of said bonds, and a sufficient amount of taxes is hereby levied to pay the interest accruing on said bonds annually." The manner in which the necessary record of yeas and nays on the passage of this bill by the house was made, is stated in the opinion of the court. A further issue of $500,000 in bonds was authorized under an amendatory act of March 1st, 1870, (14 Stat. 385), in the same terms as Section 5, above recited.

On December 18th, 1869, an act was passed authorizing interest on all outstanding bonds and stocks (except those issued in aid of the rebellion) to be paid in coin. 14 Stat. 303. On March 1st, 1870, an act entitled "An act to provide for a sinking fund and the management of the same," appointed certain officers a commission with power to sell any real or personal property of the state, not in actual use or held in trust, the proceeds to constitute a sinking fund, to be invested in the purchase of state securities. 14 Stat. 388.

Several objections were urged in the answers and proven, against the validity of several of the bonds issued under the authority of these acts of the legislature. No correct registry of these bonds, by number and amount, was kept by the state treasurer. The only registration made was that the financial agent of the state in New York had so many bonds, numbers, of which, in the gross, were accurately kept.

Loans were effected in New York upon a hypothecation of bonds of the several classes, very many of which were pledged after September 21st, 1871. These hypothecated bonds included bonds under all of the above-recited acts, and also bonds purchased under the sinking fund act, and bonds in which were invested the proceeds of the sale of agricultural land scrip, issued to the state by the United States government, in trust for an agricultural college.

In September, 1868, $1,000,000 in bonds were issued under the authority of the act of August 26th, 1868, and were designated upon their face as "loan to pay interest on the public debt." In the summer and fall of 1869 a second $1,000,000 in *bonds were issued under the authority of this same act, and were designated as "issued under act approved August 26th, 1868." R. K. Scott, governor of the state at that time, testified: "It was not my intention that more than $1,000,000 of these should be out, but the whole $2,000,000 did go out and did become a part of the public debt; $500,000 of them were returned, and I destroyed them in the presence of Mr. Parker, D. H. Chamberlain, Dr. Neagle and others; the $500,000 had been replaced by conversion bonds." It also appeared in evidence that $50,000 were subsequently destroyed.

It also appeared that the limits in amount fixed in the acts to pay interest on public debt, to redeem bills receivable, and for relief of the treasury, were larger than the outstanding demands provided for required. The first and second issue of bonds to pay interest on the public debt, amounted to $2,000,000, of which $550,000 being retired and canceled, left outstanding $1,450,000. Under the act to redeem bills receivable, $500,000 were issued. Under the act for the relief of the treasury, $1,000,000 in bonds were issued. Under the two land commission acts, $700,000 were issued. Under the conversion act, $5,965,000 were sold, or used as collateral security for loans, and not issued in exchange for surrendered securities. Other conversion bonds were properly issued in exchange for outstanding securities.

An act entitled "An act relating to the bonds of the State of South Carolina," generally called the validating act, was approved March 13th, 1872. 15 Stat. 278. It recited: "Whereas, bonds or obligations of this state have been issued from time to time to a large amount, in accordance, as was supposed by the officers issuing the same, with the authority and provisions of certain acts of the general assembly, including—[here followed an enumeration of all the above-recited acts;] which said bonds are fully and particularly stated and set forth in a report made by the treasurer of this state to the general assembly, dated October 31st, 1871; and whereas, doubts have arisen whether said issues were in strict conformity to the provisions of the said several acts under which they were respectively issued; and whereas, it was the true intent and meaning of the several acts *above set forth, that such issues of bonds or obligations should be made in the manner in which the same have been made, as aforesaid; and whereas, also, doubts have been raised as to the validity of some of the bonds mentioned in the said annual report of the state treasurer for the fiscal year ending with October 31st, 1871, although money has been borrowed by, or realized out of, said bonds, on account of this state; and whereas, the credit of this state has been affected thereby:

"Section 1. Be it enacted, &c., That the said bonds and obligations issued on behalf of this state, as mentioned and set forth in the report of the treasurer of this state to the general assembly, dated October 31st, 1871, were duly and lawfully issued, in conformity with the true intent and meaning of the several acts of the general assembly hereinbefore set forth by their respective titles.

"Sec. 2. That the acts of the officers of this state, authorized under the provisions of the laws of this state and of the several acts hereinbefore referred to, to the extent of all issues of bonds or obligations enumerated and set forth in the said report of the treasurer, be and are hereby in all things ratified, confirmed and established.

"Sec. 3. That each and all of the bonds named in said annual report, &c., be, and the same are hereby declared to be, legal and valid bonds of the State of South Carolina, for the payment of which the faith, credit and funds of the state have been and are hereby pledged; provided, that no bonds be included which are not registered in the treasury at the time of the passage of this act, as provided for by Section 14 of Article IX. of the constitution, relating to finance and taxation.

* * * * * * *

"Sec. 7. That neither the sum or sums realized from any sale or sales of any of the bonds of this state, nor the manner of sale of any of the bonds of this state, shall in any manner affect or impair the validity and obligation thereof."

The other sections of this act need not be copied here. The act was not passed by a two-thirds vote.

The report of the state treasurer, dated

October 31st, 1871, *referred to in the validating act, sets out the debt of the state under the above-recited acts as follows:

Under act of	August 26th, 1868.....	$ 500,000
"	August 26th, 1868....	1,250,000
"	September 15th, 1868..	1,189,400
"	February 17th, 1869..	899,000
"	March 23d, 1869.....	7,255,500
"	March 27th, 1869.....	200,000
"	March 1st, 1870.....	500,000

After the date of this report, and before the passage of the consolidation act below mentioned, several of these bonds were exchanged for conversion bonds under the act of March 23d, 1869.

The irregularities, illegalities and frauds connected with the issue of state bonds from 1868 down to the close of 1871, were fully set forth in a report made to the general assembly by a joint committee of the two houses in December, 1871.

The following additional article was duly ratified, and became a part of the constitution, on January 29th, 1873:

"Article XVI.—To the end that the public debt of South Carolina may not hereafter be increased without the due consideration and free consent of the people of the state, the general assembly is hereby forbidden to create any further debt or obligation, either by the loan of the credit of the state by guaranty, endorsement or otherwise, except for the ordinary and current business of the state, without first submitting the question as to the creation of any such new debt, guaranty, endorsement or loan of its credit to the people of this state at a general state election; and unless two-thirds of the qualified voters of this state, voting on the question, shall be in favor of a further debt, guaranty, endorsement or loan of its credit, none shall be created or made."

Such is the financial legislation of the state under the reconstruction government of the state down to the compromise measure of December 22d, 1873, generally called the consolidation act. It was as follows:

"An act to reduce the volume of the public debt and provide for the payment of the same.

*"Section 1. Be it enacted, &c., That the state treasurer is hereby authorized and required to receive from the holders willing to surrender the same—[here follows a statement of the amounts outstanding, with the date and title of the acts under which issued, which is omitted, so far as it recites the debt contracted prior to August, 1868, after which, reduced to figures, it continues]—the certificates of stock issued under act of March 23d, 1869, redeemable in 1888, amounting to $64,000; the bonds of the state issued under the act of August 26th, 1868, amounting to $1,197,000; the bonds issued under the act of August 26th, 1868, amounting to $484,000; the bonds issued under the act of September 15th, 1868, amounting to $1,189,600; the bonds issued under the act of February 17th, 1869, amounting to $856,000; the bonds issued under the act of March 27th, 1869, amounting to $124,000; the bonds issued under the act of March 1st, 1870, amounting to $343,000; the bonds issued under the act of March 23d, 1869, redeemable in 1888, for the purpose of exchange of any of the certificates of stock or bonds above enumerated, said fact being ascertainable from the treasurer's registry of bonds and stocks converted, amounting to $1,577,500; and shall thereupon, in exchange for and in lieu of said bonds and stocks so surrendered issue to said holders other coupon bonds or certificates of stock as they may desire, equal in amount to fifty per centum of the face value of the bonds or certificates of stock so surrendered, and that the bonds known as conversion bonds, amounting to $5,965,000, and which were put upon the market without any authority of law, be and the same are hereby declared to be absolutely null and void."

Section 2 provided for a like surrender of coupons, and the remaining sections of the act pledged the faith of the state to the payment of these consolidation bonds, declared that an annual levy of two mills should be made to pay the interest, which declaration should be considered as a part of the contract, and regulated the issue, registration, and so forth.

Soon after the passage of this act the consolidation of the existing debt of the state commenced, most of the creditors accepting its terms and receiving new or consolidation bonds in lieu of the securities surrendered by them to the state treasurer. *Many of the consolidation bonds questioned in these proceedings were issued in exchange for detached coupons, which it was alleged were not due by the state: (1) such as were detached from bonds which were never issued; (2) such as matured prior to the issue of the bonds to which they belonged; (3) such as matured at a time when the state treasurer's report showed that interest had been paid; (4) such as were cut off by the financial agent from bonds passing through his hands and fraudulently issued.

In April, 1877, the government of South Carolina passed under the control of a political party opposed to that which had controlled the state for the nine preceding years. The legislation which was had, looking to an investigation and determination of the bonded debt of the state, the organization of the special Court of Claims, with its powers and duties, and the submission by the state to its jurisdiction, and the character of these proceedings, are fully set out in the opinion of the court.

In March, 1878, the general assembly, on joint ballot, elected the Hon. A. P. Aldrich, judge of the second circuit, Hon. Thomas Thomson, judge of the eighth circuit, and Hon. J. H. Hudson, judge of the fourth circuit, members of the Court of Claims. At their first meeting Judge Aldrich was elected president of the court.

Hon. Henry Meetze, of Lexington, and Hon. Y. J. Pope, of Newberry, were elected by the general assembly associate counsel, who, together with the attorney-general, represented the state in the proceedings.

The judges of the Court of Claims filed each an opinion. Omitting such statements of facts as are above stated, and extracts from authorities, they are as follows:

THOMSON, J. Suits were brought in the above case and others on coupons of bonds consolidated under the act of assembly, A. D. 1873, alleging they were not paid according to their obligation.

Answers were filed in all the cases, containing numerous grounds of defence.

In a number of the cases, "the defences, however, were *nominal." The plaintiffs proved their ownership of the bonds and traced from the bonds their ownership of the "canceled bonds, coupons and certificates of stock" which had been in their possession or in those from whom they derived their right. In such cases judgments were given for the plaintiffs.

But defences were made to bonds by far the largest in number and amount, alleging they were obnoxious to one or more of the charges of illegality contained in the specifications of Schedule No. 6 of the bond commission's report.

The case above stated, and more, were issued upon coupons of bonds regarded as subject to the objections made by the bond commission, and trial was had of them as test cases.

The pleadings—testimony taken in New York—parol testimony and numerous documents, with arguments of counsel, were submitted to the court in said cases.

It may be proper to state briefly the legislation which established the Court of Claims and brought these cases before it. By a joint resolution, passed on March 21st, A. D. 1878, the legislature provided a mode of ascertaining the debt of the state, and of liquidating and settling the same. A. A. 1877, p. 669.

This joint resolution was, it seems, the result of a prolonged discussion in the legislature upon the report of a commission appointed to investigate the indebtedness of the state under a joint resolution approved June 8th, A. D. 1877. A. A. 1877, p. 318.

This commission was raised to make a complete and thorough investigation of certain matters, amongst them, "whether there is in the state treasurer's office on file, as vouchers, canceled bonds, coupons, and certificates of stocks of the issues described, issued in accordance with law and authorized to be consolidated by the act above recited to the amount required by said act, and with power to the commission, should it appear in the course of the investigation that any of said bonds, certificates of stock or coupons have been illegally or otherwise improperly issued, to report the same, together with the evidence upon which the illegality or non-conformity to law rests."

Acting under said authority, the commission made their report, and found that $5,184,062 of bonds were issued in accordance *with law, and authorized to be consolidated under the act of A. D. 1873.

They further reported there were vouchers remaining in the judgment of the commission not issued in accordance with law, and authorized to be consolidated, amounting to $3,608,717.

The controversy was in relation to the vouchers for $3,608,717, called in the joint resolution of June, A. D. 1877, "canceled bonds, coupons and certificates of stock;" whether these were issued in accordance with law, and authorized to be consolidated.

The vouchers—"canceled bonds, coupons and certificates of stock"—objected to in the report of the bond commission, are fully set forth therein. Schedule No. 6 appended to the report, describes with minuteness the securities issued as alleged not in accordance with law.

The question as to the validity of these vouchers was submitted to the Court of Claims, according to the resolution set forth below.

It is obvious that an important and primary inquiry is, what is the power of this court? or what is the duty required by the legislature at its hands?

The Court of Claims is special in character and possesses the powers of a Circuit Court only in relation to the subjects designated in the resolution and submitted to it. The powers of the court are defined by the enactments creating it, and outside of which it has no authority to act. These powers cannot be extended by implication, nor can the court assume constructive powers—"powers not literally given or necessarily consequent upon those so given." McKenzie v. Ramsay, 1 Bail. 457.

And inasmuch as the court exists only by legislative authority, reference must be had thereto to ascertain both the extent of power and the objects to be accomplished.

The resolution provides (first section) that said court shall "have jurisdiction to hear and determine any case or cases made up or brought to test the validity of any of the consolidated bonds, coupons and certificates of stock, or any of the various classes of them, mentioned in the said report of the bond commission as resting on vouchers not issued in accordance with law, and authorized to be consolidated by the act of the general *assembly, approved December 22d, 1873, entitled "An act to reduce the volume of the public debt, and provide for the payment of the same;" and also as not issued in accordance with law, and further designated in Schedule 6 of the said report."

That which is plain needs no interpretation. The validity of the consolidation bonds, coupons and certificates of stock, or any of them, as resting on vouchers not issued in accordance with law and authorized to be consolidated by the act of assembly of A. D. 1873, is to be tested.

At the close of the same section, as if to place the intent beyond doubt, are added the words: "And also as not issued [that is, the canceled bonds, coupons and certificates of stock] in accordance with law, and further designated and described in Schedule 6 of the said report," viz., the report of the bond commission.

Upon a reference to the report, 9th page, the following language is found: "The remaining $3,608,717 of these vouchers, in the judgment of the commission, were not issued in accordance with law and authorized to be consolidated by the act above recited." Then follows an enumeration of the evidences of public indebtedness, called by the bond commission "vouchers," applied to eleven classes of securities. Can there be a doubt that the vouchers referred to in the resolution are the securities called vouchers in the report?

With equal clearness the meaning of the legislature may be learned from Section 9 of the resolution, which declares that a case or cases are to be heard and determined in said court "to test the validity of the said consolidation bonds and coupons and certificates of stock mentioned in Schedule 6, bringing before the court the various classes of vouchers which, it is alleged in the report of the said commission, impair the validity of the said consolidated bonds, coupons and certificates of stock, or any of them."

What is the meaning in the largest sense which, according to the common use of language, is to be given to the sections of the said resolution? They ought not to be extended beyond their ordinary sense in order to comprehend a case within their object; for that would be to give effect to an intention not expressed. Broom Leg. Max. 276.

*When the jurisdiction is sharply defined and in so many words, what place can there be for the exercise of constructive powers? In regard to the grant of power here expressed, the rule that the express mention of one thing implies the exclusion of another, may fitly apply. Broom Leg. Max. 278.

In connection with the consolidated bonds, the only matters mentioned are the vouchers.

The question is not whether the consolidated bonds, coupons and certificates of stock are valid, but whether they are valid as issued in accordance with law, and authorized to be consolidated by the act of the general assembly, or as stated in the ninth section of the resolution, "to test the validity of the said consolidated bonds, coupons and certificates of stock, bringing before the court the various classes of vouchers which, it is alleged, impair the validity of the bonds, coupons and certificates of stock."

For the Court of Claims to hold that the act of A. D. 1873 is conclusive, by compromise or otherwise, of the validity of the bonds, coupons and certificates of stock, because the securities to be consolidated are enumerated in the first section of the act, is an end of the case.

Such a question could be made before a court of general jurisdiction. This question is not submitted by the resolution to the Court of Claims, nor does it touch the point presented by the first and ninth sections. The plain intention of the resolution is to ascertain if the various public securities set forth in the first section of the act of A. D. 1873, called vouchers in the report of the bond commission, were issued in accordance with law, and authorized to be consolidated by the act. If so, then the consolidated bonds and certificates of stock, taken in exchange for the vouchers and resting on them, were to be held and adjudged valid debts. If these vouchers were adjudged not issued in accordance with law, then the bonds and certificates of stock resting on them were to be so held in view of the resolution, and were not authorized to be consolidated—despite their consolidation by the act of A. D. 1873.

By the resolution of June 8th, 1877, the bond commission is directed to make a complete investigation. First. Of the entire amount of consolidated bonds issued under the act of A. D. 1873, *with particulars thereof. Second. Whether there is in the state treasurer's office, on file as vouchers, "canceled bonds, coupons and certificates of stocks of the issues described, issued in accordance with law, and authorized to be consolidated by the act above recited, to the amount required by the said act," A. D. 1877, p. 319.

Two inquiries are, by the second paragraph of Section 2, imposed upon the commission. The First, as to the vouchers, if they are of file in the treasurer's office. Second, as to the amount required by said act; that is, the amount specified therein upon recital.

Keeping in mind these instructions given to the commission, with those given to the Court of Claims, by the resolution of March 22d, 1878, in Sections 1 and 9, can there be a doubt of the duty or service to be rendered by this court; namely, an examination of the vouchers exchanged for consolidated bonds?

It is evident the legislature of A. D. 1876 and 1877 did not conceive itself bound by the former action of the same body, and felt itself at liberty to go behind the legislation of its predecessor. The propriety of this is not before the court.

That the above construction is to be placed upon the resolution, is otherwise clear. Why should the legislature refer to a special tribunal the question to test the validity of the bonds and certificates of stock, if the validity of these securities was regarded as established by the act of A. D. 1873? Why designate to the court, if the bonds and certificates of stock were valid debts under said act, the futile inquiry, if they were valid debts as resting on vouchers or securities which were invalid as not being issued according to law? The report of the bond commission assails the validity of the consolidated bonds and certificates of stock, upon the ground that they rest upon insufficient or invalid securities, securities which were not debts, and this position is not changed or enlarged by the resolution which creates the Court of Claims, and refers to the report.

This view of the jurisdiction and power of the Court of Claims disposes of the several propositions of the plaintiffs. The second affirms: "The consolidation act creates a contract between the state and every holder of her debt accepting the terms thereof, *whereby, in consideration of mutual advantages, a composition of their claims was made, which is final and conclusive."

No opinion is expressed, nor intended to be, of the force and effect of this proposition. It is enough to say the question presented is outside of the resolution, and not found in its words or intent, without departing from the ordinary meaning of language.

It is manifest that the third proposition of the plaintiffs—"Because the state, by her action otherwise, has precluded herself from denying the obligation of any of the debt recognized as valid in the consolidation act" —comes within the reasons above stated, and cannot be considered by the court.

The first proposition of the plaintiffs, that "the consolidated bonds are coupon bonds, payable to bearer, that is to say, negotiable instruments in the hands of bona fide holders for value before maturity," is not within the scope of the resolution, but may be modified to express the real question.

The proposition, stated affirmatively, is, that the vouchers, that is, "the canceled bonds, coupons and certificates of stock," in exchange for which consolidation bonds and certificates of stock were taken, were issued in accordance with law, and authorized to be consolidated by the act of 1873, and (the vouchers) also as issued in accordance with law, and further designated and described in Schedule 6 of said report (bond report.)

It becomes necessary to consider the contract between the state and the parties to whom the canceled bonds, coupons and certificates of stock were sold or transferred, in which way the state is made a party, and how such contract is to be construed.

The state, proposing to borrow money, offers its obligations for acceptance, not to one or two persons, but to capitalists of every country. The terms of obligation and discharge are expressed by an act of assembly.

This act is no secret document, but a high and public record. The party, too, acting for the state with whom the lender is to treat, is pointed out. All this is necessary and becomes fixed, not flexible, like a contract between citizens; but the offer simply is submitted for consideration, awaiting acceptance or rejection; and here, also, the agent for the state is without any discretion *such as the act confers. His power is special, and he cannot modify or enlarge his instructions.

The lender thus has it in his power, by referring to the legislation of the state, to understand the exact terms of the offer, the agent with whom he has to deal, and the result of his acceptance. He should bear in mind that upon a deviation from the legislative offer, which no one, unless empowered, can assent to, the state is not bound. In a word, a bond issued under an act of assembly is so connected with it as to make substantially one contract. A bond of the state, issued without legislative sanction, is a nullity.

A state as a borrower of money may become bound as an individual, though not responsible in the same mode. But it is to be remembered that there can be no equality between the state and its officer and agent who acts as under a mandate. An individual is liable to the extent of the power apparently conferred on his agent; but the government is liable only to the extent of the power actually conferred. Pierce v. United States, 1 N. & H. 270.

This principle is specially applicable to the over-issue of bonds under cover of the act of 1868, to raise funds to pay interest on the public debt. In relation to these bonds issued for payment of interest on the public debt, it appears that the first issue under the power conferred by said act was for $1,000,000. The purpose of this issue as expressed was to procure a loan to pay interest on the public debt. On the face of the bonds of the first issue the title of the act is set forth in full, the date of the act also being stated in the body of the bond. Waiving the question whether more bonds than amounted to $1,000,000 on their face could be issued until $1,000,000 was realized from their sale, it is apparent that there was an unauthorized excess of issue in number and amount. The issue of the second $1,000,000 of bonds was made under the same act, the bonds similar in every respect, except that instead of the title of the act being inserted in the bond, there was substituted for it the words, "Issued under an act approved August 26th, 1868."

There is no disputing the fact that bonds were issued purporting to be under this act, which produced more than $1,000,000. *This appears from the act of A. D. 1873, which authorizes the funding of $197,000 more than the $1,000,000 authorized by the act of August 26th, 1868. Is the state responsible for this over-issue of the bonds for $1,000,000 on their face—or for the over-issue in excess of bonds necessary to be sold to produce $1,000,000? In either case there was a positive want of authority or power in the agents of the state to issue bonds beyond a certain number or for more than a certain amount. This is not the case of power irregularly exercised, but the total want of power. It is a radical defect of title, which will avail against a bona fide holder of the bonds.

The officers of the state issuing these bonds and selling them were agents for a special purpose, and could not bind the state beyond the power expressed. 2 Kent 325, note A; Wilkinson v. King, 2 Comp. 325; Hartop v. Honne, 3 Atk. 44.

A special agent has no discretion. All government agents (unless otherwise empowered) are special agents. Anderson v. Kornley, 21 Wend. 279; 2 Kent. 620, 621, note A; Gordon v. Buchanan, 5 Yerg. 71.

To say the least, the bonds over-issued as above are without authority of law. N. Y. & N. H. R. R. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30; De Vass v. City of Richmond, 18 Gratt. 362.

The conclusion is that the bonds of the second issue under the act of August 26th, A. D. 1868, in excess of $1,000,000, were not issued in accordance with law, and authorized to be consolidated by the A. A. 1873.

The question of greatest importance raised by the report of the bond commission, at least involving the largest sum of money, is that called "The Hypothecated Bonds and Coupons." The plan adopted by the officers of the state in the wreck of its credit was the common one of borrowing from Peter to pay Paul. Had the credit of the state been good and its bonds at par, slight loss might have resulted from this operation. But in this scheme not only must the agents effecting the exchange of credit be paid, but there was superadded a constantly increasing volume of debt, arising from the difference between the market and the par value of the bond, which the purchaser could claim. The multitude of South Carolina securities on the market was *so great or the credit of the state so low that in November, 1871, the Orr bonds, regarded as the best, sold for twenty-eight and one-half per cent. in New York. To continue the sale of the bonds at such rate was to bankrupt the state, and the policy was preferred of obtaining loans by a pledge of the securities.

The two acts of assembly of August 26th, 1868, gave no power to pledge the state bonds for loans. A. A. 1868, pp. 18, 19. This power was first given by the act of 1869, approved February 17th, (A. A., p. 182) as to the loan contemplated by this act, which was required to be made within twelve years from the time of its passage. By a subsequent act (March 26th, 1869, p. 258,) the power was given to pledge for loans all the bonds of the state in its possession, and extending the time for the loans for two years from August 26th, 1868. It may be inferred the value of these securities did not improve; probably it decreased. The financial agent could sell or pledge; yet, although the face value of the bonds pledged was nearly four times the amount of the loans, he never sold in relief of the pledged securities, the evidence showing increasing distrust of the collaterals as a sufficient indemnity.

These pledged bonds were never relieved or released, except in one or two instances, in small quantities, and were sold or otherwise disposed of by the pledgees, as appears by the testimony. Government bonds, payable at a future day, especially when the day is distant, have been a favorite mode of investment for those not actually engaged in trade or handling money itself. With the aged and trustees it is a preferred security, as it proffers safe and certain returns without supervision on their part. The reason is obvious. The community of men forming a state is surely safer than any single person of the commonwealth. When the faith, credit and funds of the state are pledged for the redemption of the principal when it becomes due, and for the payment of interest in the form of coupons in the meantime, the highest security is given. The honesty and wealth of the community are elements of increased security for the payment of the bonds. So, also, the permanence of government enters into the essence of government bonds, for a state undergoing changes, some of which may overthrow its form or existence in ten years, *can give no assurance for the payment of a bond at the end of twenty. In theory, at least, the bonds of a government should be always at par, as the credit of the whole state, when the property of all individuals is bound, should exceed the credit of any single member. It is obvious that when these bonds were used as collaterals there was a wide departure from their common use. Seldom have state bonds been used as a guaranty for the payment of doubtful obligations. Ought not the very use to which they were applied have been a warning that something was wrong?

The credit of a state is a sacred thing; should not be prostituted to every common purpose, and hawked about on 'change like the note of a huckster. Certainly the circumstances surrounding these bonds would have suggested a rigid scrutiny of their legal origin and of the power of the possessor to dispose of them. Objection is taken by the defendant that the bonds issued under the two acts of August 26th, 1868, could neither be sold nor hypothecated after the expiration of two years from the date of said acts. The act passed February 17th, A. D. 1869, limits the time for loans to twelve months, and authorizes hypothecation for loans. The act of March 26th, 1869, extends the time for negotiating loans under the acts of August 26th, 1868, to two years, and authorizes the pledging of bonds as security. These loans are: * * *

From this statement it appears that all the loans were made after August 26th, A. D. 1870, more than one year after loans were authorized to be made under the acts.

The act of March 26th, 1869, declares the financial agent is "authorized to pledge the bonds of the state, which the state now has or may hereafter have in its possession, as collateral security for state loans," with a proviso that in all transactions he shall conform to the provisions of the acts of August 26th, 1868.

It is to be observed that the power to hypothecate is connected with the loans. Hypothecation, however, was adopted as a mode of effecting the loans. The simple question, then, is, within what time do the acts authorize a loan and hypothecation?

The answer is given by the acts: Within two years from the *passage of the acts of August 26th, A. D. 1868, and one year from the passage of the act of February 17th, 1869.

It is needless to say that after the time limited by the acts the governor could not, under acts of August 26th, 1868, nor the governor, comptroller-general and treasurer, under the act of February 17th, 1869, negotiate state bonds, nor authorize the financial agent to do so.

It may be submitted, in reply to this, that time was not the essence of the contract. The law is otherwise. Green v. Biddle, 8 Whart. 34.

That time may not be of the essence of a contract is a principle of equity jurisprudence. In cases like the one under consideration, equity follows the law. Hipwell v. Knight, 1 Y. & Coll. 415; 2 Story, §§ 775, 776; 2 Kent 621, note e; Batty v. Carswell, 2 J. R. 48.

That time was regarded as an essential element of the contract is shown by the action of the legislature extending the time to effect the loans from one to two years. In plain language, a power of attorney was given to certain officers of the state to borrow money within twelve months or two years, and when not accomplished in that time their power ceased. It was not a power which these officers could exercise ex-officio.

There was a conferred power, special, from which they derived the right to act, which they could not modify, and from which they could not deviate.

It is deemed scarcely necessary to refer to the question of notice in relation to the contract contained in the acts. All the bonds refer to the acts under which they were issued in such unmistakable language as to give full notice of their provisions upon reference to them.

There is notice of another character affecting the bonds—not only that they were issued after the power had ended, but that those dealing with them were not bona fide holders without notice.

Governor Scott, at an early day, (in his message of November, A. D. 1871,) states the fierce warnings given by the press of the state, that the bonds in question would never be paid; that they were bayonet bonds, issued by a bogus legislature; warning capi*talists of New York they would not be paid; that the whole scheme was a job and a swindle, and that the bonds would never be recognized when property-holders and honest men had a majority in the councils of the state. A page of language of this character was inserted in his message—a public document.

Governor Scott says, further, that these warnings began in the press but ten days after the new government went into operation—July 17th, 1868. He declares, also, the action of the Taxpayers' Convention, in May A. D. 1871, and of the Charleston Board of Trade, had a most disastrous effect upon the securities of the state, and compelled a large and rapid increase of the public debt. He thus furnishes, in a public document, the notices against the bonds, and the effect of the warnings in New York.

Human credulity would far transcend human belief if it could be supposed that banks and bankers dealing in public securities could be ignorant of these expressions in regard to the bonds. The conclusion is that the loans and hypothecation of securities negotiated after the periods of time limited by the acts aforesaid, were not issued in accordance with law, nor authorized to be consolidated by the act of 1873.

The first act, providing for the appointment of a land commissioner, was passed March 27th, A. D. 1869.

The act establishes an office, and the officer was to be known as the land commissioner of the State of South Carolina. He was to be appointed by an advisory board, which consisted of the governor, comptroller-general, state treasurer, secretary of state and attorney-general.

The appointee was to give bond in the penal sum of $20,000 for the discharge of the duties of his office, and was to receive a salary of $2000.

To this land commissioner, who could scarcely think without the sanction of the advisory board, the legislature directed the treasurer to issue "bonds of this state in the sum of two hundred thousand dollars, with coupons attached." The plain intent of the act was that the bonds should be placed in the hands of the land commissioner; his duties involving purchases and sales of lands, the direction in the seventh clause of the act as to invest*ment of moneys from sales, to constitute a sinking fund for the redemption of the bonds, indicate a separate management, and that they were not to be merged in the general funds of the state.

Except the direction that the bonds were to be issued to the land commissioner, there is no direction as to their sale, nor any limit in the act of the time within which they could be sold.

The bonds issued under this act bear upon their face the words: "Issued under an act approved March 27th, 1869."

The next act in relation to the land commission was passed March 1st, A. D. 1870, for an issue of $500,000. These bonds were issued without limit as regards time, but the power of negotiating them was withheld from the land commission.

The bonds were to be negotiated by the advisory board, in such form and manner as the board should determine. The bonds issued under this act bear upon their face the words: "Loan under act approved March 1st, 1870."

On the 26th of March, 1869, the day before the passage of the first land commission act, the legislature, by act, authorized the financial agent "to pledge the bonds of the state which the state now has or may hereafter have in its possession, as collateral security for state loans," with the proviso "that in all the transactions he shall conform to the provision of 'An act entitled an act to authorize a loan to redeem the obligations known as the bills receivable of the State of South Carolina,'" ratified the 26th day of August, A. D. 1868.

There was by Section 2 of this act an amendment of the acts of August, 1868, extending the time for loans to two years.

Waiving the question whether, under the first act, any one could negotiate the bonds but the land commissioner, and consequently whether their hypothecation by the financial agent was not illegal, it seems plain that the pledging of the bonds issued under both acts is objectionable.

The bonds were impressed with all the restrictions attaching to other bonds pledged by the financial agent.

Neither the loans nor the hypothecation were made within two years—the time limited.

For the reasons stated above, in regard to the hypothecation of other bonds, the conclusion is that the land bonds hypothe*cated were not issued in accordance with law, nor authorized to be consolidated under the act of assembly A. D. 1873.

The defendant objects that the coupons detached from bonds between June 10th, 1874, and June 24th, 1874, amounting to $331,996, have not been issued in accordance with law, nor authorized to be consolidated.

The testimony of Henry L. Tappan shows how coupons accumulated in the treasury until November, 1872. He says they were put away in the vaults of the treasury, and when he left the office, November 1st, 1872, they had not been disturbed.

James O. Ladd, in his testimony, says that while he was in the treasury "there were matured coupons clipped off from bonds sent to Kimpton. These coupons were put in packages and put away in the fire-proof vault, inside of the safe in the treasury. They were not canceled at the time. They were put away, and so remained uncanceled up to the time he left the office."

According to John L. Neagle's statement, he received, in the early part of A. D. 1873, from Niles G. Parker, about $100,000 of coupons for his action in and as his share for the funding of the coupons. His doubts were quieted by the assurance of Parker that the thing was all right.

He turned over to Y. J. P. Owens, for funding, a large part of the coupons—between $80,000 and $90,000. He again was disturbed about the character of the transaction, and having "ascertained that they [the coupons] were wrongfully in his hands, destroyed them, viz., the balance, about $12,000, within the last twelve months."

In the settlement with the financial agent, (Journal, House of Rep., 1872, 1873, p. 307,) it is stated the agent had returned to the state all coupons not paid, excepting on outstanding bonds owned by third parties or held as collateral as hereinafter mentioned.

The coupons of bonds owned by third parties would be the property of the owners of the bonds, and out of Kimpton's reach, unless upon payment. The proof is, the bonds and coupons pledged were never paid by Kimpton. The above facts corroborate the testimony of Parker, who states at length the scheme between Scott, Chamberlain, Neagle, Kimpton and himself to *fund the coupons through Owens or others. Aside from the testimony, nothing can be more significant of the transaction than the conduct of the parties engaged in it. There is no pretence that the state owed them who were then its present or late officers, or that they obtained the coupons in any business transaction. Why fund through another? They are dealing with tens of thousands in a manner so free, as to suggest the idea of "come easy, go easy." Does it accord with human conduct that Kimpton, who, after his settlement with the state, claimed a balance of thousands as due him, would have shared with others, without equivalent, valid securities that would have paid or secured him? Credat Judæus!

The conclusion is, that the said coupons were not issued in accordance with law, and authorized to be consolidated by the act of 1873.

No doubt the legislature intended, by a reference to a legal body, that the questions submitted should be considered in their legal aspect. The question for this court is not what the state should do, what steps policy suggests or good faith demands. In the view taken, these questions were not before the court. The simple question was, were the vouchers—that is, "the canceled bonds, coupons and certificates of stock"—"issued in accordance with law and authorized to be consolidated by the act of the general assembly, approved December 22d, 1873?" To this question the above conclusions are given as answer.

Any assumption from the foregoing views, that the consolidation bonds, issued under the act of 1873, are valid or invalid, in other respects would be gratuitous. The propositions on behalf of the bondholders, stated above, have not been considered with any purpose of their decision. The effect of the act of 1873, the acts of the state authorities, the vesting of rights under acts of assembly, though afterwards opened for consideration, with other questions in the interest of the bondholders, the constitutional point made in the answers, want of registration and the like, on behalf of the defendant, are all questions about which no opinion is expressed.

There is a class of cases, not many in number, which have held the owners of municipal bonds, which were subject to ex*ceptions, entitled to certain payments. These were instances where equitable principles prevailing and the corporations having received some value for their securities negotiated, refunded to the purchasers their money. The case of County of Armstrong v. Brinton, 47 Penna. 370, and others therein referred to, are examples. A suggestion is scarcely ventured if a settlement of the bonded debt could be thus effected. Yet, if practicable, it should satisfy any one but a speculating bondholder, and at the same time not be unjust to the state.

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed, That the "canceled bonds, coupons and certificates of stock," called "vouchers," in relation to which conclusions have been announced above in this opinion, were not issued in accordance with law, and authorized to be consolidated under the act of 1873. And that the consolidated bonds and certificates of stock exchanged for said "vouchers" to the extent and so far as the said consolidated bonds and certificates of stock rest upon said "vouchers" for their validity, were not binding obligations of the State of South Carolina.

ALDRICH, J. My regular duties in the Circuit will prevent me, at this time, from presenting an extended opinion of the questions submitted to us, by the joint resolution creating the Court of Claims. I concur in the conclusions reached by Judge THOMSON, and although his reasoning is perfectly satisfactory to me, so far as it goes, yet I am disposed to go further and hold that this whole legislation was so gross a fraud on a helpless people, that it will be the greatest injustice to force the innocent taxpayer to pay the debts thus contracted by an usurping government without the warrant of constitutional authority, against which the taxpayers loudly and earnestly protested, and which so astounded the good faith of the commercial world that none but the most reckless speculators would engage in the disreputable transaction to utterly ruin a plundered state prostrate in the hands of her invaders.

The opinion of Judge HUDSON shows great research, and is prepared with care and ability, supposing these usurpers had the legal and constitutional right to impose these oppressive burdens, but as that lies at the very foundation of the question submitted, *I cannot acquiesce in it. Reserving the right to file a more extended opinion, I concur with Judge THOMSON.

Subsequently Judge ALDRICH filed a more extended opinion, as follows:

I was not able to prepare an opinion at the last meeting of the court for consultation, because I had not completed my Circuit business. As I did not think that my assignment to this court was intended to interrupt or delay my Circuit duties, I reserved the right to give my reasons in the future, when I had time to prepare the same, which I now propose to do.

Of all the questions that most distract the judicial mind, these semi-politico are the most embarrassing. There is always more or less feeling of party spirit, prejudice, or a popular pressure very hard to resist, interfering with the free exercise of sound reason, even in the clearest head and the best balanced mind, unconsciously warping the soundest judgment—not that the judge is less firm, less conscientious, but such is the constitution of the human mind that he finds it difficult to divest himself of the opinions, perhaps prejudices, that may have crept into his mind when the legislation on which he is called to pass was under discussion. I trust I will not be so influenced, as I had no expectation of being selected as a member of this court, and had not examined the questions previously to my selection.

The history of the financial legislation which called this court into existence has been so fully given in the clear and able judgments of Judges THOMSON and HUDSON, that I do not propose to encumber this opinion with a further reference thereto.

Why was the court selected? If the matter referred was a mere question of commercial law, the ordinary tribunals of the state were open for that purpose. Nay! Story, or any other writer on negotiable paper, would settle the controversy. The court then, as I take it, was clothed with much larger and broader powers than the mere consideration of negotiable securities; it was intended that we shall go to the very bottom of these transactions, and see if authority was vested in the legislature creating this indebtedness to bind the state, or to pledge her faith and credit.

*It is a court of conscience as well as a court of law; it is bound to preserve the honor and good faith of the state, at the same time to see that the bona fide holders of her securities are protected in their rights, while the innocent taxpayers, on whom the burden of payment will fall, are not oppressed by the assumption of an indebtedness not authorized by law.

In the first place, I hold the provisional government of President Johnson, and the reconstructed government inaugurated under military rule, are both extra-constitutional, and, if it be true, as decided in the Tennessee case, that the state never lost her entity by the act of secession, then South Carolina at the close of the war was the same state, under her old constitution, that she was when she attempted to escape from the Union; and both the provisional government of President Johnson and the reconstructed governments of Scott, Moses and Chamberlain are usurpations. The conventions adopting the constitutions of 1865 and 1868 were not called and elected as directed by the fundamental law, and all of the subsequent legislation is not binding on the state, except so far as she chooses to acquiesce therein.

That this political usurpation was well understood not only here, but all over the political and commercial world, is abundantly proved. The very first act of this usurpation startled the civilized world. The military order directing the election of delegates to the constitutional convention of 1868, excluded nearly one-third of the property-holders of the state from the polls, thus disfranchising a large portion of the virtue, intelligence and property of the state, who were not represented in that convention.

In less than three years after the Scott administration went into office, so frightful were the taxes, so rapid was the increase of the public debt, so audacious was the spoliation of the public money, that the taxpayers in 1871 assembled in convention to enter their protest against this spoliation and to record their notice to the world that they would not pay the debts then contracted and thereafter to be contracted by this usurping government. It is argued that this notice had no legal effect, it was the resolution of a mere "political mass meeting." whose actings and doings are not binding. It was the only mode left to *advertise the world against the open frauds and robbery then being committed. The supporters of the state, the taxpayers, had been defrauded of their constitution by these invaders and usurpers, and being unrepresented in the legislature, the virtue, intelligence and property of the state upon whom the burden of paying these debts must fall, seeing the fraud, feeling their inability to meet their payments, knowing that the usurpers were remorseless and without character, met in primary assembly in each county in the state, and elected their wisest and best men to represent them in that convention. So imposing was the body that the Scott administration found it necessary to yield to the pressure of their moral influence, and, to deceive them, actually perpetrated another fraud, by presenting false statements of the debts and financial condition of the state.

This in a manner allayed apprehension, and induced the convention to adjourn without applying a specific remedy. In a few weeks after the adjournment, it was discovered that the accounts and representations were false, and made for the purpose of deception. In addition to this, every newspaper in this state, and newspapers in all the states, heralded this spoliation, this open, barefaced robbery. In the city of New York, the theatre of these infamous transactions, a leading journal exposed the whole fraud, discovered by a prominent member of the taxpayers' convention then on a visit to that city, and who had been deceived by these false representations; correspondents from all parts of the Union to leading journals denounced it. Mr. Pike, in his "Prostrate State," published in the city of New York at the very time these bonds were being put upon the market, branded these usurpers as "political banditti." To say now that the speculators in this branded paper are innocent holders for value without notice, is a proposition that defies the most extravagant credulity.

If ever a fraud was made patent to the world; if ever a people were put upon their guard against peculation and open robbery, it was done in these cases. The notice was so universal that no one dealt in the bonds, coupons and certificates, except the wildest speculators, at a ruinous discount. I adjudge the question of notice as fully established.

*I take it, then, that every purchaser that dealt in these securities took the risk of the speculation, and relied upon the courts to enforce the obligations under the strict rules of technical law, not regarding the great wrong committed against the state. It was speculating upon the miseries of a helpless people. Just see to what extremes men will go where interest calls! In all this discussion we have heard a great deal about the innocent holder for value; the credit of the state jeopardized; her faith and honor pledged; but not a word about the innocent taxpayer who had no voice, whose hands were bound, whose tongue was tied, and yet who is expected to pay these obligations against which he was protesting all the while, in the most earnest way left open to him, the press of the country. Our own people have become interested in a small degree in those securities, hence their claims.

Now, mark! The legislature who passed the consolidation act was of the same complexion as those who created the debt. In that very consolidation act they repudiated outright $5,965,000 of conversion bonds, and now we are told that this respectable body has pledged the faith and credit of South Carolina to pay the debt created by the act.

It surprises me to hear gentlemen whose state pride cannot be questioned, who are proud of our history and traditions, arguing with sincerity that the faith and honor of their state could be pledged by such a band of invaders and shameless robbers. I cannot, as a South Carolina judge, admit that it was ever possible for the faith and honor of my native state to have been in the keeping of the legislatures and administrations who created the indebtedness. To say that these men, so entirely destitute of public virtue or private character, who acknowledged $5,965,000 of fraudulent debt and repudiated it, who scaled down the honest indebtedness of the state incurred before the war, dollar for dollar, to fifty cents on the dollar, to give a show of integrity to the debts contracted by themselves since their usurpation of the state government, could pledge in the same act the faith and honor of South Carolina, is a reproach to her history and traditions.

But, suppose it be conceded for the sake of the argument that *the government creating this indebtedness is constitutional and had the authority to pledge the faith and credit of the state, while it may be admitted that if a state or municipal government or a corporation empower its officers to create a debt by issuing bonds, coupons and certificates, the holder for value is not bound to look into the regularity of the issue; yet it never has been contended that he could waive the necessity of inquiring into the authority. In Marsh v. Fulton, 10 Wall. 683 [19 L. Ed. 1040], it was held that the holder, though bona fide, for value without notice, was bound to look into the origin of the title.

And no case brought to the attention of the court controverts this sound law. If, then, these acts were passed without constitutional authority, what becomes of these obligations? Were they not issued without authority of law and void ab initio? Were not the purchasers bound to look into the origin of the title? To argue that the consolidation act is not an act to create a public debt, because it is entitled "An act to reduce the volume of the public debt," is a mere play upon words. If the volume of the debt thus to be reduced was without constitutional authority, by what power of argument, reason or logic can it be maintained that the new debt to take its place is exempt from the constitutional restriction? If the original debt was void for want of authority, what healing power has a subsequent act afflicted with the same infirmity? Does it not still create a public debt? Is the character of the legislation altered by reducing the volume? It appears to me that the matter is so clear from the statement of the proposition that it is a waste of words to pursue the argument.

It is further argued that Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller-General settles the question, that it is the law of the land. I agree with Judge Hudson that the decision is the law of that case; but emphatically deny that it is binding in this or any other court, when that constitutional question comes to be considered. No judge, who has independence of thought or self-respect, is bound to stultify himself, or stifle his conscience, because an appellate tribunal has made a decision, the error of which is patent on its face.

But I do insist that two-thirds of a quorum is not the two-*thirds required by the constitution. To maintain that proposition, appears to me to be revolting to the good sense and the good conscience of every just-minded man. As a judge, I am sworn to preserve, protect and defend the constitution of the state. Can I, with that oath staring me in the face, adopt such a heresy and nullify the organic law?

Is the decision of the Supreme Court more binding on me than the constitution of the state? Is the creature more to be respected than the creators?

It is not necessary, here, to argue what the convention meant when it used the term two-thirds in the constitution. If it did not receive two-thirds of the representations, it was a fraud on the people. To say that because a different phraseology is used in different articles of the constitution warrants a different rule of construction as to each, is not supported by reason or authority. What is the theory of the constitution? That a certain class of legislation shall require a two-thirds vote. This decided majority is intended to protect the people against the passage of acts which the convention supposed would be oppressive. It was intended as well to call the attention of the citizens to the legislation proposed, and by the difficulty of securing so decided a majority, prevent legislation which might inconvenience the people of the whole state, or impose burdens hard to bear.

If this be so, is it not obvious that the whole purpose of the constitution is defeated, to say that two-thirds of a quorum, which is a minority of the representation, is the two-thirds contemplated. I mean not to criticise those who differ from me. Gentlemen equally conscientious and patriotic, take a different view, but every man must judge for himself in a matter of conscience, and thus judging, I announce that I cannot give force and effect to this decision.

It is further contended this act is a compromise, and the state, having obtained the benefit of the compromise, is bound, in good faith, to carry out its terms. The proposition, as I look at it, appears to me to be a very curious one. It is not denied that the administrations of Scott, Moses and Chamberlain, having piled up a frightful mountain of debt, which they saw it was impossible for the impoverished taxpayers to meet, and the payment of which *they knew would be resisted, for most of it they had stolen, having repudiated $5,965,000 of the debt acknowledged to be fraudulent; having scaled the honest debts of the state fifty cents on the dollar, to give a semblance of integrity to these suspicious debts which they put on a footing with the honest, have effected a compromise which the innocent and honest taxpayers, whom they have so mercilessly robbed, are bound, in good faith, to carry out, now that they have come to their rights! As a question of political economy and policy, this may be a very good settlement. This court has nothing to do with that. It is for the legislature to adopt a policy. But, as a question of law and conscience, I hold that the securities enumerated in the decision of Judge Thomson, are not valid obligations binding on the state.

And it is so adjudged and decreed.

Dissenting Opinion.

HUDSON, J. These are cases made up for the purpose of testing the validity of certain bonds of the State of South Carolina, known as consolidation bonds, issued under act of December 22d, 1873, "to reduce the volume of the public debt."

The plaintiff, in each of the nine several cases above, alleges, respectively, that he is the lawful owner and holder for value of the coupon sued upon, and of the bond to which the same belongs; that demand has been made upon the proper officers of the state for payment, which has been refused, and demands judgment against the state, &c. Defences are set up by the state in her answers to these several suits, which, when grouped together, may be classed as follows:

1. That a portion of the vouchers surrendered, and for which these consolidated bonds were in part issued, had been by the financial agent clipped or detached from certain "relief of the treasury bonds" which were never issued, and never became a charge against the state. The coupons so detached, it is alleged, amount to over $9000.

2. That a portion of the vouchers surrendered, and for which some of the bonds in suit were in part issued, had been detached from certain conversion bonds, and in the process of conversion should have been attached to the certificates of stock in lieu of *which the conversion bonds were issued, and filed away with said certificates of stock as vouchers. The coupons thus detached amount to nearly $10,000.

3. That a portion of the vouchers surrendered, and for which some of the bonds in suit were in part issued, were coupons maturing on or before July 1st, 1871, and as the state paid the interest on the public debt up to that period, these coupons must have been paid. The amount of coupons thus maturing, and in exchange for which consolidation bonds were issued, is $486,025.

4. That a portion of the vouchers entering into some of these bonds sued on embraces coupons surrendered by Y. J. P. Owens, as agent, by Governor Scott, and L. N. Zealy, amounting to $331,996, which coupons had been clipped by the financial agent from bonds before being issued, and had been by him sent to N. G. Parker to be fraudulently consolidated, and were consolidated in fraud of the act.

5. That a portion of the vouchers surrendered, and in exchange for which some of the bonds in suit were in part issued, consisted of bonds and coupons in the hands of the financial a[illegible], which had been by him hypothecated a[illegible] the time allowed by law. The amount thus hypothecated is alleged to have been $2,166,039.

6. That a portion of the surrendered vouchers which enter into some of the bonds in suit consists of the second issue of bonds "for the payment of interest on the public debt," alleged to be fraudulent.

7. A portion of the vouchers represented in part in some of the bonds in suit are the land commission bonds, all of which are alleged to be fraudulent.

8. That a large number of the bonds which were consolidated, and which are in part represented in some of the bonds in suit, were never registered in the treasury, as is required in Article IX., Section 14, of the constitution.

9. That the consolidation act, in so far as it creates a public debt, in unconstitutional and void, because not passed by a two-thirds vote of each branch of the general assembly, recorded by yeas and nays.

10. That several of the acts under which some of the recon*struction bonds were issued (and which bonds were subsequently consolidated) were not passed by the requisite two-thirds vote of the general assembly, and were therefore void.

A great deal of evidence, oral and documentary, was introduced to substantiate the aforesaid facts alleged by the state in her defence.

We propose, first, to consider the question of the validity of the various bonds in suit upon the hypothesis that the allegations of fact by the state are true; in other words, as if a demurrer to the answers had been filed by the bondholders.

To arrive at a correct conclusion upon the issues, we will be greatly aided by a brief statement of the financial legislation of the state from the ratification of the present constitution until the present period.

When the first legislature under the new constitution assembled, they found an empty treasury, and a state debt exceeding, in the aggregate, $7,000,000, including the obligations known as the bills receivable and the liability of the state for the outstanding bills of the bank of the state, and excluding the debt contracted in aid of the rebellion, so called, which had been declared void.

All reflecting men foresaw that under the administration of ignorance and cupidity there would be mismanagement of the finances of the state, and the speedy result was the inauguration of a system of reckless extravagance and profligacy on the part of the state officials and legislature, which soon rendered bankrupt the treasury of the state and destroyed her credit. * * *

After the foregoing epitome of facts no further comment is necessary upon the reckless management of the state finances by those entrusted therewith. Rather in a spirit of desperation than otherwise they procured or suffered the sixteenth amendment to the constitution to be adopted, which ended this species of financial legislation.

At this point we pause to recur to the steps which were taken during this wild extravagance, to investigate the condition of the debt of the state and the management of her finances. For this purpose committees were appointed by the legislature from time *to time, and their reports, and the action of that body upon them, bear materially upon the great question before us.

That grave doubts as to the validity of a portion of the public debt existed is a well-known fact, and this fact is admitted in the preamble to the validating act of March 16th, 1872, the avowed purpose of which act was to cure all supposed defects and irregularities in the issue of certain classes of bonds therein specifically enumerated. That such was the legal effect of the act is expressly held in the case of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller-General, 4 S. C. 430.

In 1871, because of the grave charges of illegality in the issuing of bonds under the various acts of the legislature, the house of representatives appointed a committee "to inquire into the matter of the over-issue of state bonds," and on the 20th of December, 1871, a joint committee of the house and senate was appointed to examine the accounts of the state treasurer, comptroller-general and financial agent. The report of the first committee is to be found on page 867 R. and R., 1871–2, and the full report of the joint committee, covering over three hundred pages, is appended to R. and R., 1871–2.

These reports are full and unsparing, and evince a spirit of candor somewhat surprising, considering the active complicity of its authors in the profligate financial legislation of the period. Be this as it may, it is certainly true that these reports laid before the legislature and the people of the state an amount of information touching the financial affairs of the state little, if any, short of the light that is shed upon the subject by the able report of the bond commission in March, 1878.

By these very elaborate reports of December, 1871, the state authorities, the legislature and the people were made aware of the number of bonds issued under each act, and of all the alleged defects and irregularities in their issue, sale and hypothecation; a fact of the utmost significance in its bearing upon the issues involved in these suits, as will be seen hereafter.

On March 16th, 1872, a little more than two months after these very full reports, and in the face of these grave charges therein touching the irregularities of various classes of bonds, the *legislature passed the validating act, which declared all these various classes of bonds to have been duly and regularly issued.

One year subsequent to this significant act, the suit of Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller-General, was decided. In this suit nearly every objection—certainly, every substantial objection—now raised was then urged against the validity of the several classes of bonds, in lieu of which consolidation bonds at fifty cents on the dollar have since been issued. Every question was decided squarely against the state and in favor of the bondholders in that suit. It decided that the "bills receivable bonds," the "interest on the public debt bonds," the "relief of the treasury bonds," the "land commission bonds," were valid obligations of the state. The force and effect of this decision cannot be avoided by unfavorable criticism. Until overruled it is the law of the case, and rights acquired under it cannot be divested, even should it be now overruled.

But to defeat the practical operation of this judgment, the legislature, on December 22d, 1873, repealed the provision of law which required the comptroller "to give notice of the rate or per centum necessary to be levied upon the taxable property of the state." The operation of the writ of mandamus was thus avoided and the bondholders were baffled, being thus, to some extent, left in doubt as to what amount of her debt the state was liable for, and what remedies were available to them to enforce their demands.

In this state of the case, it being once more doubtful as to the ultimate determination of the question involved, and yet with full light before them, the legislature resolved to effect a final settlement of the bond debt of the state, and with this view, on the 22d of December, 1873, passed the "Act to reduce the volume of the public debt," commonly known as the "consolidation act."

This act rejects $5,965,000 of the conversion bonds as being illegal and void, and provides for the funding, at fifty cents on the dollar, of the entire remainder of the outstanding bonds and certificates of stock, and all outstanding coupons maturing and to mature on January 1st, 1874.

To preclude misunderstanding, the amounts of outstanding *bonds and certificates of stock issued under each act are carefully given in figures, and conform exactly to the report of the treasurer of date October 13th, 1873.

By this report it appears that the entire debt of the state, evidenced by bonds and certificates of stock, was.....	$15,851,627 35
The act declared void.....	5,965,000 00
Leaving a balance of.....	$ 9,886,627 35

Which, funded as directed at fifty per cent., gives $4,943,313.67, as the ultimate consolidated debt of the state, being less than one-third of the original amount, and much less than the bond debt and liabilities of the state at the date of reconstruction. In the spring of 1874 the act was put in operation. The funding began, but had not proceeded far when a committee was appointed by the legislature, of which Senator T. C. Dunn was chairman, "to ascertain what bonds of the state have been funded under the act to reduce the volume of the public debt, and what interest coupons have been funded under said act." The committee proceeded to New York and examined the financial agent and his books, and gathered from these sources all available testimony. The full and searching report of this committee is to be found in R. and R., 1874–5. In it are reiterated the substantial objections as to over-issue, irregular hypothecation, &c., of bonds and funding of coupons now raised, and the committee, we are told, urged the attorney-general to take steps to enjoin the treasurer and arrest the work.

The legislature took no steps to interfere and the attorney-general refused so to do, and, in his annual report, gave, as his chief reason for declining to act, that the matters were concluded by the decision in Morton,

Bliss & Co. In March, 1875, the legislature appointed a committee to prepare an address to the governor for the removal of Treasurer Cardoza for violating the consolidation act in sundry particulars, chief among which were that he had issued consolidation bonds in exchange for a large amount of bonds which had been issued in excess of the number authorized by the various acts; and had issued consolidation bonds in exchange for a large number of coupons of bonds maturing before July 1st, 1871, and of others which had been *clipped from the bonds as they passed through the hands of the financial agent, and before the bonds were put upon the market. See charges and specifications in House Journal, 1874–5, pp. 632–3–4.

Cardoza was heard through able counsel, viz., Hon. W. D. Porter, of Charleston, C. D. Melton, of Columbia, and the Hon. Leroy F. Youmans, the present attorney-general of the state. The whole subject was, by them, ably handled. The treasurer was acquitted of the charges of violating the act; the address failed, the intelligent white democrats, almost to a man, sustaining his action, and he was directed to proceed in his work of funding. He did proceed, and funded a much greater number after than he had done before, the public generally supposing that the act was thus established as a final adjustment of the debt.

The validity of the bonds which he issued in lieu of the securities then assailed, is now put in issue upon objections to the surrendered securities, which were then urged before the legislature, and overruled by that body, and chiefly by the vote of the real representatives of the taxpayers. It is a notable fact that the arduous labors of the bond commission, of six months' duration, have brought to light few new facts touching the bond debt of the state. In the reports of the committee of 1871, Senator Dunn's committee of 1874, and the proceedings in the trial of Cardoza, nearly all the irregularities are charged which are preferred by the bond commission. The whole ground is covered if we add thereto the record in Morton, Bliss & Co. The result of much debate in the legislature upon the report of the bond commission, was the reference of the vexed question of the validity of the consolidation bonds to this court.

By voluntarily submitting the question of her liability to the courts, the state has rejected the idea of repudiation, and declared her purpose to abide by the law. No more honorable course could have been adopted.

This narrative of legislation brings us to the questions at issue.

In the outset we remarked that, in the discussion of these questions, we are bound to accept the constitution of 1868 as the fundamental law of the land, just as much so as we did that of 1790, and all acts of the legislature from 1868 to 1876 as binding *upon us as were acts prior to the war, subject, and only subject, to the well-established rules of construction and interpretation.

It is worse than folly, in a legal argument or legal opinion, to hold that we have been living under a usurpation, and hence are at liberty to abide by such laws of that period as are pleasing, and to disregard such as are odious. It matters not how republican, how radical, how ignorant and how corrupt may have been the legislatures from 1868 to 1876 inclusive, nevertheless, the laws which they placed upon the statute books are none the less binding upon us until repealed, and rights acquired under them are as much to be protected by courts, as rights acquired under prior legislation. Any other doctrine would be fundamentally wrong, and fruitful of indescribable confusion and evil. Legislatures can make laws and repeal statutes. Courts can only administer them as they are, saving only the right to interpret them and to declare their binding efficacy.

Nor are we called upon to determine the constitutionality of the consolidation act. The legislature has accepted it as valid and binding, and the treasurer of the state is still engaged in carrying out its provisions. The state is unwilling to surrender its marked advantages. We are only required to determine the validity of certain classes of consolidation bonds which are assailed, not on account of the supposed unconstitutionality of the act, but because it is alleged that these bonds were issued in exchange for vouchers not enumerated in the act, or not designed by it to be consolidated. We have no hesitation in saying, however, that the act is constitutional. It does not pretend to create a debt, but "to reduce the volume of the public debt." It is a settlement and adjustment of the debt of the state, and, this being its intention, it was regularly enacted.

Under the joint resolution of March 22d, 1878, establishing this court, its jurisdiction is "to hear and determine any case or cases made up or brought to test the validity of any of the consolidation bonds, coupons and certificates of stock, or any of the various classes of them mentioned in the report of the bond commission, as resting on vouchers not issued in accordance with law, and authorized to be consolidated" by the consolidation act of December 22d, 1873, "and also as not issued in accordance with *law, and further designated and described in Schedule G of the said report."

Section 9 provides that cases be made up "to test the validity of said consolidated bonds and coupons and certificates of stock mentioned in said Schedule 6, bringing before the court the various classes of vouchers which, it is alleged in the report of the said commission, impair the validity of the said consolidated bonds, coupons or certificates of stock or any of them."

The consolidation act of December 22d, 1873, is drawn with care. It specifies the various classes of bonds to be funded, and the amounts outstanding; and designates the bonds which are void, and not to be funded. The valid are separated from the void. The question of the validity of outstanding bonds is here definitely settled by the legislature. No discretion is left to the treasurer, but his duties are ministerial and compulsory. The act was passed by the legislature deliberately, and with full light before them. Before them were spread the various acts under which the bonds were issued; the journals of the legislature, the reports of the treasurer, comptroller-general and financial agent; the very full reports of investigating committees, to say nothing of the discussions in the public press, and they also had the benefit of the legal decision of the case of Morton, Bliss & Co.

It is no apology to say that the legislature was a body of illiterate men. The binding efficacy of an act is not to be measured by the intelligence of its authors. We hold, therefore:

I.

That every bond issued under act of December 22d, 1873, for vouchers and securities therein enumerated, is a valid obligation of the state, notwithstanding any defects, irregularities and illegalities to which the surrendered vouchers may be obnoxious. These are all waived and effectually cured by the act, and it is vain to say that the legislature had no power to do this.

The state is ex vi termini of the act estopped from questioning the validity of any bond issued in exchange for any of the securities enumerated therein. The law of estoppel, whether by matter of record or in pais, applies to states as well as to individuals. By this law the hands of a state are effectually tied, *and her mouth as firmly sealed, as if she were an humble person. But not only by the terms of the act is the state estopped, but she is likewise, by her other actions, precluded from denying the obligation of any part of the debt recognized in the consolidation act as valid, and it was with a view to make this appear, that we gave a brief statement of her acts authorizing the issue of bonds and the doings of the legislature in the work of investigating the state's finances.

That a state may be estopped from setting up as a defence, mere irregularities in the exercise of a power conferred on its agents, by its failure to repudiate promptly such acts when performed, or to restrain their performance in time to prevent mischief, has been definitely settled by repeated adjudication.

A leading case, in support of this doctrine, is that of Delafield v. State of Illinois, 2 Hill 175; 26 Wend. 192; 8 Paige 327. Did space permit, we would be pleased to cite extracts from the several learned opinions delivered in this case. Suffice it to say, however, that it was contended by Delafield, who had purchased from the agent of the State of Illinois $500,000 of her bonds, at less than par (they were required to be sold at par), that the conduct of the governor, auditor and fund commissioners amounted to a ratification of the sale. The force of this argument gave great concern to the learned judges who tried the cause, and caused them to hesitate; but they finally accepted the argument of the counsel for the state, and held that these officers were incapable of making or of ratifying such a contract; that this power rested solely in the legislature, which body had, with great promptness, taken the proper steps, through the courts, to annul the sale.

Had the legislature of Illinois withheld action, or acquiesced in the sale, and a fortiori, had it confirmed the sale, the title of Delafield would have become good. Or had the bonds passed from Delafield to a bona fide holder without notice, the liability of the state would have been fixed. From 1868 to 1872 the state officials of South Carolina issued bonds under the various acts of the legislature, and placed them in the hands of the financial agent. In the management of these bonds these officials and the legislature not only acquiesced, but the latter body, as *the representatives of the sovereign people, in the validating act declared their issue regular and the bonds valid; and again, in the consolidation act, recognized them as valid obligations of the state.

In 1874, shortly after the funding had been commenced, under act of December 22d, 1873, the legislature was informed by Senator Dunn's committee that a large number of bonds in the hands of Kimpton had been hypothecated after the time allowed by law, and hence should not be consolidated, and that quite a number of coupons, tendered or about to be tendered for that purpose, were not valid against the state. The legislature took no measures to prevent the consolidation, and the attorney-general declined to interfere.

In March, 1875, in deliberating upon the address for the removal of Treasurer Cardoza, who was charged with issuing consolidation bonds for the securities which are now impeached, on the same grounds for which they were then assailed, the whole subject underwent a full investigation before the legislature. The address for his removal was rejected by the vote of the wisest members of that body, and he was directed to proceed to consolidate the outstanding bonds and coupons, which, it is now alleged, should not have been consolidated. Accordingly he did proceed, and issued in lieu of such vouchers a larger number of consolidated bonds than had been issued before; all holders of these securities being more willing to avail themselves of the act, because they regarded the result of this trial as putting all questions under the act as finally at rest. Taxes were promptly levied to pay the interest on the consolidated debt, and the interest was regularly paid up to January 1st, 1877.

In Garrett v. Van Horne, 7 Ohio St. 327; in Burroughs on Taxation, § 168, et seq., and in other authorities and cases, the doctrine is laid down that payment of interest by taxation on bonds irregularly issued precludes defences denying the power to issue.

Again, the state received and enjoyed the proceeds of the sale and hypothecation of these bonds now impeached. Doubtless her officials and her financial agent did squander and misappropriate much of the money thus raised on bonds, but this is a matter between the state and her officers and agents, and cannot and ought not to affect the holders for value of her securities.

*The "reconstruction" bonds and stocks authorized to be consolidated amount to $5,385,-100; consolidated at fifty per cent. gives $2,-692,550. From the proceeds of the bonds sold and hypothecated the financial agent raised $3,402,127.39, which exceeds the whole consolidated reconstruction debt by $709,-577.39.

The consideration of these consolidation bonds was therefore good and valuable. Can the state, retaining the money, be admitted to impeach the bonds? A principal cannot repudiate the illegal acts of his agents and at the same time retain the benefit thereof. The state cannot now deny, nor could she at any time have denied, the right of her agent to pledge or to sell her bonds while holding on to the money raised thereon. An offer to return this money would be a condition precedent essential to any steps to repudiate or to annul the sale or hypothecation. This she has never offered, nor does she now propose to do so, and hence she must stand by these sales and pledges. So says the Supreme Court of the United States, in Pendleton County v. Amy, 13 Wall. 297 [20 L. Ed. 579].

The financial agent made a settlement with the state under and by virtue of an act passed for that purpose, and a balance was struck in his favor, showing over $134,000 to be due him, which was another significant act of acquiescence in and approval of his sales and hypothecation; and if he had any stolen coupons, clipped from bonds or otherwise, his right to them was recognized in this settlement.

By the consolidation act and its repeated endorsement and full acceptance, a final settlement and adjustment of all vexed questions touching the bond debt of the state was apparently effected; and, in the opinion of her best citizens, was attained with marked pecuniary advantages to the state. By this adjustment the debt was reduced to an amount less than existed prior to 1868. Of the morals of the mode of its reduction we are not to speak, but only of the fact. People in and out of the state were now freely and confidingly investing in these new securities. The consols were thrown upon the market, and the rich and poor, trustees, charitable institutions, and men of all avocations, purchased them, confiding in the good faith of the state pledged on the face of each bond, and the strong guarantees of the act.

*That faith and that contract the law will not permit the state to violate for any of the insufficient reasons alleged in the defence of these suits.

The aforesaid acts of acquiescence, waiver and confirmation, in our judgment, estop the state, and preclude the defence she now sets up to these suits.

II.

That the act of December 22d, 1873, creates a contract between the state and every holder of any of her securities named in that contract who has accepted the terms thereof, whereby, in consideration of mutual advantages, a composition of their claims was made which is final and conclusive. The third section of that act declares that the bonds and certificates of stock therein authorized to be issued "should bear upon their face the declaration that the payment of the interest and the redemption of the principal is secured by the levy of an annual tax of two mills upon the dollar upon the entire taxable property of the state, which declaration shall be considered a contract entered into between the state and every holder of said bonds and stocks."

The fifth section declares that "all coupons upon the bonds, and the interest orders of said certificates of stock herein authorized to be issued, shall be received in payment of all taxes due the state during the years in which they mature, except for taxes levied for the public schools."

That this legislation constitutes a contract which the state is not at liberty to violate is set at rest by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The first is the case of State of New Jersey v. Wilson, 7 Cranch 164 [3 L. Ed. 303]. In this case it is, as it was in the case of Fletcher v. Peck [6 Cranch, 87, 3 L. Ed. 162] and in later cases, held that the clause of the constitution of the United States prohibiting states from passing bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts, applies as well to contracts to which a state is a party as to contracts between individuals.

In Woodruff v. Trapnall, 10 How. 190 [13 L. Ed. 383], decided in 1850, it was held that the provision in an act of the legislature of Arkansas, chartering a bank that the bills and notes of the bank shall *be received in all payments of debts due to the state, constituted a contract between the state and the holders of these notes which the state was not at liberty to break.

In the case of Furman v. Nichol, 8 Wall. 44 [19 L. Ed. 370], decided in 1868, a similar decision was made as to the bills of a bank chartered by the legislature of Tennessee. A number of other cases from the same court might be cited in which analogous principles are held, but it is enough to refer to but a single other, and that is the case of Wagner v. Stoll et al., from this state, in which the Supreme Court of the United States has made a like decision, touching a like provision in the charter of the bank of the State of South Carolina. [State v. Stoll] 17 Wall. 425 [21 L. Ed. 650].

The consolidation act was an adjustment or compromise offered by the state to the holders of certain carefully-enumerated outstanding stock, bonds and coupons, that if they would surrender these securities to be canceled, the state would issue to them, in lieu thereof, at the rate of fifty cents on the dollar, new bonds with guarantees that did not attach to those surrendered, to wit, the guarantees set forth above, in Sections 3 and 5 of the act.

Each holder of one of the designated securities who accepted the terms of the act, thereby entered into a solemn compromise and firm contract with the state, founded upon a good and valuable consideration, and binding upon the state.

Of the securities thus invited to be surrendered, $4,051,527.35 consisted of old bonds and stocks, the validity of which was never questioned.

Of the conversion bonds, $5,965,000 were repudiated as void; but of the balance of the reconstruction debt, carefully enumerated by amounts and classes, in the act, aggregating $5,835,100, nearly if not quite all had been questioned, as has been shown, by suits in court, by acts of the legislature, reports of committees, and through the public press; and questioned, too, upon the grounds set forth in the report of the bond commission and in the answers to these suits. In this condition of doubt as to the ultimate determination of the questions involved, and with full knowledge of the facts, the act of December 22d, 1873, was passed, wherein the state proposed to her creditors therein enumerated the terms of compromise contained therein. The con*sideration offered to the bondholders was a security, as was supposed and intended, unquestioned and unquestionable, with higher guarantees, at fifty cents on the dollar, in exchange for a security whose validity had been assailed.

The consideration moving the state was the reduction of her outstanding liabilities to less than one-third of its original amount.

The effect of the compromise was mutual gain to the parties in interest. The state gained in greatly reducing the volume of her debt, and the creditor gained in receiving a security of a higher grade, though less in amount, but of unquestionable validity. Story Eq. Jur., §§ 129–131, and cases there cited; Cann v. Cann, 1 P. Wms. 727; Stapleton v. Stapleton, 1 Atk. 10; Gibbons v. Count, 4 Ves. 840; Durham v. Wadlington, 2 Strob. Eq. 258.

Other cases, equally as strong and perhaps more applicable, might be referred to and citations made therefrom did space permit. We enumerate some of them: Ex parte Lucy, 21 Eng. L. & Eq. 199; Union Bank of Georgetown v. Geary, 5 Pet. 99 [8 L. Ed. 60]; Barlow v. Ocean Insurance Company, 3 Met. 270.

It makes no difference that we are dealing with a contract entered into by a sovereign state.

Contracts of states are measured by the same rule and governed by the same principles of law as control the compromises and contracts of private individuals. Murray v. City Council of Charleston, 96 U. S. 432 [24 L. Ed. 760].

The legislature had been informed of the several matters which, it was alleged, affected the validity of the coupons in question, and which were subsequently stated in the Dunn report; but, nevertheless, that body made no discrimination between the bonds and coupons, and the treasurer was required, under severe penalties, to consolidate all coupons maturing before January 1st, 1874, as well as the bonds to which they were attached or from which they had been clipped. In the work of consolidating these coupons the treasurer, in 1875, was interrupted by the aforesaid address for his removal, but the legislature, after mature deliberation, ordered him to proceed, and he did so.

The consolidation act is a compact and a compromise—a con*tract between the state and the holders of bonds issued in exchange for vouchers enumerated in the act.

This contract the courts are bound to recognize and enforce; and any attempt at legislation designed to alter, vary or violate the same, would be in violation of Section 10, Article I., of the constitution of the United States.

III.

These consolidation bonds are negotiable instruments, and in the hands of bona fide holders for value before maturity, if issued by competent authority, are unaffected by, and exempt from inquiry into, the circumstances under which they were put in circulation. 2 Dan. on Neg. Inst., § 1502.

States enjoy the rights and incur the liabilities of individuals when they deal in commercial paper, and such are these coupon bonds, so much so that in a recent New York case coupons are held to be entitled to days of grace.

In Murray v. City Council of Charleston, 96 U. S. 432 [24 L. Ed. 760], it is said: "When states and cities borrow money and contract to repay it with interest, they are not acting as sovereignties; they come down to the level of ordinary individuals; their contracts have the same meaning as similar contracts between private persons."

Under the law of commercial paper or negotiable instruments, we are at a loss to perceive how these consolidation bonds are obnoxious to any of the defences alleged against them by the state. If they were issued by competent authority, being negotiable instruments, they are in the hands of innocent holders for value before maturity and without notice, exempt from inquiry into the circumstances under which they were put in circulation. City of Lexington v. Butler, 14 Wall. 296 [20 L. Ed. 809].

Were they issued by competent authority? Did the treasurer who issued them have authority to do so, and bind the state thereby? If so, their validity cannot be questioned. The purchaser is not bound to look further than to ascertain this fact. He need trace the title no further than the act empowering and directing the treasurer to issue them.

In the Floyd acceptance cases, the United States escaped the *payment of the accepted drafts, solely upon the ground that Floyd had no authority to bind the government by the acceptances. The court says: "Recurring to the written law as the conclusive source of such authority we may confidently assert that there is no express authority to any officer of the government to draw or accept bills of exchange."

But how is it in the case of these consolidation bonds? The treasurer is not only authorized to issue the bonds in lieu of certain designated securities upon their surrender, but is commanded to do so under severe penalties for refusal. This authority is clear and explicit, and is all that a purchaser of a consolidation bond would desire to see in investigating the title of a bond.

The bonds enumerated in Schedule 5 of the report of the bond commission, and acknowledged to be valid, were issued by the same agents, under the same law, and by the same authority as those in Schedule 6, which are alleged to be invalid, and the same officer of the state, under the same law, is continuing the work of consolidation. Should the purchaser of consolidation bonds see fit, however, to go further in his investigation of title, and examine the records of the treasury, he will there find that the bonds he intends to purchase were duly and regularly issued in exchange for vouchers expressly named in the act as proper to be exchanged. No higher proof of the validity of the bonds could be desired, and the purchase is accordingly made with the utmost confidence in its safety.

But, it is contended for the state, that although this be true, yet the securities exchanged are no securities at all, though named in the act; that they were really not binding on the state, and should not have been authorized by the act to be received in exchange for consolidation bonds. It is now too late to raise this objection. The state is estopped by the act. With great pains and accuracy the legislature designated the securities to be consolidated, and peremptorily commanded the treasurer to issue bonds in exchange therefor. This action, it must be remembered, was taken, in the face of the objections, against the securities to be funded, which are now so strenuously urged. The act leaves to the treasurer no discretion or option, but is mandatory, and imposes on that officer duties purely ministerial. So it cannot *now be objected that any of these bonds were issued without authority, or by an improper exercise of authority.

An improper exercise of authority could only occur in knowingly receiving in exchange for consolidation bonds, vouchers not included in the act. If, upon examining the act, he finds the securities tendered to be among those therein directed to be funded, his duty is to make the exchange. No discretion is left him. But suppose, by the terms of the act, the treasurer could act judicially and determine whether vouchers tendered, though named in the act, are valid or invalid. Clearly his judgment upon the question is final, as there is no appeal, and the consolidation bond issued by him becomes, in the hands of an innocent holder for value without notice, unimpeachable.

Should he err in his judgment, and issue a consolidation bond in exchange for invalid vouchers, how is that to impair the bonds in the hands of an innocent holder? Who is to be the loser, the state, who confided this work to its servant, or the innocent purchaser? Clearly the state must suffer. She, having conferred upon the treasurer authority to issue consolidation bonds, cannot, as against an innocent holder for value of her bonds, deny that the authority was conferred, or that it was properly exercised.

In Knox v. Aspinwall, 21 How. 540 [16 L. Ed. 208], the defence of the county against the suit of the plaintiff was, that the bonds were authorized to be issued only upon a vote of a majority of the voters of the county, after due notice of the time and place of the election, and that this due notice not having been given, the bonds were invalid.

The court holds that it was for the board to determine that question, and their decision could not be called in question "after the authority had been executed, the stock subscribed and the bonds issued and in the hands of innocent holders." Page 545. See, too. Coloma v. Eaves, 92 U. S. 484 [23 L. Ed. 579]; Bissell v. City of Jefferson, 24 How. 288 [16 L. Ed. 664]; Moran v. Miami County, 2 Black 722 [17 L. Ed. 342]; Mercer Co. v. Hackett, 1 Wall. 83 [17 L. Ed. 548].

The same rule of law is laid down in Myer v. City of Muscatine, 1 Wall. 393 [17 L. Ed. 564]; Gelpcke v. City of Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175 [17 L. Ed. 520]; Supervisors v. Schenck, 5 Wall. 784 [18 L. Ed. 556]; Lynde v. County, 16 Wall. 11 [21 L. Ed. 272]; Commissioners v. January, 94 U. S. 205 [24 L. Ed. 110].

*In County of Dallas v. McKenzie [94 U. S. 660, 24 L. Ed. 182], the general doctrine is thus tersely stated: "A holder for value is not affected by any irregularities or frauds or unfounded assumptions of authority on the part of the agents of the town or county."

By an unbroken series of decisions this doctrine has become the settled law of negotiable bonds put in circulation by towns, cities, counties and states. It is a rule of law founded in the wisest views of public policy and of fairness and justice. With any other rule prevailing, these negotiable instruments would be valueless in the market, and municipal corporations would be unable to realize money on them. Through the whole series of authorities on this point, from the earliest to the latest, the doctrine is clearly and uniformly sustained that, when the authority to issue the bonds exists, and the holder is a bona fide holder for value, the bond is valid; and that this rule of law is as applicable to bonds of states as to those of inferior municipal corporations.

The case of State of California v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 15 Cal. 236, bears with peculiar force upon the issues here involved, and we propose to close the list of references on this branch of the cases in hand by free extracts from it. * * *

Such is the sound reasoning of the court which adjudged the State of California liable for these bonds in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, though issued for warrants which had been stolen from the treasury.

Stolen negotiable paper in the hands of an innocent holder for value before maturity, and without notice, is a valid claim against the maker. This doctrine is a necessary incident to commercial paper, and is sustained by best authority. 2 Pars. on Cont. 118; 1 Dan. on Neg. Inst. 61.

Against the views above expressed the counsel for the state contend that the plaintiffs are not entitled to the protection which the law accords to innocent holders of negotiable paper, because there can be no such thing as an innocent holding of a void security which the law will protect, and that these bonds are void.

While it is true that a holder of a void security can derive no benefit from the fact that he became a purchaser for value before *maturity, and without notice, we cannot see that the doctrine is applicable to the present plaintiffs.

It has not been made to appear that any of the surrendered vouchers, in exchange for which consolidation bonds were issued, were void; and, furthermore, consolidation bonds were not affected by any infirmities which may have attached to the securities which have been surrendered and canceled. By the compromise tendered in said act and accepted by the creditors of the state, the old bonds, coupons and certificates of stock have been delivered up and canceled. They are dead, and neither they nor questions appertaining to their validity can be resurrected. Thereby the state entered into a new contract, founded in a valuable consideration; and its obligation she cannot, therefore, escape, by reviving issues from which the new contract is discharged and free. The state, therefore, in these suits, cannot avail herself of the doctrine that the law will not afford protection to the holders of said securities.

Before closing this branch of the case it may not be improper to notice a question pertinent to the rights of bona fide holders of these bonds. None of them, it seems, gave full value for them. They were purchased at prices varying with the fluctuations of the market. Are they entitled to set up these bonds against the state for their face value and interest? We hold that they are, and in support of this view we rely upon a recent decision of the United States Supreme Court settling this question in language clear, forcible, and consonant with sense and good law. Cromwell v. County of Sac., 96 U. S. 60 [24 L. Ed. 681].

So far we have considered the questions involved in these cases as if the facts alleged by the state to establish infirmities in the vouchers, in exchange for which the consolidation bonds were issued, were true; and have endeavored to show that even if such infirmities existed, they could not affect these bonds in the hands of the plaintiffs, who are innocent holders for value without notice and before maturity. The next inquiry is, whether the facts alleged by the state are sustained by proof, and whether the legal propositions advanced to impeach the bonds are well taken. The objections to the validity of these several bonds, both of fact and of law, set up in the several answers, are, *in the main, the same as are advanced in the report of the bond commission, and we propose to review them in the order therein set out.

The coupons embraced in objections 1, 2, 3 and 4 of the report, aggregate $837,246; and the charges in substance are, that these are coupons, some of which were clipped from bonds that were never issued, others from bonds before they were issued, and a large number were coupons that matured before January 1st, 1871, up to which date the state promptly paid all accruing interest, and therefore must have paid these coupons so maturing. Bearing upon this branch of the case much testimony was introduced, a part of which is hearsay in its character, to the admission of which counsel for the plaintiffs very properly objected. An examination of all the legitimate testimony, and in fact the hearsay as well, does not enable me to discover satisfactory proof of the facts alleged. We are asked to infer these facts from certain documentary evidence, and by a method of speculative reasoning adopted by the bond commission.

On examining that report (and the evidence on these trials is not so strong, because there is much there that is purely hearsay,) we are constrained to say that we cannot adopt some of these conclusions. A court of justice would not be warranted in rendering judgment upon hypotheses and conjectures, such as are indulged in by the commission.

We are constrained to say that the state has failed to furnish the court with sufficient proof of the allegations touching these coupons; and, as we have already seen, such is the law that the facts, if established, would avail her nothing. State of California v. Wells, Fargo & Co., supra.

Objection 5 is, that a large number of bonds, to wit, $2,166,039, were hypothecated by the financial agent after the time allowed by law. After six months' patient investigation by the bond commission, with full power to receive and consider secondary evidence and hearsay testimony, and with access to and liberty to use the reports of previous investigating committees, the strongest allegation which the commission was able to make is, that "there is no evidence within the knowledge of the commission that these bonds, or any of them, had ever been pledged *within the time limited by law." In its most liberal construction, the evidence on this point adduced by the state amounts to no more, and falls short of proof. But the state having alleged that these bonds were not hypothecated within the lawful period, is bound to prove it.

It does not devolve upon the bondholders to prove that they were pledged within the time allowed, but it does devolve on the state to prove that they were not so pledged, before she can ask benefit from the allegation. But suppose the facts were so, was it not as competent for the legislature to ratify the pledge as for that body by act to extend the time in which to effect a loan, as it did by enlarging the time from twelve months to two years? And has not the hypothecation, whensoever made, been fully ratified?

The retention of the loan or proceeds of the pledge is the strongest act of ratification; but the validating act, the settlement with the financial agent, the consolidation act, and the action upon the charges against Cardoza, are all acts of ratification.

Does it lie in the mouth of the state retaining the proceeds of the hypothecation to set up this defense? We think not. But again, these hypothecated bonds could not be, or were not, redeemed, and being sold under forfeiture, passed into the hands of bona fide holders for value without notice. Surely, against their claim the state was without defense, as we have seen in State of Illinois v. Delafield, and other cases cited.

Objection 6 is that some of the vouchers, in exchange for which consolidation bonds were issued, are a part of the second issue of bonds under act of August 26th, 1868, "to negotiate a loan for the relief of the treasury," all of which second issue, the state alleges, were null and void, and should not have been consolidated.

A sufficient reply to this is, that the legislature thought otherwise, and so said expressly in the act of December 22d, 1873, in which the whole of the second issue then outstanding was directed to be consolidated. But looking at the act of August 26th, 1868, we see that, by its express terms, the governor was authorized to borrow, on coupon bonds of the state, within twelve *months from the passage of the act, $1,000,000. The amount to be borrowed is limited, and clearly the power is conferred to issue bonds until, by sale or hypothecation, that amount of money should be raised. The act can admit of no other interpretation than that the bonds could be issued and sold until $1,000,000 were realized, and of course the number of bonds necessary to this end would depend upon their market value.

The recital in the first $1,000,000 of bonds which were issued under this act being calculated to impair their market value, a second $1,000,000 was issued, with less prejudicial recitals, the object being to retire the first with this second issue. Much the largest part of the first issue was thus retired, and less of both were left outstanding than was sufficient to raise $1,000,000.

The next objection is against both issues of the land commission bonds, which the state alleges are void. She has received the proceeds of these bonds, and proposes to retain the same. She next has, by act of December 22d, 1873, forced the holders to surrender them and take consolidation bonds in exchange therefor at fifty cents on the dollar; and now gravely contends that these she is not liable to pay, because of alleged infirmities in the original.

The two grounds upon which the surrendered vouchers are assailed is, that the bonds were not issued to the land commission as required by the act; and, second, that they were sold below par.

Both objections are unavailing to invalidate the original land commission bonds, much less to avoid the payment of the bonds issued in consolidation thereof.

It is further urged that the scheme of the ordinance of the convention of 1868, providing for a land commission, has not been pursued by those charged with its execution. That ordinance was not binding on the legislature. The convention of 1868 was an extraordinary body, called in an extraordinary manner, by an extraordinary power, and for a special purpose, viz., to frame a constitution as a basis of reconstructing the state.

Beyond this special purpose it could not go. It possessed no legislative powers. This ordinance is legislative, and, never having been submitted to and ratified by a vote of the people, it *acquired not the sanction of a law, but, at most, could only be regarded as advisory. But the constitution of 1868 was so ratified, and so became the fundamental law of the land. By it alone the legislature is restricted. Its mandates and inhibitions must be obeyed. The bonds were issued under the act of the legislature, and not under the ordinance. The bonds, it is true, were not issued directly to the land commissioner, but by and with his consent and the advice of the advisory board, were placed in the hands of the financial agent of the state to be negotiated for the benefit of the land commission. The land commissioner got the proceeds and invested the same in lands, in the purchase of which atrocious frauds were doubtless perpetrated on the state. But she took the title to these lands, many tracts of which she has sold to purchasers.

Gross irregularities are apparent in the management of this important matter, but these cannot avoid the bonds. Between the state and her dishonest agents these matters must be settled, and, if loss there be, it must fall upon the state rather than the purchasers of her bonds, who are innocent of the frauds practiced. All these irregularities were well known to the state's representatives before the passage of the consolidation act, in which all these outstanding land commission bonds were directed to be consolidated. Behind that act the state cannot now be admitted to go in her efforts to impeach these bonds. It makes no difference that the original bonds may have been sold below par. For this infirmity the old bonds in the hands of innocent holders could not have been impeached (Illinois v. Delafield, supra), and surely the consolidation bonds cannot be.

The next defense is that the various classes of bonds issued under the several acts above enumerated were put upon the market in violation of Article IX., Section 14, of the constitution, which requires that "a correct registry of all such bonds shall be kept by the treasurer, in numerical order, so as always to exhibit the number and amount unpaid, and to whom severally made payable." This is evidently a mode of book-keeping prescribed by the constitution for the convenience and information of the state officials, and as a check and safeguard against the mischiefs that might result from less precaution. But its *observance or non-observance cannot and should not affect the validity of bonds issued by the state. It is a piece of clerical work which must necessarily follow and not precede the act of issuing the bonds. With it the bondholder has nothing to do, and should not be affected injuriously by a duty not his, and over which he can have no control.

But even in this allegation the state is not fully sustained. The journals of the treasury do show a registry of these bonds in most part, though not in the exact method contemplated by the constitution, arising from the fact that the bonds were not sold directly from the treasurer's office and to individual purchasers, in which event a detailed registry could and would have been kept, but they were issued en masse directly to the financial agent, and to him they were charged in perhaps the only method practicable. But this omission of duty, irregularity—if such it can be called—is, as well as all other irregularities, cured by the consolidation act. It is not a defect going to avoid the consolidation bonds.

The last defence of the state is that the acts of the legislature under which the various classes of surrendered vouchers were issued were not passed by the constitutional two-thirds vote of the general assembly, as required in Article IX., Sections 7, 10 and 14, of the constitution, and that the consolidation act, in so far as it attempts to make that a debt which before was void, is inoperative because not passed by a two-thirds vote.

This contention is res judicata. The Supreme Court of the state, in Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller-General, 4 S. C. 430, in August, 1873, before the act of December 22d, 1873, decided the first branch of this proposition against the state. In that judgment the court holds that the several acts under which the bonds were issued which have been subsequently consolidated, were passed by the constitutional two-thirds vote; until overruled by competent authority, this judgment is controlling. Rights which have been acquired under the law of that case cannot be divested now by its reversal. It would avail the state nothing, so far as these consolidation bonds are concerned, to obtain a reversal of that case; because both the state and bondholders *have acted upon it as good law, and have entered into a contract which its reversal cannot avoid.

The state issued various classes of bonds, and, throwing them upon the market, raised money by their sale and hypothecation.

Upon these bonds she paid interest, and the money raised upon them went into the treasury, or should have gone there.

By the consolidation act the state offered an inducement little short of compulsion to the bondholders to surrender them and receive well-guaranteed bonds, at half their full value, in exchange for those surrendered. Accordingly large surrenders have been made, and the vouchers now lie canceled in the treasury. Now she seeks to repudiate the new consols for alleged defects of the canceled vouchers, but makes no offer to restore the money she realized on these vouchers. Her defence does not stand the test of law. With its policy the court has nothing to do.

As to the defence that the consolidation act, for want of a two-thirds vote, is void in so far as it creates a debt by making that an obligation which before was not such, we cannot see the force of it. The act neither creates nor pretends to create a debt. It is, from beginning to end, a proposed scheme of settlement and compromise of the outstanding bond debt of the state, and, such being its avowed purpose—viz., "to reduce the volume of the public debt"—it needed not a two-thirds vote, and was constitutionally enacted.

We have considered the question of the validity of the bond in suit, as if we were a court having full power to consider and determine the whole question, the entire matter at issue. The question referred to us, and the one we are specially created to decide, is the validity of certain classes of consolidation bonds, and not consolidation bonds generally.

The interpretation of the text of the joint resolution creating this court by the majority of its members is, in my judgment, a misconception.

Its jurisdiction is defined in Sections 1 and 9, and appears to me to be free from ambiguity, and too plain to admit of debate. The two sections, when read together, mean nothing more nor less than that the court is created to determine the validity, not *of consolidation bonds in general, but only those classes of them reported to be invalid by the bond commission.

Surely there is no room to misunderstand the meaning of this language. It gives to the court unlimited jurisdiction to determine the validity of those consolidated bonds, coupons and certificates of stock which the bond commission mention as resting on vouchers which were not issued in accordance with law, and which bonds, coupons and certificates of stock the bond commission arranged and tabulated in Schedule 6.

It is clear that the joint resolution creates a special court for a special purpose, and that is to determine the validity of a well-defined class of consolidated bonds, viz., those pronounced by the bond commission to be invalid, and classed in Schedule 6 of their report. Beyond this limited sphere the court cannot go; but for the purpose of deciding the validity of those particular bonds, its powers are as ample and plenary as the Court of Common Pleas. There is absolutely no restriction of power within this limit. It is true the court is empowered and required to suffer the litigants to bring before it the vouchers upon which the consolidated bonds rest. This makes evidence touching these vouchers expressly admissible, when otherwise it might not have been so. But making it admissible does not take from the court the power and duty to determine its ultimate effect upon the single question at issue, to wit, the validity of the consolidated bonds.

I am at a loss, therefore, to understand how the court has arrived at so strange a conclusion as is announced in its judgment. That conclusion is that we are appointed to determine not the validity of the consolidation bonds, coupons and certificates of stock, but the validity of the vouchers upon which they rest; and that if those vouchers are found to be invalid, we are compelled, by the terms of the joint resolution, to declare the bonds resting on them to be invalid. In other words, that if we possessed the general jurisdiction of the Court of Common Pleas, we might go further, and determine the validity of consolidation bonds, although resting on invalid vouchers, and would be at liberty to pronounce them valid, notwithstanding infirmities in the vouchers. But no such power, it is contended, is accorded this court, which, should it find the vouchers invalid, is ex vi *termini of the joint resolution, precluded from further inquiry into the validity of the consolidation bonds resting thereon.

If this be the correct interpretation of the language of the legislature, the whole work of that body and the labors of the attorneys for the litigants and of this court are abortive. It leaves the main question, the one which perplexed the legislature, and which underlies this great public debt question, untouched, to wit, the legal effect of the consolidation act upon the bond debt of the state.

Furthermore, it leaves the bondholders entirely free to renew this contention in a court which will take cognizance of the question of the validity of the consolidation bonds.

I am constrained to differ with my brethren in the construction placed upon the joint resolution, and to dissent from the judgment of the court in the aforesaid test cases, for the reasons above given. And I hold that each of the bonds sued on is a valid obligation of the State of South Carolina, as is every bond issued in exchange for vouchers expressly named in the act of December 22d, 1873.

Suppose the debate upon the report of the bond commission had resulted in a proposed compromise of the consolidated bonds, coupons and certificates of stock designated and described in Schedule 6, and that the holders of these consols, accepting the terms of the compromise, had surrendered them and received new consols at a further reduced amount.

Would any man contend that the compromise was not binding on the state? Could the new consols, the fruit of such a compromise, be successfully resisted by the state in a court of justice? We hold not; and yet the present consolidated bonds occupy ground just as unassailable. They are valid obligations of the state, and their payment she cannot avoid on any recognized principles of law. She may escape through repudiation, but the law will lend her no helping hand in this last desperate resort.
